TOMLINSON v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

C [COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), November 3, 4, 1952.]

Carriage of Passengers—Injury to passenger—Snow on station platform—Delay in sanding and salting—Porter responsible otherwise urgently engaged—Liability of Railway Executive.

D Following a snowstorm snow on the platform of a railway station occupied by the defendants was trodden down and it became congealed and slippery. The only porter available started promptly to put sand and salt on the snow, but he had to stop doing so before the work was completed in order, in accordance with standing instructions, to light emergency lamps to prevent the station from being plunged into darkness in the event of a cut in electric power such as had recently been experienced. The plaintiff, a passenger, while alighting from a train, slipped on snow which had not been treated with sand and salt, fell, and was injured.

F HELD: under the contract under which the defendants carried the plaintiff they were under an obligation to provide her with safe means of egress from the train, but in the circumstances they had not failed to take reasonable care to see that the platform was reasonably safe, and, therefore, had not failed in their duty to the plaintiff.

AS TO SAFETY OF STATION PLATFORMS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 4, pp. 67-69, para. 102; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 8, pp. 85, 86, Nos. 586-594.

G APPEAL by the defendants, the Railway Executive, against an order of PARKER, J., dated May 19, 1952, whereby he gave judgment for the plaintiff in an action for damages for personal injuries.

H The plaintiff was a passenger in one of the defendants' trains, and alighted at their railway station at Heathway, Dagenham. Just beforehand there had been a snowstorm, and the snow had been trodden down and had congealed into ice and become slippery. The defendants had provided buckets of sand and salt and had issued instructions as to sanding and salting snow to the only porter available. This porter had begun to sand and salt the snow, but he had had to break off to carry out the duty, imposed on him by standing instructions, of lighting emergency lamps without which the whole station would have been plunged into complete darkness in the event of a cut in electric power such as had recently been experienced. The plaintiff slipped on snow which had not been sanded and was injured, and in the present action she contended that the defendants had not taken reasonable care to see that the premises were reasonably safe for her to use.

John Stephenson for the plaintiff.

Humfrey Edmunds for the defendants.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: Counsel for the defendants suggested that PARKER, J., had misdirected himself. He posed the question as being whether the defendants had taken reasonable care to see that the premises were reasonably safe. Of that the defendants do not complain, but they point out that in two other parts of the judgment the judge did use words which, if taken out of their context, might indicate that he was proceeding on the basis of an absolute duty in the defendants to see that the premises were reasonably safe. Reading the judgment as a whole, however, I am satisfied that he applied the law in the way in which he states it in the passage to which I first referred and that the other phrases he used were simply a "shorthand" for the duty as he had first expressed it.

There was argument before us whether the duty owed by the defendants to a passenger in respect of possible injury from snow on that part of the platform on which a passenger alights from a train arose under the contract of carriage or was to be found in the law of tort in relation to invitor and invitee. Though it probably does not make any difference in this case, I have come to the conclusion that the duty as defined by the learned judge arose under the contract of carriage.

We are concerned here with a particular sort of danger, the danger from snow. There is no question of an independent contractor employed by the defendants, or of whether the duty is to take reasonable care to make safe or to have premises as safe as reasonable care can make them. None of those questions arises because it is common ground that, if there was a failure here, it was a failure by the defendants or their servants to take reasonable care with regard to the snow. The learned judge found that the defendants had foreseen the possibility of snow getting on this platform and becoming slippery, but that they had failed to take reasonable care. I have come to a different conclusion. It was a very short time after the snowstorm that the accident happened. It seems to me it would be an impossible burden on people in the position of the defendants qua snowstorms to say that the snow must be sanded or salted as soon as it falls. If that was an absolute duty, it is difficult to see how reasonable care could provide for its performance. It was an unfortunate coincidence for the plaintiff that the duty of lighting the lamps coincided with the snowstorm, but no one can expect snow to be sanded or salted instantaneously. Everyone appreciates the danger of snow being slippery, although that does not mean that the defendants need not take reasonable steps to prevent its remaining in that condition. I cannot find that the plaintiff established a failure to take reasonable care. I would allow the appeal.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. I think the duty of the defendants to the plaintiff as regards the conditions of the platform at Heathway station was a contractual duty, for it must be an incident of a contract to carry a passenger by train that the passenger will be provided with means of ingress and egress into and from the train, and further that reasonable care will be taken by the carrier, in this case the defendants, to see that such means of ingress and egress are reasonably safe. In other words, I agree with the basis on which the learned judge put the duty.

That being the nature of the duty, the question whether it has been complied with in any given case is necessarily a question of fact and degree, on which one naturally hesitates to differ from the judge of first instance, but in the present case I think the extreme shortness of the time into which the relevant sequence of events was compressed is most significant. As I understand the

A learned judge's findings, the snow fell at some time between 3 and 3.45 p.m., the time of the accident. It was not until about 3.30 p.m. that the snow had accumulated and become trodden to an extent enabling the porter to appreciate that it might be a source of danger unless speedy measures by way of sanding and salting or shovelling the snow away were taken. The operation of sanding, it was said, would take some fifteen minutes. Therefore, it appears that the platform could only just have been made safe by 3.45, when the plaintiff alighted, if the time when the operation began, described as "about 3.30", was, in fact, not later than 3.30, even by a few minutes, and if the time required for the operation, put at fifteen minutes, was not under-estimated, even to a very slight extent. Owing to the necessity for the porter's presence elsewhere to prepare the lamps against the possibility of a power cut, he did not complete the work of sanding, which he might otherwise just have been able to do, by the time the plaintiff's train came in and the accident ensued.

B In my judgment, that is not to say that the defendants failed to take reasonable care. If that were so, their duty as regards unforeseeable and irregular climatic occurrences, such as sudden falls of snow, would be, not to take reasonable care to clear the snow away as soon as reasonably practicable, but to take measures, at I know not what expense, to ensure that at all times their resources in the way of staff and apparatus at the station were such that they would be in a position to clear away occasional unexpected falls of snow immediately on their occurrence. I agree with my Lord that the effect of this would be to cast a palpably higher duty on the defendants than the law warrants, and, in my opinion, the learned judge was in error in coming to a contrary conclusion. Accordingly, I would allow the appeal.

D HODSON, L.J.: I also agree. I agree with the learned judge that the duty on the defendants to take reasonable care as to the condition of the platform was a contractual obligation and did not derive, as counsel for the defendants sought to argue, from some relationship of the parties which gave rise to legal obligations external to the contract itself. It is conceded by the defendants that it does not make any difference whether one approaches the problem from that point of view or from that of applying the law as to invitor and invitee. The learned judge, having directed himself in that way, came to the conclusion that the defendants had not taken reasonable care. In considering that question he, I think, came to a wrong conclusion. This is not a case in which the Court of Appeal will not interfere because the judge has arrived at conclusions of fact on conflicting evidence. The facts are clearly set out in the judgment, and there is no dispute about them. The only question is: What is the inference to be drawn from those facts? With respect to the learned judge, I think it is impossible to draw the conclusion that the defendants did not take reasonable care with regard to this platform, and, therefore, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

BLACKMAN v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Hilbery, J.), December 1, 2, 3, 1952.]

Negligence—Invitee—Railway station—Passenger slipping on patch of oil—Duty owed by Railway Executive.

Part of a railway station occupied by the defendants was used for the loading and unloading of mail vans, for mail bags and trolleys, and for standing barrows used to convey mail bags to platforms, but there was nothing to show that passengers should not go on that part. On the removal of certain of the barrows the foreman on duty noticed a patch of oil which had dripped on the ground and had previously been hidden by the barrows. He at once tried to stop people passing that way and directed a trolley driver to get sawdust and put it on the oil. The plaintiff, while crossing the part of the station in question and not hearing the foreman, who did not see her, slipped on the oil, fell, and was injured.

HELD: the plaintiff was an invitee of the defendants: Bloomstein v. Railway Executive ([1952] 2 All E.R. 418) applied; the defendants had not failed to exercise reasonable care to keep the part of the station in question reasonably safe for passengers; and, therefore, they were not liable to the plaintiff for negligence.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

The defendants, the Railway Executive, were the occupiers of Paddington Station, London. One entrance to the station from the approach road leading out of Praed Street comprised a narrow roadway with a pavement for foot passengers on either side and leading into the great hall of the station. On the right of this entrance there was a cloak-room for the deposit of baggage and on the left the "urgent parcels office" and a bookstall. The entrance was used by mail vans, and all that part of the station, except in front of the cloak-room and round the bookstall and the way to a lost property office in the corner, was used for the loading and unloading of mail vans, for mail bags and trolleys, and for standing barrows (four-wheeled, flat barrows, with iron wheels on iron axles, which, when loaded with mail bags, could be hooked on to each other to form a train drawn by a motor trolley to the platform for the loading of the mail bags into their train). This part of the station, except the corner where the lost property office was, was shut off on the south-east side by the station buildings used by railway employees and on the north-east side by a large train arrival indicator and movable barriers, but it was open on the north-west and south-west sides for the barrows to get away to the platforms. There was no need for passengers to go across this part of the station, and while the mail vans and barrows were there passengers were obstructed from going across it. There was no marking to show the bounds within which a passenger entering by the entrance was intended to move or to denote that he should not go on that part of the station.

On May 19, 1948, shortly after 5 p.m., the removal of barrows from this part of the station revealed to the foreman on duty there a thick patch of oil which had dripped on the ground and had previously been hidden by the barrows. He at once tried to stop people coming round that way, keeping them as close as he could to the front of the bookstall, and he shouted to a trolley driver to get sawdust and put it on the oil. The plaintiff came in by the entrance which has been described on her way to the underground station and went across where the barrows had been standing as the nearest way to get round the train arrival indicator. She did not hear the plaintiff shout and he did not see her go behind him. She slipped on the oil, fell, and was injured.

The defendants denied negligence.

N. Lawson for the defendants.

HILBERY, J., stated the facts, assessed the plaintiff's damages at £500, and continued: As the plaintiff was coming on the railway premises to become a passenger on the underground railway I had to ascertain first whether she was an invitee or merely a licensee on Paddington Station which is part of the premises of the western section of the Railway Executive and not underground railway premises of the London Transport Executive. That matter was examined by PARKER, J., in Bloomstein v. Railway Executive (1), in which he held that such a passenger was an invitee of the Railway Executive because, he said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 418):

"Under the Transport Act, 1947, s. 12 (1), all the properties of the railway undertakers specified in sched. III, Part I, which properties included both Euston Station, which had belonged to the London, Midland and Scottish Railway Co. and also the underground railway undertaking of the London Passenger Transport Board, vested in the British Transport Commission. The powers, liabilities and duties of the commission have been delegated to the various executives including the Railway Executive and the London Transport Executive. Section 5 (4) of the Act provides: 'Each executive shall, as agents for the commission, exercise such functions of the commission as are for the time being delegated to them by or under a scheme made by the commission and approved by the Minister.' Sub-section (9) provides: 'As respects matters for the time being falling within the scope of any such delegation, the following provisions shall have effect except as between the executive and the commission, that is to say—(a) any rights, powers and liabilities of the commission shall be treated as rights, powers and liabilities of the executive, and the executive only . . .' It seems to me that the duty of invitor to invitee is owed by the British Transport Commission in respect of its properties, and for convenience those duties of the commission are to be treated as the duties of the executive in question. Accordingly, it seems to me that under the Act of 1947 the duty that the commission owed to the plaintiff as a passenger on the underground part of their transport system is to be treated as a duty of the executive within whose premises the plaintiff's injury was received . . ."

Therefore, he came to the conclusion that the plaintiff, although on Euston Station, intending to be a passenger on the underground railway, was an invitee of the Railway Executive. In those circumstances I treat the plaintiff in the present case as an invitee of the defendants, but an invitee of the defendants where? There is nothing at Paddington Station to show passengers that they are not entitled to cross this part of the station and they cannot do so when it is obstructed by the barrows unless they choose to thread a way between the barrows, but the very presence of a large number of standing barrows and mail vans there is, I think, ordinarily a sufficient indication that passengers are not invited to go that way. I think that anybody coming in by that entrance would know that a passenger is intended to turn to the left close to the bookstall, or to the right close along the front of the cloak-room, but there is no particular marking to show the bounds within which a passenger is intended to move and nothing to denote to a passenger that this part of the station where the mail barrows are is a place on which a passenger must not go. Passengers do cross there when taking a short cut from the entrance to certain platforms. In the circumstances, therefore, I treat the plaintiff as an invitee on this part of the station.

What, then, is the measure of the duty which the defendants owed the plaintiff? I have been referred to Tomlinson v. Railway Executive (2), a recent decision of the Court of Appeal which bears many resemblances to the present case. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts of the case and read from the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J., ante, p. 2 and continued:] The Court of Appeal treated the case as one where there was a duty to take reasonable care to have the premises reasonably safe for the passengers. The patch of oil here is not unlike a snow-fall. Just as sand was kept available in case of snow, so here sand and sawdust were kept available to meet cases where something made the surface of the ground slippery. On the other hand, in Stowell v. Railway Executive (3) where one of the platforms of a railway station, which had been used during the night for fish traffic, was found to have been left in a slippery condition so that a person coming to meet passengers slipped and fell and injured himself, the Railway Executive were held liable.

I have to ask myself whether there was any failure to exercise reasonable care to keep this part of Paddington Station reasonably safe for passengers. Just as the recent fall of snow in Tomlinson v. Railway Executive (2) left little time for the porter to complete sanding and do his other jobs, so here the oil patch was not apparent as anything that might affect passengers until the barrows were moved. The foreman immediately took steps to eliminate the possible danger. The purpose for which this part of the station is used necessitates its being on the same level as the rest of the great hall, and prevents its being permanently fenced off against use by passengers. In the circumstances, in my opinion, although everyone, including the defendants, knows that, wherever motor vehicles stand for any length of time with well-oiled axles and wheels, oil is liable to drip and form a slippery patch, there was no failure to observe that such an oil patch had been formed within a reasonable time, or to take prompt steps to remove the danger. The foreman saw the oil at once and set about removing it at once. Can it fairly be said that the steps which he took were not reasonably sufficient steps? The defendants, as occupiers of these premises, are not insurers. They do not guarantee a person coming on the premises against any accident or against slipping or falling. All they must do is to take reasonable steps to keep the premises as free from danger as they reasonably can be kept. Whether reasonable steps have been taken is a question of degree. Different courts might take different views of the matter, but I think the plaintiff has failed to show that the accident was due to a failure on the part of the defendants' employees to exercise reasonable care. There will be judgment for the defendants.

GODFREY PHILLIPS, LTD. v. INVESTMENT TRUST CORPORATION, LTD., AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), November 11, December 10, 1952.]

Company—Dividend—Underpayment—Cumulative preference shares—Distribution of aggregate sum in respect of underpayment—Period of deficiency—Shareholders entitled to share in distribution—Rate of income tax deductible.

A From 1939 the plaintiff company used a certain method of computing the cumulative dividend payable on the "B" cumulative preference shares. In September, 1948, this method was challenged by a holder of those shares, and on July 26, 1951, the House of Lords held that, on the true construction of the company's article which defined the rights in regard to dividend of the "B" cumulative preference shares, the method of computation employed by the company since 1939 was wrong, and, in consequence, the dividend had been underpaid. Throughout this period the dividends on cumulative preference shares which ranked after the "B" preference shares were paid in full, and dividends were paid on the ordinary shares. The company now sought the opinion of the court on the questions (i) whether the first dividend which was to be regarded as deficient was the payment made on Oct. 31, 1939, or the payment made on Oct. 31, 1948; (ii) whether the aggregate sum which should be paid to the holders of the "B" preference shares in respect of the underpayment (a) should be distributed among the holders of those shares registered at the respective times when the deficient dividends were paid; or (b) should be paid wholly to those registered at the time of the payment of the aggregate sum; and (iii) whether the income tax which, under s. 184 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1952 (replacing r. 20 of the All Schedules Rules in sched. I to the Income Tax Act, 1918, as amended by s. 39 (1) of the Finance Act, 1927), the company was entitled to deduct when distributing the aggregate sum by way of dividend should be computed at the various standard rates in force at the dates when the deficient dividends were paid or at the standard rate in force at the time when the aggregate sum was distributed.

HELD: (i) too small a dividend on the "B" preference shares having been declared on each occasion since Oct. 31, 1939, on no such occasion was any debt created in regard to the amount by which the dividend was deficient, but the continued existence of the rights of the holders of those shares was not affected by the fact that full effect had not been given to those rights, and, although they could not sue for the recovery of the amount by which the dividend was short, they could sue for a declaration that the company was not entitled to pay any dividend on any inferior class of shares without first satisfying their rights in full, and for an injunction on the footing of such a declaration; in such a claim, no statutory period of limitation would be applicable, and, therefore, apart from any question of waiver or estoppel, they would be entitled to maintain their claim in respect of the amount by which they had been underpaid; on the facts, these shareholders had not waived their rights as regards past years, nor was there any such representation of fact on their part as would be necessary to found an estoppel; and, therefore, in calculating the aggregate sum which ought to be paid to them as representing the amount by which the sums already paid to them on account of the cumulative preferential dividend on the "B" preference shares fell short of the sums which ought to have been paid, the earliest payment which was to be regarded as deficient was that made on Oct. 31, 1939.

Matthews v. Great Northern Ry. Co. (1859) (28 L.J.Ch. 375), distinguished.

(ii) when the aggregate sum payable to the holders of the "B" preference shares in regard to the deficiency on the sums already paid to them was distributed the distribution would take the form of a dividend, and, although that dividend would be calculated by reference to a period extending back to October, 1939, it would be solely in respect of the year in which it was declared, and, therefore, it could be paid only to those persons who were registered as the holders of "B" preference shares at the time when it was declared.

Re Wakley ([1920] 2 Ch. 205), applied.

(iii) the rate of income tax which the company was entitled to deduct, under the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 184 (1), when distributing the aggregate sum by way of dividend, was the standard rate in force when the dividend was declared.

SPECIAL CASE, submitted under R.S.C., Ord. 34, r. 1, for the determination of certain questions of law arising out of the decision of the House of Lords, given on July 26, 1951, and reported [1951] 2 All E.R. 632, in Friends Provident & Century Life Office v. Investment Trust Corpn., Ltd. (1), whereby their Lordships determined the correct method of computing the cumulative dividend payable on the "B" cumulative preference shares of the plaintiff company, Godfrey Phillips, Ltd.

The effect of their Lordships' decision was that the dividend must be regarded as having been underpaid for several years past, and, by the indorsement of claim on the writ in the present action, the plaintiff company claimed, inter alia:

"(1) A declaration that, in calculating the aggregate sum which ought to be paid to the holders of the 'B' cumulative preference shares in the capital of the plaintiff company, as representing the amount by which the sums already paid by the plaintiff company on account of the cumulative preferential dividend on such shares falls short of the sums which ought to have been paid on account thereof, the earliest half-yearly payment on account of such dividend which is to be regarded as having been deficient (which payment is hereinafter referred to as 'the relevant payment') was that made on Oct. 31, 1948. (2) Alternatively, a declaration that the relevant payment was that made on Oct. 31, 1939. (3) A declaration that the said aggregate sum is divisible exclusively among the holders of the said 'B' cumulative preference shares appearing as such on the register of members of the plaintiff company at the time of payment of the said aggregate sum. (4) Alternatively, a declaration that so much of the said aggregate sum as represents the deficiency of a particular half-yearly payment of the said dividend is divisible among the persons who appeared as holders of the said 'B' cumulative preference shares on the said register at the time when that half-yearly payment was paid, whether or not such persons shall appear as such at the time of payment of the said aggregate sum. (5) A declaration that the rate of income tax which the plaintiff company is entitled to deduct from the said aggregate sum is the standard rate in force at the date of payment thereof. (6) Alternatively, a declaration that the rate of income tax which the plaintiff company is entitled to deduct from so much of the said aggregate sum as represents the deficiency of a particular half-yearly payment of the said dividend is the standard rate in force at the date when that half-yearly payment was paid."

The following summary of the facts is taken from the Special Case. The plaintiff company was incorporated on Dec. 10, 1908, under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1907, as a company limited by shares. Its present issued share capital was £2,365,990, divided into two hundred and fifty thousand cumulative preference shares of £1 each, three hundred thousand "B" cumulative preference shares of £1 each, three hundred thousand "C" cumulative preference shares of £1 each, £1,431,827 ordinary stock, and 841,630 ordinary shares of 2s. each. All the shares were fully paid up. The ordinary shares and stock ranked pari passu in all respects. The rights conferred on the holders of the "B" cumulative preference shares, which had been in the same form ever since these shares were created and issued in 1919, were now contained in art. 5 (A) (ii) of the company's present articles, which were adopted in 1949. Article 5 (A) (ii) reads:

"The 'B' cumulative preference shares confer the right to a fixed cumulative preferential dividend at such rate that after deduction of income tax thereon at the current rate for the time being (irrespective of any allowance or rebate in the case of a particular shareholder) the amount remaining shall be the clear sum of six per cent. per annum on the capital paid up thereon less the amount of any income tax for the time being payable in excess of 6s. in the pound computed on the gross sum of six per cent. per annum on such capital, such dividend to rank next after the dividend payable in respect of the said two hundred and fifty thousand cumulative preference shares and in priority to the dividend on the said three hundred thousand 'C' cumulative preference shares and also on the ordinary shares for the time being of the company, but no further right to participate in the profits of the company."

By art. 71 of the present articles (replacing art. 71 of the articles of 1935), the "B" cumulative preference shares were not to confer on the holders thereof the right to attend or vote at any general meeting unless (inter alia) the dividend thereon should be in arrear for more than one month. By art. 120, art. 121 and art. 124 of the present articles (replacing, respectively, art. 120, art. 121 and art. 124 of the articles of 1935 which were in identical terms):

"120. The profits of the company available for dividend and resolved to be distributed shall be applied in the payment of dividends to the members in accordance with their respective rights and priorities. The company in general meeting may declare dividends accordingly. 121. No dividend shall be payable except out of the profits of the company, or in excess of the amount recommended by the directors. 124. The directors may, if they think fit, from time to time pay to the members in respect of those shares in the capital of the company which confer on the holders thereof deferred rights as well as in respect of those shares which confer on the holders thereof preferential rights with regard to dividend such interim dividends as appear to the directors to be justified by the profits of the company, and provided that the directors act bona fide they shall not incur any responsibility to the holders of shares conferring a preference for any damage that they may suffer by reason of the payment of an interim dividend on any shares having deferred rights. The directors may also pay half-yearly, or at other suitable intervals to be settled by them, any dividend which may be payable at a fixed rate if they are of opinion that the profits justify the payment."

An amount purporting to be the dividend on the "B" cumulative preference shares had been paid half-yearly, on Apr. 30 and Oct. 31 in each year, since the shares were issued. Until the end of 1948 each half-yearly payment was made without any formal resolution of the directors in regard to the payment, the procedure in regard thereto being that the dividend warrants, bearing a printed facsimile signature of one of the directors and initialled by the secretary of the company or his authorised deputy, were sent out by the secretary on every payment date and the accounts containing a corresponding appropriation out of the profits of the company were adopted at the next succeeding annual general meeting. Before 1951 notices of these meetings were not sent to holders of the "B" cumulative preference shares, and during the period from 1939 to 1950 inclusive the holders of these shares did not vote as such on any resolutions of the company in general meeting except on the special resolution adopting the present articles of the company. The standard rate of income tax first rose above 6s. in the pound for the fiscal year 1939-40 and had remained above that rate ever since. From 1939 until Apr. 30, 1951, the company calculated the dividend on the "B" cumulative preference shares in accordance with the following example for a holding of a hundred shares, a dividend for a full year, and a standard rate of tax at 9s. in the pound:

Six per cent. on one hundred shares of £1 each	6	0	0
Equivalent to gross (at 6s. in the pound)... ..	8	11	5
Less income tax at 6s. in the pound	2	11	5
Less income tax at 3s. in the pound calculated on the gross sum of £8 11s. 5d.	1	5	8
	4	14	4

In September, 1948, a holder of "B" cumulative preference shares challenged this method of calculation, and on Dec. 22, 1948, the company commenced proceedings by originating summons for a declaration on the true construction of art. 5 (A) (ii). By an order of VAISEY, J., made on Feb. 23, 1949, the company's method of calculation was approved. By an order dated Oct. 25, 1950, the Court of Appeal reversed the order of VAISEY, J., and held that, for any year in which the rate of income tax was more than 6s. in the pound, the deduction in respect of the excess ought to be calculated on the amount of £6 per centum on the capital paid up and not on that amount grossed up at 6s. in the pound, so that for a year in which the rate of income tax was 9s. in the pound the net amount of the dividend on £100 "B" cumulative preference shares (fully paid up) would be £6 less 18s., or £5 2s. On July 26, 1951, the decision of the Court of Appeal was affirmed by the House of Lords. From Apr. 30, 1949, to Apr. 30, 1951, the half-yearly dividends on the "B" cumulative preference shares were paid pursuant to resolutions of the directors of the company, but were made on the basis now held to be erroneous. Payments made after Apr. 30, 1951, were calculated in accordance with the decision of the House of Lords. For every year in which the dividend on the "B" cumulative preference shares was underpaid the dividend on the "C" cumulative preference shares (which rank subsequently to the "B" cumulative preference shares) was paid in full, and interim and final dividends were paid on the ordinary shares and stock. For each of the years from 1939 to 1951 the final dividends paid on the ordinary shares and stock were paid pursuant to resolutions of the directors recommending such dividends and to declarations of such dividends by the company in general meeting.

A The questions on which the company now sought the opinion of the court, stated shortly, were (a) from what date the dividend payable on the "B" cumulative preference shares had been underpaid, (b) whether the balance of the dividend should be distributed among the holders of the "B" cumulative preference shares registered at the respective times when the deficient dividends were paid or should be paid wholly to those registered at the time when the balance was hereafter paid, and (c) whether the income tax which the company was entitled under s. 184 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1952 (replacing r. 20 of the All Schedules Rules as amended by the Finance Act, 1927, s. 39 (1)), to deduct from the balance should be computed at the various standard rates in force at the dates when the deficient dividends were paid or at the standard rate in force at the time when the balance was paid.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 10. WYNN-PARRY, J., read the following judgment. I propose to deal first with para. 1 and para. 2 of the indorsement on the writ, which ask for alternative declarations. Between them they raise this question. In calculating the aggregate sum which ought to be paid to the holders of the "B" preference shares in the capital of the company as representing the amount by which, having regard to the decision of the House of Lords in Friends Provident & Century Life Office v. Investment Trust Corp'n., Ltd. (1), the sums already paid on account of the cumulative preferential dividend on such shares falls short of the sums which ought to have been paid on account thereof, the earliest half-yearly payment on account of such dividend which is to be regarded as having been deficient is that which was made on Oct. 31, 1948, the date of the half-yearly payment made next after the date when the old method of calculating the dividend was first challenged, or, alternatively, that made on Oct. 31, 1939, the date of the half-yearly payment made next after the standard rate of income tax first rose above 6s. in the pound.

G It is well established that, in respect of a right to dividend on a share, no debt is created until a dividend is declared. Over the maximum period involved, which goes back to Oct. 31, 1939, too small a dividend was declared on each occasion. In respect of each dividend actually declared a debt was created in favour of each holder of "B" preference shares, but, in respect of what I may call the "shortfall", on no such occasion was any debt created. Full effect was not given to the rights of the holders of the "B" preference shares, but the continued existence of those rights was not affected by reason of such failure. It follows that, apart from any question of waiver or estoppel, which I will consider later, the holders of the "B" preference shares could insist as against the company and the holders of the shares and stock of the inferior classes that before any further distribution of profits should be made the amount by which the payment of dividend in respect of the "B" preference shares over the period from Oct. 31, 1939, was short should first be distributed in respect of those shares.

It is argued, however, that, having regard to the facts set out in the Special Case, outside which, of course, I cannot go, the holders of the "B" preference shares cannot so insist, because they have barred themselves by acquiescence or laches or waiver or are estopped from asserting their right so as to insist in respect of any earlier period than that beginning on Oct. 31, 1948. In his argument counsel for the holders of the "C" preference shares and of ordinary shares and stock sought to rely on Matthews v. Great Northern Ry. Co. (2), the headnote of which reads as follows:

"By an Act of Parliament it was enacted, that it should be lawful for any shareholder who should have paid up one half the amount of any share or shares of the G.N.R. Company, to require each share to be converted into two half-shares, whereof the one half which should be so fully paid up should be denominated deferred half-share, and the other half of such share should be denominated guaranteed half-share; and thenceforth in respect of each whole share so divided, the whole of the interest and dividends which would in each year have accrued should be applied in or towards payment, in the first place, of interest or dividend after the rate of £6 per cent. per annum on the amount paid upon the half-share so denominated 'guaranteed', and the remainder, if any, should alone be payable to the half-share so denominated 'deferred', provided that the company should not pay any other or greater amount of interest or dividend upon the two half-shares than was for the time being paid on each undivided share:—Held, upon the construction of this section, that the holders of guaranteed half-shares were entitled to be paid their £6 per cent. in each year not only out of the dividends accruing in that year, but out of all subsequent dividends; and, therefore, if in any year the dividends were more than sufficient to pay £6 per cent. on the guaranteed half-shares, the surplus must be applied in payment, in the first place, of all arrears due on those half-shares in respect of past deficiencies before any dividend could be declared on the deferred half-shares. The holders of the guaranteed half-shares having in a former year acquiesced in the declaration of a dividend on the deferred half-shares, whilst there was an arrear of dividend due on the guaranteed half-shares,—Held, that although they had precluded themselves from making any claim in respect of those particular arrears, they had not thereby renounced their rights in respect of subsequent arrears."

The argument for the defendants is reported as follows:

F

"Mr. Rolt, Mr. Denison and Mr. T. Stevens, for the defendants, contended that, according to the true construction of the Act of Parliament of 1848, the guaranteed dividends for each year were to be made good only out of the dividends declared for that year, and if in any year there was not sufficient to pay £6 per cent. the holders of B stock were not entitled to have the arrears paid up out of dividends declared in subsequent years. This construction was acquiesced in in 1854, and could not now be dissented from."

G

Most of the judgment of Wood, V.-C., was devoted to a consideration of the scope of the rights of the holders of the guaranteed half-shares and the deferred half-shares. Towards the end of his judgment, however, he said (28 L.J.Ch. 382):

H

"Then comes the question of laches. It does not appear that I can hold parties to be precluded, because they stand by acquiescing in a certain sense, that is to say, not asserting their rights upon a construction adverse to their view taken by the directors as it was taken in the report of 1854. When I say adverse, I do not quite coincide with what Mr. Denison urged, that it does not appear that there was any assertion of right. The directors announced their view, and nobody said anything. They were content to take their dividend. Upon that I hold that they cannot call back the dividends which have been paid down to that time, but I do not think that that precludes them for all time from saying that they have not renounced their rights, or that the persons who may have bought A. shares with the notion that their rights were different from what the court has now held them to be, can say to the B. shareholders, You who, rather than go into litigation, acquiesced in having the money, which might have been paid in a particular way, appropriated in a different way during a certain period of time, are therefore bound in all time to give up that right. There is nothing in the shape of misrepresentation or fraudulent holding out to make me say, there is an equity to be fastened on all the B. shareholders for all time by reason of their acquiescing in the view which might have been then taken."

It is to be observed that in the argument it was urged that there had been acquiescence in the past, but that this was put forward with a view to sustaining the point that such acquiescence operated to alter the rights of the holders of the guaranteed stock for the future. The judgment of Wood, V.-C., proceeds on the basis that there had been acquiescence as regards the prior period, for which conclusion he gives no express reason, but that such acquiescence could not affect the future. He treats it as a case in which a plea of laches could have been advanced against any attempt to "call back" the dividend, to use his own phrase.

I have felt it necessary to refer to that case, because, as I have said, it was relied on in argument, and because the doctrine of acquiescence appears to have been relied on by Wood, V.-C. It is not, however, necessary for me, I think, to say more about that case than that, in my view, it does not touch the present case, in which neither acquiescence nor laches can, to my mind, play any part. The matter may be tested in this way. So long as no dividend or an insufficient dividend is declared, a holder of "B" preference shares has no right to sue for the recovery of any money. His only right would be to sue for a declaration that the company is not entitled to pay any dividend on any inferior class of shares without first satisfying in full the rights of the holders of "B" preference shares and for an injunction on the footing of such a declaration. Such an action would be for the enforcement of a legal right, and the injunction would be sought merely in aid of that legal right. Now, where an injunction is sought merely in aid of a legal right, then lapse of time, unaccompanied by anything else, does not bar the right to the injunction, at any rate at the trial of the action, unless it would have barred the corresponding action at law: see Birmingham Canal Co. v. Lloyd (3), Great Western Ry. Co. v. Oxford, Worcester & Wolverhampton Ry. Co. (4), and Fullwood v. Fullwood (5). In such a claim as I am considering no statutory period of limitation would be applicable, and, therefore, prima facie, the holders of "B" preference shares would be entitled to maintain their claim in respect of the amount by which they have been underpaid.

It was argued that either they must be taken to have waived their rights as regards past years, or else as regards those years they would be estopped from asserting their rights. As regards waiver, I can find nothing in the Special Case to indicate that there has been anything in the nature of waiver. As regards estoppel, it is clear that the holders of "B" preference shares could not be precluded from asserting the true construction of the articles of association, because that construction has been pronounced on by the House of Lords in Friends Provident & Century Life Office v. Investment Trust Corpn., Ltd. (1), and must apply for the future. Even if an estoppel could be pleaded in respect of the past years, I am unable to see how it could be established on the evidence in the Special Case and the accompanying documents. I cannot find any such representation of fact as would be necessary to found an estoppel, nor, assuming that difficulty to be overcome, is there any sufficient evidence that the company altered its position to its detriment.

An argument was advanced on behalf of the holders of "B" preference shares who have parted with their shares, which I had great difficulty in following. It involved the assertion, no doubt in a writ, by such a holder that the company owed him the amount by which he had been underpaid in the past as a debt presently payable. This assertion, the argument admitted, was completely false, but it was contended that the company could not, itself, assert the falsity. Apparently, the action would have progressed by the company putting in a defence pleading that no dividend had been declared, whereupon the former holder of "B" preference shares would have put in a reply pleading that the company was estopped from setting up the plea of no declaration of dividend. This analysis must demonstrate the hopelessness of such an argument, because it involves completely forgetting that estoppel can only be a matter of defence and cannot be used, even in a reply, to found a cause of action. I, therefore, conclude that the relevant payment was that made on Oct. 31, 1939, and I shall, therefore, make a declaration in the sense of para. 2 of the indorsement on the writ.

I now proceed to deal with para. 3 and para. 4 of the indorsement on the writ, which raise the question whether the aggregate sum to which I have referred is divisible exclusively among the holders of the "B" preference shares appearing as such on the register of members of the company at the time of payment of the aggregate sum, or whether, in fact, persons who were holders of "B" preference shares during the material period, but who have sold them, are entitled to share in such distribution in the manner specified in para. 4 of the indorsement on the writ. Subject as below mentioned, in my view, this question must be answered in the former sense, for the simple reason that, when the aggregate sum is distributed, the distribution will—as, indeed, it must—take the form of a dividend, and, although that dividend will be calculated by reference to a period extending back to October, 1939, it will be a dividend solely in respect of the year in which profits are declared for division, the amount being by virtue of art. 5 (A) (ii) of the company's articles, as construed by the House of Lords in Friends Provident & Century Life Office v. Investment Trust Corpn., Ltd. (1), determined by the whole amount of the aggregate sum: see Re Wakley (6). Such a dividend could only be paid to those persons who are registered as the holders of "B" preference shares at the time of the declaration of the dividend. I shall, therefore, make a declaration in the sense of para. 3 of the indorsement on the writ, but the declaration will refer to the time of the declaration of the dividend by which the aggregate sum is distributed instead of to the time of payment of the aggregate sum. As regards para. 5 and para. 6 of the indorsement on the writ, it follows from what I have said in dealing with para. 3 and para. 4 that the rate of income tax which the company is entitled to deduct when distributing the aggregate sum by way of dividend is the standard rate in force when the dividend is declared.

Declarations accordingly.

J. MARCEL (FURRIERS), LTD. v. TAPPER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Hilbery, J.), November 28, December 3, 1952.]

Sale of Goods—Contract—Distinction from contract for work and labour done and materials supplied—Contract to make fur jacket to order—Colour of skins and style selected by purchaser—Enforcement of contract—Need for note or memorandum signed by purchaser—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (c. 71), s. 4 (1).

The defendant ordered from the plaintiffs, retail furriers who made up furs and fur garments for women customers, a mink jacket for his wife. After inspecting several skins he chose a colour and selected a style for a jacket. The price was £950, but there was no written note or memorandum of the contract signed by the defendant.

HELD: the contract was one, not for work and labour to be done and materials to be supplied, but for the sale of goods to a special order, and, in the absence of a memorandum in writing signed by the defendant, it was unenforceable by virtue of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 4 (1).

ACTION for a sum alleged to be due for work done and materials supplied.

The plaintiffs were retail furriers carrying on business at 31 New Bond Street, London. They kept a stock of furs made up ready for sale, and they also made up furs, coats, jackets, and boleros for women customers. According to the evidence which the court accepted, but which the defendant denied, the defendant and his wife visited the plaintiffs' showroom early in May, 1952, to order a mutation mink jacket, mutation mink being a cross-bred, farm-bred mink (as distinguished from a wild mink), the crossing producing a mink in various shades of colour known by various designations. The defendant and his wife took away skins to look at in order to choose between two shades called "royal pastel" and "breath of spring". In the end they chose royal pastel, and returned to discuss the style. Against the advice of the plaintiffs' manager they chose from the pattern book a style for a hip-length jacket, the jacket to be made up with the skins running horizontally. The coat was made up and was invoiced as follows: "Hip-length mutation mink jacket (royal pastel) £950." There was no note or memorandum of the contract signed by the defendant. The jacket was rejected by the defendant who submitted that any obligation arising under the contract was an obligation under a contract for the sale of goods to the value of £10 and upwards, and, by virtue of s. 4 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, was not enforceable against the defendant in the absence of a note or memorandum signed by him.

Levy, Q.C., and Leonard Caplan for the plaintiffs.

Finer for the defendant.

HILBERY, J., stated the facts and continued: I have to determine whether or not the substance of the contract was skill and labour to be exercised for the production of the article or the production of something to be sold to the customer. If the claim is in the first of those two classes, s. 4 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, does not apply. If it is in the second class, s. 4 (1) does apply, as in Lee v. Griffin (1) referred to in Robinson v. Graves (2), in a passage of GREER, L.J.'s judgment which I was paraphrasing when I spoke of the two classes into which this transaction might be said to fall. The present case is almost exactly the same as that of a man ordering a suit of clothes from his tailor. In Lee v. Griffin (1), where the contract in question was one to make a set of artificial teeth, CROMPTON, J., said (1 B. & S. 276):

"Here, however, the subject-matter of the contract was the supply of goods. The case bears a strong resemblance to that of a tailor supplying a coat, the measurement of the mouth and fitting of the teeth being analogous to the measurement and fitting of the garment".

A high degree of skill and craftsmanship goes into the making up of a fur jacket such as was made for the defendant in this case, but it was no more than making an article for sale to the defendant on his special order. I cannot discover anything to distinguish this from the case of an ordinary article which it is part of someone's business to supply and which he makes up to special measurements for the customer. It requires skill, labour, and materials to make it, but the purpose of the transaction is the supply of the complete article and the receipt of the price. That is exactly what it was here. The invoice reads: "Hip-length mutation mink jacket (royal pastel) £950". The £950 is the price of the article and not a charge made for work and labour done and materials supplied. I am, therefore, bound to give effect to s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1893, and the plaintiffs' claim must fail.

PRIOR (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. GEORGE MARTIN (FULHAM), LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), November 28, December 1, 1952.]

Income Tax—Deduction against profits—Wear and tear—Plant or machinery—Sale by person having control over buyer—Sale at market price—Restriction of wear and tear allowances by reference to "limit of re-charge"—Application of restriction to sale taking place before Income Tax Act, 1945, received Royal Assent—Income Tax Act, 1945 (c. 32), s. 59 (3) (b).

F

One M. acquired four lorries for the purposes of his business at a cost to him of £915. On Apr. 1, 1944, he sold these lorries to the taxpayers, a body of persons over whom he had control within the meaning of s. 59 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945. The sale price was £1,500, which was admitted to be the current market price. The taxpayers claimed wear and tear allowances, under r. 6 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the years 1946-47 to 1949-50, calculated on the price of £1,500 which they had paid for the lorries. The Crown contended that, under s. 59 (3) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, the allowance was to be restricted by being computed as though the lorries had been sold for a price equal to the "limit of re-charge". The "limit of re-charge", as defined by s. 59 (3) (i) of the Act, was the sum of £915 which the lorries had cost the seller.

H

Held: section 59 (3) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, did not apply to a sale at the market price, and, therefore, the buyers' wear and tear allowances were not to be restricted by reference to the "limit of re-charge".

Case referred to:

(1) Wilsons (Dunblane), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs., (1952), 31 A.T.C. 339.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The taxpayers, a limited company, claimed wear and tear allowances, calculated by reference to the purchase price of the lorries, for the years 1946-47 to 1949-50 in respect of four lorries which, on Apr. 1, 1944, they had purchased from a seller who had control over the company within the meaning of s. 59 (1) (a) of the Income Tax Act, 1945*. The Crown sought to limit the allowances by reference to the "limit of re-charge" under s. 59 (3) (b) of the Act of 1945. The company contended that the provisions of the Act of 1945 were not retrospective except where specific provision was made to that effect, and that, accordingly, s. 59, which limited capital allowances where the buyer was a body of persons over whom the seller had control, had no application to a sale taking place before the Act received the Royal Assent on June 15, 1945, and in any case could not extend to a sale which took place, over a year previously, on Apr. 1, 1944. The Crown contended that no question of retrospective legislation arose as it was not sought to apply the provisions of s. 59 to any assessment before 1946-47, but only to base the calculations of the allowances due for 1946-47 and subsequent years on events which took place in earlier years. The Special Commissioners held that s. 59 did not apply to sales of machinery or plant taking place before the year 1945-46, and allowed the company's appeal. The Crown appealed. Before HARMAN, J., the company raised the additional contention that, in accordance with the decision since given in Wilsons (Dunblane), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), s. 59 (3) did not apply to a sale at market price.

C. Montgomery White, Q.C., and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.
Borneman, Q.C., and H. M. Allen for the taxpayers.

HARMAN, J., stated the contentions of the parties, and continued: This is an appeal by way of Case Stated turning on the effect of s. 59 of the Income Tax Act, 1945. As argued before the commissioners and as stated to me, the Case raises one point, and that is whether this section, which in certain cases cuts down the allowances given by r. 6 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, to traders in respect of wear and tear to machinery or plant, is limited in its effect to sales occurring either after the Act came into force or after the Act received the Royal Assent, the Royal Assent being given on June 15, 1945, and the Act being brought into force on Apr. 6, 1946, that being the appointed day mentioned in various places in the Act and given effect by s. 18 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945. On the one hand, it is said by the taxpayers that, if the Crown is right, the Act will have retrospective effect, and retrospective effect is not given to legislation unless that intention is clearly provided for. On the other hand, it is said by the Crown that there is no question of a retrospective effect being given to the Act, but that this is merely a case where, in dealing with a liability arising after the Act came into force, regard must be paid to things which happened before it came into force since, in considering whether a taxpayer can pass the test provided by s. 59, matters in the past have to be considered. The commissioners held that s. 59 "does not apply in the case of sales of machinery or plant taking place before the year 1945-46", by which, I think, they must mean Apr. 6, 1945. The sale in point was on Apr. 1, 1944.

* See now Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 327, sched. 14.

I agree that an Act will not be held to have retrospective force unless it very clearly appears that the legislature intended that result to follow, but, in my judgment, no question of retrospective effect arises here. I cannot see any reason why s. 59 should not apply to sales which occurred before the Act came into force in a case where the taxpayer wishes to get the allowance which the rule affords. The Act in many places specifically mentions the "appointed day" and speaks of things that happen or are to happen after the appointed day. When it does not do so, it seems to me that the present tense is used perfectly generally to apply to the past as much as it applies to the future. It cannot be said that because the present tense is used the Act is only referring to one moment of time, for then it might be argued that it did not apply after the Act came into force. I see no reason why it should not apply to previous events. If you want to get these allowances, you have to put yourself outside the limiting provisions of s. 59 and prove that at the time of sale the buyer was not under the seller's control or satisfy whatever other test is imposed. In my judgment, therefore, the commissioners were wrong on this point, and, so far, there is no reason why the section should not apply to this particular sale. That is how the matter stands on the Case Stated.

But since the case was heard by the commissioners and this Case was stated by them, there has been a decision of the Scottish Court of Session, Wilsons (Dunblane), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), sitting in its exchequer jurisdiction. That is a court from which an appeal lies only to the House of Lords and not to the Inner House in Scotland, and it is a court of the very greatest authority. Whether or no, strictly speaking, its decisions bind me, I should not have any hesitation in following them in a case where, this being taxing legislation, the same statutory provisions apply in both countries. It has always been considered that it is very undesirable that in such cases there should be different conclusions reached in the two countries. The point taken is that s. 59 (2) does not apply, and, therefore, sub-s. (3) (b) does not come into effect. It is conceded now that the price at which these lorries were sold, which was £1,500, was, in fact, their current market value. Therefore, s. 59 (2) on the face of it does not apply. Sub-section (3) (b) is a shocking example of legislation by reference twice over. The Scottish court held that the reference back is not sufficiently accurate, and that the words "the reference to the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market", which appear in sub-s. (3) (b), refer back to the second time where something rather like that is said in sub-s. (2) and not to the first time, and, therefore, it held that sub-s. (3), which replaces market value by the limit of re-charge, cannot be effective in any case where property is sold at the market price and so does not come within sub-s. (2). It is conceded by the Crown that the decision in Wilsons (Dunblane), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) covers this case. That being so, I do not propose to express any opinion on the correctness or otherwise of the decision of the court in Scotland, but to follow it. If that decision is right, the restriction of relief imposed by s. 59 cannot apply to these taxpayers and the commissioners' decision was right, though not for the reasons which they gave for it. The result, therefore, is that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

E ADJOURNED SUMMONS for an order (inter alia) that, notwithstanding the absence of any power in that behalf in the statutory trusts arising under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 46 and s. 47, on the intestacy of Leslie Ninian Masters, deceased, the applicant, Coutts & Co., might be authorised, by virtue of the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 42, to charge remuneration for its services as administrator and trustee of the estate of the intestate in accordance with its usual scale of charges (with certain amendments).

McMullen for the applicant.

M. Browne for the first respondent, the widow, the second administrator.

Stranders for the remaining respondents, the children of the intestate.

G DANCKWERTS, J.: On Mar. 9, 1949, Leslie Ninian Masters died intestate, leaving surviving him a widow and three children, who at that date were all under the age of twenty-one years. On Nov. 22, 1949, a grant of administration of his estate was made (as infants were involved in the beneficial interests) to two administrators, and the administrators so appointed were Coutts & Co., a trust corporation, and Mrs. Masters, the widow. The estate was a substantial one, it being sworn for the purposes of probate at £95,600 gross, with net personalty £80,056. Even after death duties and the costs of administration had been paid, when the summons in this case was taken out on Apr. 17, 1951, £45,500 remained as the capital value of the estate. In the circumstances it was thought reasonable to have a trust corporation appointed as one of the administrators, for there was a good deal of work to be done in the administration of the estate and in the carrying out of the trusts under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925.

The summons raises a number of matters of an administrative kind which have mostly been dealt with in chambers already, but one of them is the question of the remuneration of Coutts & Co., acting as administrators and trustees. That has been adjourned into court because of a doubt raised as to the jurisdiction of the court to authorise remuneration to be paid out of the estate to the bank. It is plain that there is jurisdiction to authorise such remuneration under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 42. That section provides:

"Where the court appoints a corporation, other than the Public Trustee, to be a trustee either solely or jointly with another person, the court may authorise the corporation to charge such remuneration for its services as trustee as the court may think fit."

In s. 68, the definition section of the Act, one finds this provision:

"(17) 'Trust' does not include the duties incident to an estate conveyed by way of mortgage, but with this exception the expressions 'trust' and 'trustee' extend to implied and constructive trusts, and to cases where the trustee has a beneficial interest in the trust property, and to the duties incident to the office of a personal representative, and 'trustee' where the context admits, includes a personal representative, and 'new trustee' includes an additional trustee."

Section 69 (1) of the Act provides:

"This Act, except where otherwise expressly provided, applies to trusts including, so far as this Act applies thereto, executorships and administratorships constituted or created either before or after the commencement of this Act."

That, I think, shows that the duties of an administrator are included in the duties of a trustee for the purposes of this Act, and that, therefore, s. 42 will apply, as regards the power to award remuneration, to the case of a trust corporation which is appointed to be administrator of the estate. That view has, in fact, been adopted in the Probate Division in a decision of LANGTON, J., In the Estates of Young (1) when the court was appointing the National Bank of Scotland, which was a trust corporation, to be administrator of two estates, and the judge ordered the grants to issue directing that the grantees should, in both cases, have power to charge according to their authorised scale.

Apart from the statutory jurisdiction conferred by s. 42, it is also plain that there is inherent jurisdiction in the court to authorise remuneration of the trustee, whether appointed by the court or not. Authority for that is to be found in Re Freeman's Settlement Trusts (2) and Marshall v. Holloway (3). The same course was in fact adopted in Re Macadam (4), on the question of the accountability of the trustee for certain directors' fees. According to his judgment as reported ([1945] 2 All E.R. 672), COHEN, J., left to be decided in that case the question whether in the circumstances he should authorise the trustee to retain the directors' fees under the inherent jurisdiction of the court. That course was, however, to my knowledge adopted, and the remuneration was in fact authorised.

I also remember a case before EVE, J., in which I appeared as counsel, before the passing of the Act of 1925 in which, though I do not remember the exact name of the trust, I do remember that the very same bank, Coutts & Co., as trustee of an estate, were authorised by EVE, J., to receive remuneration. There is, in my view, no doubt whatever about the inherent jurisdiction of this court to authorise remuneration.

Order accordingly.

R. v. YOUNG AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Parker, JJ.),
December 8, 1952]

Criminal Law—Receiving stolen property—Proof of theft.

Cohen v. March ([1951] 2 T.L.R. 402) laid down no principle of law, but the decision depended entirely on its own facts.

(1) Cohen v. March, [1951] 2 T.L.R. 402; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellants, Henry Stephen Young, and Ronald William Spiers, were convicted at the West Kent Quarter Sessions of receiving metal and were sentenced to nine months' imprisonment and three years' corrective training, respectively. The ground of the appeal was that, the property not having been identified and Young having given an explanation of where he found it, there was no evidence on which the jury could find that the property was stolen.

Dorothy Dix for the appellants.

R. I. S. Bax for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.

The appellants were convicted at the West Kent Quarter Sessions of receiving stolen metal. There were four counts, two of larceny and two of receiving against each of them. The first two counts had reference to 143 lb. of brass and phosphor bronze. The second two counts related to some lead hammers and a brass bearing bush, which were identified as the property of a particular firm, and no point arises about them. On the first two counts it is suggested that there was no evidence against the appellants because the property was not identified.

The police went to the premises of the appellant, Spiers, and said they were looking for metal, which he denied having. They then found this metal hidden away and Spiers said, which very likely was true, that he had paid the appellant Young £5 for it the day before. When Young was seen, he said that he had picked the metal from a dump. At the trial he went into the box and swore that it had not been stolen, but it has been laid down over and over again that the circumstances of a case may justify a jury in coming to the conclusion that there is a larceny or receiving of the property. In the present case the metal was new, untarnished, and recently milled, and there was a considerable quantity of it.
In those circumstances the jury found that it was stolen metal, but it is said that we ought to quash the conviction on the ground that there was no evidence.

Reliance is placed on Cohen v. March (1), which was a case in which there had been a charge in respect of some stolen razor blades and the court came to the conclusion that some untruth which had been told to the policeman when he first interviewed the prisoner did not justify an inference that the goods were stolen. I expressly said in giving judgment that the case depended entirely on its own facts. I said ([1951] 2 T.L.R. 404):

"I suppose there might be a case—circumstances differ so infinitely—in which a person makes a statement on which a jury would be justified in finding that he did know that the goods were stolen."

The court was not there intending to lay down any principle of law. They were merely dealing with the particular facts of the case, and they came to the conclusion that the evidence did not justify the jury in finding that the goods were stolen.

In the present case again they so found, and, in the opinion of the court, there was evidence on which they could do so. There was a very careful summing-up by the deputy chairman, and the jury, having seen the metal and heard the appellant, Young, tell a story on oath which they rejected, it is not surprising that they came to the conclusion that he had stolen the property. It is one thing to make some answer to a policeman, it is quite another to give evidence on oath at the trial, and, if the jury found that they disbelieved Young on oath, they might think he had a good reason for telling a perjured story and they could find him guilty of stealing. There was ample evidence from the circumstances in which the goods were found to justify the conviction of Spiers of receiving the goods knowing them to have been stolen.

The same points have been made on behalf of Young as Spiers, and, in the opinion of the court, there is no ground for interfering with the conviction. We are not laying down any point of law in this case.

Appeal dismissed.

J. H. PIGOTT & SON v. DOCKS AND INLAND WATERWAYS EXECUTIVE.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.), December 3, 4, 5, 16, 1952].

Harbour—Tug—Right of owners to perform tug services—“Shipping and unshipping goods”—Tugs employed in towing vessels into and out of dock—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (c. 27), s. 33.

In 1951 the plaintiffs, who were tug owners, extended their services to Immingham Dock, Grimsby. This dock had been constructed pursuant to the Humber Commercial Railway and Dock Acts, 1901 and 1904 (which incorporated the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847), and had become vested in the defendants by virtue of the Transport Act, 1947. In March, 1952, the defendants threatened to exclude the plaintiffs' tugs from providing tug services for vessels entering and leaving the dock and to restrict the necessary towage services to tugs belonging to, or hired by, the defendants. In an action by the plaintiffs for a declaration to establish their right to continue to provide tug services in the dock, HELD: under s. 33 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, whereby “upon payment of the rates . . . the harbour, dock, and pier shall be open to all persons for the shipping and unshipping of goods . . .”, the tug-owner, like the carrier who brought the goods to the dock for shipment or removed them when they had been unshipped, or the owner of the ship which carried the goods, performed services without which goods could not be shipped or unshipped by vessels using the port; s. 33 was made expressly subject to the provisions of any special Act, but, as the defendants were a statutory body, the powers conferred on them by the Acts of 1901 and 1904 must be treated as limiting the rights conferred and prohibiting the exercise of the more extensive rights which the defendants might have by virtue of the ownership of property, and by the proviso to s. 70 of the Act of 1901 the defendants were expressly prohibited from compelling ships to use their (the defendants') tugs; and, therefore, there was no power by virtue of which the defendants were entitled to exclude the plaintiffs from providing towage services to vessels “shipping or unshipping goods” in the dock, and the plaintiffs were entitled to the declaration which they claimed.

Cur. adv. vult.

- Dec. 16. SELLERS, J., read the following judgment. The plaintiffs are steam tug owners at Union Dock, Grimsby. The business is a family concern which has provided tug services at Grimsby since 1886, but during 1951 and this
- F year the plaintiffs extended their services to the Immingham Dock and acquired two additional tugs for the purpose. By this action the plaintiffs seek a declaration to establish their right to continue to employ their tugs to tow into and out of the Immingham Dock vessels which are using this dock for the shipping or unshipping of goods (and presumably for the embarking and landing of passengers if and in so far as it might arise, although it does not do so in the
- G present case). This right has been challenged by the defendants, who, in March, 1952, threatened generally to exclude tugs (which were for the most part the plaintiffs' tugs only) from providing tug services for vessels entering and leaving the Immingham Dock and to restrict and reserve the necessary towage services to tugs belonging to the defendants or hired by them under a formal hiring agreement. The defendants submitted a draft of such an agreement to the plaintiffs and
- H form stated that they were prepared to enter into agreement with the plaintiffs for the hire of their tugs, but, in fact, the defendants' documents appear to disclose that the defendants had little intention of calling on the services of the plaintiffs' tugs under any agreement entered into. For reasons which are not manifest in such inquiry as has taken place in this court, the defendants preferred to hire the tugs from a firm in the somewhat more remote port of Hull.

The defendants' position must be briefly stated. The Humber Commercial Railway and Dock Act, 1901, authorised the construction of a dock adjoining the existing docks at Grimsby. The Humber Commercial Railway and Dock Act, 1904, empowered the Humber Commercial Railway and Dock Company to construct a new dock and abandon that which had been authorised under the Act of 1901. Both the Acts, by s. 2 respectively, incorporated the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (except so far as expressly varied by or inconsistent with the Acts), and by s. 17 of the Act of 1904 various sections, including ss. 66 and 70, of the Act of 1901 were made to apply to the dock, railway and other works authorised by the Act of 1904 as if they had been re-enacted in that Act. Provision was made for the abandonment of the original works, and s. 53 of the Act of 1904 authorised a lease for 999 years of the new dock and works to the Great Central Railway Company. By reason of the Railways Act, 1921, and S.R. & O., 1923, No. 826, the London & North-Eastern Railway acquired the rights of both the lessors and the lessees and became owners of the whole undertaking. Then, by the Transport Act, 1947, the dock became vested in the Transport Commission, and by an executive order came under the control of the defendants to this action in 1948.

The relevant facts are few. The defendants have had for some time two tugs, each just over one hundred feet long and of approximately one thousand horse power and nine hundred horse power respectively. Up to 1951 these two tugs performed most of the towage services required at the Immingham Dock, and the tugs of the plaintiffs and others from Hull made only occasional visits, but in the last two years the export of coal from Grimsby (mainly, I apprehend, coastwise) has greatly increased. The British Electrical Authority, in particular, has been loading regular cargoes of coal from the port. In response to direct requests and because there was an obvious need for tugs, the defendants acquired two small sized tugs suitable for the type of vessels frequenting Immingham in the last two years. The plaintiffs, undoubtedly, supplied services which were required. Their tugs have been available, have frequently patrolled the river off Immingham awaiting engagement, and have been much employed. Although the traffic of the dock has greatly increased, the defendants' evidence was that their own tugs, which had for years been the only tugs operating at Immingham, had often been idle recently and had lost the trade to their competitors, who, it would seem, were supplying a more attractive service. It was admitted that the object of the exclusion of the plaintiffs' tugs which the defendants seek was and is to prevent this competition so that full employment may be provided for their own tugs. It was further admitted that there was a greater demand for towage services than the defendants could supply with their own tugs, but it was proposed to meet this by an arrangement for hiring additional tugs as and when required from Hull. The whole question, therefore, depends on whether the defendants, as the body responsible for the dock undertaking, are entitled to exclude tugs of the plaintiffs and others and to reserve towage services to their own tugs or such as they wish to hire to assist the services.

The plaintiffs claim that s. 33 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, gives them a right to take their tugs into the defendants' dock for such purposes, at least, as they have been recently doing and as, solely, they contemplate doing in the future. The section is as follows :

“ Harbour, dock, and pier to be free to the public on payment of rates.— Upon payment of the rates made payable by this and the special Act, and subject to the other provisions thereof, the harbour, dock, and pier shall be open to all persons for the shipping and unshipping of goods, and the embarking and landing of passengers.”

The section provides that the docks shall be open to all persons. It does not say to all ships or vessels, but it clearly includes them. The freedom of access is limited by the words “ for the shipping and unshipping of goods ”. In order to be open for the shipping and unshipping of goods a dock must of necessity be open for many and varied activities in and about the dock without which there could be no shipping or unshipping of goods. There could be no shipping of goods without a ship or without goods. Both must enter the dock. In ordinary circumstances, and certainly those which exist at Immingham, goods destined for shipment require a vehicle of some kind to get them to the ship's side, and in many cases, and frequently at Immingham, a ship requires a tug or tugs to get her to her berth for loading. Likewise goods have to be removed by vehicle from the quay after discharge, and ships have to be moved out after loading or discharge.

A A tidal river flows outside Immingham Dock, and a vessel entering and leaving has to allow for the effect of the current on the ship's course and manoeuvres. There is a risk of fouling the piers or jetties at the entrance, and for this and for safe movement to and from a berth in the dock a tug is frequently used by a vessel entering or leaving, and some vessels use more than one tug. For shipping and unshipping to take place in any commercial or business sense it is necessary

B to employ skilled stevedores and labourers to load, discharge, trim, stow or otherwise handle the cargo in the ship and on the quay.

In interpreting the section, I would hold that any of the persons providing any of the facilities which I have mentioned and the persons engaged in such activities were persons to whom a dock must be open if it is to be open for the shipping and unshipping of goods. I can see no real distinction between the contractor who,

C by his vehicles, brings in the goods for shipment or removes them after discharge, and the tug owner, who, by his tugs, brings in and takes out vessels engaged in the shipping and unshipping of goods, and the shipowner who brings his ship to the port aided or unaided by tugs. They are all performing services without which goods could not be shipped or unshipped by vessels using the port, and the section makes no discrimination between persons. Providing

D they resort to the docks for the shipping and unshipping of goods they are on an equality, and the shipowner does not appear to have any greater or better right than a stevedore or a haulage contractor, or, I could add, a tug owner, though the rights of all are subject to the payment of the appropriate dues which the dock authority may prescribe and subject to any regulation and control which the authority may have power, expressly or impliedly, to exercise.

E The section in question has been considered by the courts and once by the House of Lords, but the present case is not, I think, precisely covered by authority, and, having stated the view to which I incline on the construction and application of the section, I must turn to see whether authority supports or refutes it. In London & North-Eastern Ry. Co. v. British Trawlers' Federation, Ltd. (1) LORD TOMLIN, in referring to this s. 33 of the Act of 1847, said ([1934]

F A.C. 298):

"I do not think that the words 'shipping' and 'unshipping' are to be confined to the narrow operation of lifting goods from the quay to the ship or from the ship to the quay, nor do I think that the access under the section can be limited to access in person without any vehicle. It must I think be such G access with such vehicle as the party seeking it bona fide deems necessary, but it is an access always subject to be controlled by valid and operative by-laws."

LORD MACMILLAN expressed his opinion in this way (ibid., 301):

"The harbour is to be open to all for the purpose of unshipping goods. It is manifest that this must include the consequential purpose of removing H the goods unshipped, and such removal necessitates the employment of the appropriate vehicles."

Those are not the narrow interpretations for which the defendants contend, and I think they support and do not curtail the views expressed in the Court of Appeal in the same case (sub nom. British Trawlers' Federation v. London & North-Eastern Ry. Co.). I propose to read a few extracts from the judgments of each of the learned lords justices who expressed a view about s. 33 of the Act of 1847. SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1933] 2 K.B. 29):

"A great deal of discussion took place as to the true meaning of this section. Counsel for the railway company argued, without, I think, much conviction, that 'unshipping' had a very limited meaning; it only covered the operation of transferring goods from the ship to the quay, and the dock company had full control over the subsequent operation of taking the goods from the quay out of the dock premises. This argument, besides being quite unbusinesslike, gave no effect, in my opinion, to the words 'shall be open to the public'. The passenger has a right to 'embark' by entering the dock premises, proceeding to the ship and embarking thereon; he has a right to 'land' by leaving the ship and proceeding over the dock premises to their limits. The 'shipper' of goods has a right to bring them on to the dock premises, and through those premises to the ship on which they are shipped. He has a right to 'unship' them by taking them from the ship and out of the dock premises."

"I am clearly of opinion that the unshipper has a right to the use of reasonable vehicles, motor or horse-drawn, subject to reasonable regulation by the dock company as to pace, place and time, having regard to the reasonable rights of other members of the public and of the dock company. I am also of opinion that the dock company has no right to impose limitations on what the vehicles properly used in shipping or unshipping shall do outside the dock premises."

LAWRENCE, L.J., said (ibid., 47):

"In my opinion, the provision in s. 33 of the 1847 Act, that upon payment of rates, the harbour and dock shall be open to all persons for shipping and unshipping goods, necessarily implies that all persons shall have the free right to remove the goods landed on the quays by the usual commercial means."

GREER, L.J., said (ibid., 58):

"... I think it is necessarily implied in s. 33 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, that their docks and quays should be open to all such persons as were interested in the shipment or unshipment of fish to remove the fish so unshipped by usual commercial methods, including the removal by means of motor or other vehicles, or by their agents or contractors in that behalf by such vehicles."

In Dick v. Badart (2) CAVE, J., held that s. 33 must include not only ship-owners and owners of goods, but also their respective servants. He held a bye-law to exclude "lumpers" to be invalid, and said (10 Q.B.D. 393):

"A by-law that lumpers should only be employed subject to good character might be within the company's power to regulate the duties and conduct of persons employed in the dock, but a by-law by which lumpers are altogether excluded from the dock could not possibly be within it."

Another case on the section is Great Central Ry. Co. v. North-Eastern Steam Fishing Co., Ltd. (3), the report of which the defendants supplemented by a transcript of the judgment of WALTON, J. The decision is an authority for the proposition that s. 33 of the Act of 1847 does not give trawler owners a right to keep a tug inside the dock for the purpose of rendering towage services as and when required to their own trawlers which regularly go in and out. The plaintiffs did not challenge this case, and have made no claim to keep a tug inside the Immingham Dock or to ply for hire within the dock or at the jetties, which plying for hire, other than by the defendants' tugs, can only be done in pursuance of a licence issued by the dockmaster; that is bye-law 18. WALTON, J., did not seek to interpret the section except to say that it did not give the defendants, the trawler owners, the right to keep a tug inside the dock without the consent of the dock authority. In the argument of counsel for the defendants the facts were stated to be as follows (22 T.L.R. 520):

- A “The tug was required to move the trawlers sometimes to the wharf or to a place awaiting their turn to unload, or to a place where coal could be loaded, or to bring coal lighters alongside, or to move the trawlers to a place in the dock where ice (required for the purposes of the next fishing voyage) could be taken on board. The tug was necessary to move the trawlers after the boilers had been blown, in accordance with the by-laws. Such assistance was absolutely necessary and was used in the ordinary course of business”,
- B If the facts were found as they had been so stated I doubt respectfully if I would have taken the same view of them as WALTON, J., appears to have done. It would depend, I think, on the frequency with which those services were normally rendered by the tug kept in attendance, but the actual decision is as I have stated and it does not bear on the present case.

- C On behalf of the defendants certain railway cases were relied on, namely, Barker v. Midland Ry. Co. (4) and Perth General Station Committee v. Ross (5), but they are of no application. It was so held in the British Trawlers case (1). Section 33 of the Act of 1847 did not, of course, arise for consideration at all in those cases. I am, therefore, of opinion that authority does not refute the interpretation I have given to s. 33, but substantially supports it, and, as it stands, s. 33 would entitle the plaintiffs to enter the dock with their tugs in the manner which has been their recent practice and which is their present demand.
- D The section is, however, made expressly subject to any special Act, and the defendants relied, further, on their powers as owners and undertakers, and on s. 66 and s. 70 of their Act of 1901. Before considering those two sections, I will briefly refer to authority which defines the position of a statutory body in the position of the defendants. In the British Trawlers case (1) in the Court of Appeal, SCRUTTON, L.J., quoted ([1933] 2 K.B. 35) with approval the observations of LINDLEY, L.J., in London Asscn. of Shipowners & Brokers v. London & India Docks Joint Committee (6) ([1892] 3 Ch. 251), to which I need not refer more fully, as follows:

- E “The legislature has expressly conferred upon the company many powers which the company, as the owner of property, could have exercised without any express statutory authority. Whenever this is the case, the powers expressly given must be treated either as superfluous or as purposely inserted in order to define, that is, limit the right conferred, and as implying a prohibition against the exercise of the more extensive rights which the company might have by virtue of its ownership of property. That the latter is the true mode of regarding statutory powers conferred on bodies created for public purposes and authorized to acquire land for such purposes cannot, I think, admit of any doubt’.”
- F
- G

H GREER, L.J., pointed out the distinction between companies created by charter which are deemed to have all the powers of a natural person and companies created by statute. He quoted the then current edition of BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS [11th ed. p. 9 : see now 12th ed. p. 25] and the statement therein that a “statute does not create a corporation at common law. It creates a statutory creature, which cannot go beyond its statute for the reason that to the statute it owes its whole existence.”

Section 70 of the Act of 1901 of the defendants’ predecessors empowered them to build, purchase, hire or license steamers and tugs for the purpose of and in connection with the dock and to make charges in respect of the use of any such vessels provided and used, and at the end of the section there is this proviso:

"Provided always that nothing in this Act contained shall be deemed or construed to authorise the company to require any owner agent master consignee or other person having charge of any vessel lighter or river craft to employ hire or use any such steamer tug lighter or other ship or boat."

The defendants, therefore, cannot make it compulsory for ships to use their tugs, and since the use of tugs, lighters, or boats will or may from time to time be necessary, and since the port has to be open to the public for the shipping and unshipping of goods, it follows, I think, that, if tugs other than the defendants' tugs were excluded, the rights of the users of the port would be curtailed and infringed. If shipowners wished to use the port at all, and if tug assistance was essential to enable them to do so in safety, the use of the defendants' tugs (and this would include those chartered or hired by them) would, in effect, be compulsory, and the defendants would thus achieve that which they are so definitely prohibited by the proviso from doing. Far from giving the defendants the right to exclude tugs as they now claim to do, in my opinion, s. 70 effectively prohibits them from so doing. The proviso does not refer only to the section, but also to "nothing in this Act". The proviso, therefore, refers equally to s. 66 (1) on which the defendants placed, perhaps, their greatest reliance.

Section 66 in terms gives the company powers

"With regard to the management use and regulation of the dock works of the company and the regulation and control of vessels resorting thereto"

Nowhere is an express power given to exclude tugs. It was submitted on behalf of the defendants that s. 66 (1) by implication gave that power. In the face of the proviso to s. 70, to which I have just referred, I do not find it possible to make such an implication. Section 66 (3) empowers the company to employ persons " . . . to work or remove or to discharge or load or perform any service in connection with any vessel", when there is delay or default in the working or removing of any vessel in the dock. Section 66 (1) makes these rights of the company

"Subject to the right of the owner or master of any vessel to employ his crew in the performance of any of the services" mentioned in the other three sub-sections of s. 66. The whole section gives defined powers to the company, but it does not give them exclusive powers or any power to exclude which they do not otherwise possess. In contrast, s. 82 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, which relates to meters and weighers, expressly provides that " . . . the master of any vessel, or the owner of any goods shipped, unshipped, or delivered within or upon the harbour, or dock, or pier, shall not employ any person other than a weigher or meter licensed by the undertakers"

This was referred to by CAVE, J., in Dick v. Badart (2); and see also Port of London Authority v. Cairn Line of Steamships, Ltd. (7). Similar clear clauses are to be found in many other Acts, to some of which I was referred, where some exclusive right to undertakers was intended to be given. There is no such provision here relating to tugs. The words of LORD DAVEY in Toronto (City) Municipal Corp'n. v. Virgo (8) ([1896] A.C. 93) may be applied to the present case:

"No doubt the regulation and governance of a trade may involve the imposition of restrictions on its exercise both as to time and to a certain extent as to place where such restrictions are in the opinion of the public authority necessary to prevent a nuisance or for the maintenance of order. But their Lordships think there is marked distinction to be drawn between the prohibition or prevention of a trade and the regulation or governance of it, and indeed a power to regulate and govern seems to imply the continued existence of that which is to be regulated or governed."

A In my judgment, the plaintiffs have established the right for their tugs to enter the Immingham Dock at least to the extent for which they claim, and there is no power in any statute affecting the defendants' rights which entitles the defendants to exclude tugs operating in the way the plaintiffs' tugs have been doing. The inter-departmental correspondence of the defendants to which I was referred revealed less desire on the part of those responsible for the port's administration to have the tug services at Immingham highly efficient and adequate than to stultify competition to benefit their own tugs, which, apparently, could not hold their own in a busy port. So far as I understand the position, the decision at which I have arrived is more likely to provide efficient and suitable towage services at this important port than if the defendants' claim for a monopoly had prevailed. I grant the following declaration: That upon payment of the rates made payable under the Humber Commercial Railway and Dock Act, 1901, and any statutory amendment or modification thereof the plaintiffs are entitled in the ordinary course of their business to employ their tugs in providing towage services to vessels entering or leaving Immingham Dock for the shipping or unshipping of goods and/or embarking or landing of passengers.

Order accordingly.

THOMAS v. BRITISH THOMSON-HOUSTON CO., LTD.

E [QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Havers, J.), December 3, 4, 5, 8, 1952.]

Factory—"Place" used for purpose other than processes carried on in factory—Restaurant within curtilage—Use by administrative staff—Exclusion of workmen—Dining room in restaurant occasionally used for conferences—Games room for apprentices—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 151 (1), (6).

F A factory occupied by the defendants included in its curtilage a restaurant (a separate building comprising three dining rooms which were used by executive and administrative employees and guests and from which workmen were excluded except to carry out duties under instructions, canteens for their use being provided in the factory itself), a dining room used by women supervisors belonging to the administrative staff, a restaurant manageress's office and store, a games room used by apprentices, and a caretaker's flat. One of the dining rooms was used occasionally for conferences between representatives of the management and shop stewards. The plaintiff, an employee of the defendants, was injured while cleaning one of the restaurant windows, and he brought an action against the defendants for alleged breaches of their duty to him under s. 26 (1) and (2) of the Factories Act, 1937.

H HELD: though the restaurant was within the curtilage of a factory, and, therefore, within the definition of a "factory" in s. 151 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, it was "solely used for some purpose other than the processes carried on in the factory" within s. 151 (6) and so was not to be deemed to form part of the factory for the purposes of the Act, and the defendants were under no duty under the Act to the plaintiff of which they were in breach.

ACTION for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

The defendants were manufacturers of electrical equipment and appliances and occupied a factory at Willesden, London, employing about 2,500 workmen. Within the curtilage of the factory, but constituting a separate building, was the Vicarage Restaurant, which comprised: on the ground floor, three dining rooms used chiefly for lunches (usually ninety a day), and occasionally for teas, by the higher executive staff, the senior staff and the sales staff (all either executive or administrative employees), and by guests. The restaurant was also used by one shop foreman only as a concession to his long service. This restaurant was not used by the workmen employed in the industrial part of the factory who had their own canteens in that part of the factory and were not permitted to enter the restaurant except to carry out some duty on instructions. One of the dining rooms was used every three months—sometimes once a month—for conferences at which representatives of the management and shop stewards met to discuss matters such as wages, welfare, and conditions of service. On the same floor was a games room reserved for apprentices being trained in the duties of the various departments (engineering, draftsmanship, manufacturing, etc.) who were paid for work on the industrial side and assisted in the production of manufactured articles. On the first floor was a flat comprising a kitchen, bedroom and dining room used by the caretaker; a dining room used by women supervisors employed by the defendants, all administrative members of the staff such as senior secretaries; and a restaurant manageress's office and store.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants as a handyman, with general duties in connection with the restaurant. While cleaning a window of the restaurant on a ladder he fell and was injured. He alleged that owing to the negligence or breach of statutory duty of the defendants the ladder moved and so caused his fall. He contended that they were negligent in that they had failed to provide a safe system of work, to make the place of employment safe, or to provide proper appliances. He submitted that the restaurant was a "factory" within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 151 (1), and that the defendants were in breach of statutory duty as follows: (i) under the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), reg. 5 (but the plaintiff did not rely on this point before HAVERS, J., in view of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Lavender v. Diamints, Ltd. (1)), and (ii) under s. 26 (1) and (2) of the Factories Act, 1937, relating to safe means of access and the provision of means for ensuring the safety of persons working where they were liable to fall a distance of more than ten feet and there was no secure foothold and hand-hold. The defendants denied that the restaurant was a "factory" within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937, or that the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, were applicable. They also denied that there was any breach of statutory duty, or that they were negligent at common law, or, alternatively, that the plaintiff's fall and injuries were due to any breach or negligence, and they alleged contributory negligence in the plaintiff.

Ruttle for the plaintiff.

Berryman, Q.C., and Anwyl-Davies for the defendants.

HAVERS, J., reviewed the evidence, found as a fact that it was impossible to determine how the accident had happened, and continued: I have to consider whether the restaurant comes within the definition of a factory in s. 151 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937. It is obviously not a factory in the dictionary sense of the word or as the word is used in ordinary language, but s. 151 provides:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, the expression 'factory' means any premises in which, or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which, persons are employed in manual labour in any process for or incidental to any of the following purposes, namely:—(a) the making of any article or of part of any article; or (b) the altering, repairing, ornamenting, finishing, cleaning, or washing, or the breaking up or demolition of any article; or (c) the adapting for sale of any article; being premises in which, or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which, the work is carried on by way of trade or for purposes of gain and to or over which the employer of the persons employed therein has the right of access or control . . . (6) Where a place situate within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory is solely used for some purpose other than the processes carried on in the factory, that place shall not be deemed to form part of the factory for the purposes of this Act, but shall, if otherwise it would be a factory, be deemed to be a separate factory."

I think the restaurant clearly comes within the first part of s. 151 since it is within the close, curtilage, or precincts of a factory and, therefore, prima facie is a factory.

I now have to consider whether the first part of sub-s. (6) takes it out of that category. Is it solely used for some purpose other than processes carried on in the factory? Cardiff Revenue Officer v. Cardiff Assessment Committee & Western Mail, Ltd. (2), a decision of the Divisional Court (AVORY, TALBOT and FINLAY, JJ.), concerned a question of rating under the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 3 (1). The headnote states that:

"Printing offices and works in which a newspaper was composed, printed, and published, were included in the Special List under the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, as an industrial hereditament, and an apportionment was made of the net annual value of the hereditament according as its various parts were used for industrial or non-industrial purposes . . . ”

The second part of the finding was:

“ . . . that the annual value of the hereditament must be apportioned according to the occupation and use thereof for industrial purposes, and the occupation and use for other purposes; that those portions of the premises which were occupied and used for printing, composing, engraving, publishing and circulating were used for industrial purposes and entitled to be de-rated, but that those portions of the premises which were occupied and used for the editorial department, general administrative offices and clerical staff, advertising department, stationery counter, and returns store were used for non-industrial purposes and not entitled to be de-rated.”

AVORY, J., said this ([1931] 1 K.B. 70):

“ My opinion is that in each of these cases the items which are included under the head of ‘ Printing, composing, engraving, etc.’, are all clearly used for industrial purposes, with the exception in the Western Mail case of the item of 270 square feet which is described as a ‘ canteen ’, and in the David Duncan case with the exception of the item of 1,152 square feet which is described as ‘ mess-room and cook-house ’ . . . ”

TALBOT, J., says this (ibid., 78):

“ I do not wish to add anything to what has been already said about the details of the apportionment, but I would add one thing with the consent of my brother AVORY. I think that what he said with regard to the mess-room and cook-house in the case of David Duncan & Sons may not have been wholly unambiguous. I have his authority for saying this, and it is also my own view; I do not think that he intended to say that the mess-room and cook-house necessarily came out of the industrial part of the building. Whether they do or not must depend upon the persons for whose accommodation they are provided and used: according to whether they relate to the industrial part, the factory proper, if I may use the term, or to the clerical and editorial part of the hereditament.”

That case was followed in 1942 by London Co-operative Society, Ltd. v. Southern Essex Assessment Committee (3). The headnote reads:

“ A laundry, which was an industrial hereditament within the meaning of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, used a part of its premises as a canteen. The laundry was about three quarters of a mile from the nearest town, and it was contended that the canteen was necessary for the welfare of the workers and the efficiency of the laundry and was, therefore, occupied for industrial purposes. The canteen was not run with a view to making a profit and the employees, who alone used the canteen, were treated in every way as customers at one of the society’s retail shops. For this reason it was contended by the rating authority that the canteen was a retail shop and, as such, could not be a part of an industrial hereditament:—Held: in the circumstances the canteen was not a place used solely for some purpose other than the manufacturing process or handicraft carried on in the laundry within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, s. 149 (4), and was, therefore, part of the industrial hereditament.”

TUCKER, J., thought that the decisive element was that the canteen was essential for the welfare and efficiency of the workers engaged in the admittedly industrial part of the undertaking. That was the criterion which he applied. He said ([1941] 3 All E.R. 255):

“ The difficulty which I have felt in this case is as to whether it is not a pure question of fact with regard to which it is difficult to say that quarter sessions have come to a wrong conclusion in law, but, on the whole, I agree that, on the facts as set out, this does raise a question of law, and that, on those facts, quarter sessions came to an erroneous decision. The element in the case which to my mind is decisive is that I think that the facts as stated really show that the canteen in this particular case was a necessary and essential feature of the premises for the welfare and efficiency of the workers engaged in the industrial part of the undertaking. It is quite true that the words in the Case are that the appellants consider the canteen necessary for the welfare of the workers and that quarter sessions have not said that they consider it essential, but I think that that is really too narrow a view to be taken of those words. Having regard to the whole of the facts as set out, I think that it is apparent that in this particular case this canteen was an essential and necessary part of the factory . . .”

Street v. British Electricity Authority (4) was on rather a different point. Wood v. London County Council (5), related to a kitchen in a hospital and the headnote reads:

“The appellant, who was employed by the respondents at the Bexley Mental Hospital, met with an accident while working an electric mincer in the kitchen of that institution. Although she had been shown how to use both the machine and the plunger for pushing the meat on to the mincing-knife, she put her hand through an aperture in the guard for the purpose of dislodging a piece of meat which had become attached to the side of the hopper. The aperture was of such a size that, while it would be impossible for a man to get his hand through it, it was quite possible for a young girl to get her hand through, and, in the latter case, the guard was an insufficient protection. It was contended that the appellant had not been guilty of contributory negligence. For the respondents, it was contended that the kitchen was not a factory within the Factories Act, 1937:—Held: (i) the kitchen was not a factory within the Factories Act, 1937 . . .”

The decision of TUCKER, J., was reversed on this point. He had held that persons were employed in “‘manual labour in [a] process for or incidental to . . . (a) the making of any article [that is, mince] . . . or (b) the altering . . . of any article [that is, corned beef] . . .’”

It seems to me that, generally speaking, the ordinary work in a kitchen necessarily involves some alteration of the article. Potatoes, meat, fruit, and things like that, originally in their raw state, come out in their cooked state, and, therefore, there must necessarily be some sort of alteration in the article. In a restaurant there is always, I think, an adaptation for sale, and, of course, there are also washing-up machines, and so on. But, notwithstanding that, the Court of Appeal held on the facts that the kitchen was not a factory. MACKINNON, L.J., said this ([1941] 2 All E.R. 233):

“It is said that this was a factory by reason of s. 151 of the [Factories Act, 1937]. The headnote of that section is, ‘Interpretation of expression “Factory”’ . . . [His Lordship read the material part of sub-ss. (1) and (9)]. It is said that the plaintiff was employed in manual labour. That is true. She was employed in manual labour in a process for or incidental to that of one of the following purposes—namely, the breaking up or demolition of any article, which I think is the principal thing relied on, and is enough—the subsequent words about work being carried on for the purpose of trade or gain being cut out and rendered unnecessary to be added to the definition, because these premises were in the occupation of the London County Council, and, therefore, are within sub-s. (9).”

The learned lord justice considers other matters and points out the great difficulty there would be if the kitchen was a factory and the apparent inapplicability of a number of the sections of the Factories Act, 1937, to a kitchen of this type in a hospital, and in particular he says (ibid., 234):

" . . . I may point out that by s. 70, under the headings 'Hours and Holidays' and 'Employment of Women and Young Persons', it is provided that the period of employment shall not exceed eleven hours in any day, and shall not begin earlier than 7 a.m. nor end later than 8 p.m., or, on Saturday, 1 p.m. Those are provisions which I should think would be quite impossible to apply to the work being carried on in the kitchen of this asylum, particularly the provision that no work shall be done earlier than 7 a.m. or later than 8 p.m."

He continues (ibid., 235):

"Those are some of the extraordinary results which would follow if this kitchen was a factory, quite apart from one's surprise, from the point of view of common sense, that an ordinary kitchen (a kitchen no doubt on a very considerable scale, because there are over two thousand people to cook for) could be within the definition of a factory at all. Counsel for the plaintiff was quite consistent in his argument, because he did not shrink from agreeing to my suggestion that, if this was an ordinary little cottage hospital run by some rural district council, with perhaps two people in its small kitchen, those premises would be a factory, because there would be persons employed in manual labour in a process incidental to one of the following purposes—namely, the washing of an article, that is to say, the ordinary washing up of a few plates and dishes which had been used in the other part. I fully recognise that, in construing an Act, one is not to be deflected from giving it its proper meaning by looking at and citing absurd lengths to which the definition may drive one, but I do not think that it is improper to take into account the whole nature of these premises and the nature of the work which is going on in them. In my view, a kitchen is not within this definition of a factory by reason of the fact that dishes are washed up in a kitchen, or by reason of the fact that articles are altered, finished or cleaned in a kitchen, or by reason of the fact that articles are ornamented, as, for instance, by providing icing sugar on a cake, or parsley for a garnish for dishes. A kitchen which is carried on in a large way by people running a restaurant for the purpose of trade or gain would not, by reason of those words, become a factory within that section."

I have to take into account the whole nature of this restaurant and the work done in it.

Counsel for the plaintiff relied on Simmonds Aerocessories (Western), Ltd. v. Pontypridd Area Assessment Committee (6), a decision of the Divisional Court in which the question was whether a canteen which was restricted to the use of the appellants' employees and comprised two large dining rooms in which hot and cold meals were served, with cloak-rooms and other accommodation, was a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. Electrical machinery was used in the kitchen of the canteen. The judgment of the court (VISCOUNT CALDECOTE, C.J., MACNAGHTEN and ATKINSON, JJ.) was read by ATKINSON, J., who said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 266):

"Subject to certain exceptions specified in s. 3 (1) of the [Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928] an 'industrial hereditament' means a hereditament used and occupied as a factory or workshop, these expressions having the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901-1920. The first question, therefore, is whether this canteen is a factory or workshop. Both expressions include, inter alia, any premises wherein manual labour is exercised by way of trade, or for purposes of sale for gain, in or incidental to any of certain purposes, including the making of any article or the adapting for sale of any article. It is plain that much manual labour is exercised in the canteen for the purpose of making articles of food and for the purpose of adapting articles of food for sale; and that such labour is exercised by way of trade. The canteen is, therefore, a factory or workshop."

A It does not appear that Wood v. London County Council (5) was cited in that case.

In Hendon Corpn. v. Stanger (7) there is a reference in the course of SOMERVELL, L.J.'s judgment to Wood v. London County Council (5). SOMERVELL, L.J., says, after dealing with the ratio decidendi in Nash v. Hollinshead (8) ([1948] 1 All E.R. 380):

B "That process of reasoning was employed in Wood v. London County Council (5) by MACKINNON, L.J. The question there was whether a kitchen was a factory. A kitchen is, no doubt, a place in which things are made and altered. MACKINNON, L.J., based his decision on a consideration of the Acts as a whole. He said that, for instance, if the kitchen were a C factory, no woman or young person could be employed later than 6 p.m. and no woman could be employed on Sunday. This and other provisions, in his opinion, made it clear that kitchens were outside the Factory Acts. That being so, there does not seem to me any case or principle laid down which is in favour of counsel's argument."

D Counsel for the plaintiff cited Thorogood v. Van Den Berghs & Jurgens, Ltd. (9), of the report of which the headnote is as follows:

E "The plaintiff was employed as an electrician by the defendants, the occupiers of a factory which they used for the manufacture of margarine. Within the curtilage of the factory was a separate building which was used for maintenance work in connection with the machinery and plant in the factory. While the plaintiff was testing in this maintenance shop an electric fan which was used to extract steam in a ventilator in a room in the factory where one of the processes of the manufacture of margarine was carried on and which had been removed to the maintenance shop for repair, his hand was caught in the rotating blades of the fan and he was injured."

F DEVLIN, J., dismissed the action, holding that the maintenance building was a separate factory, but the Court of Appeal reversed that, holding that it was not a separate factory, but was a part of the factory. My attention was called to the judgment of COHEN, L.J. ([1951] 1 All E.R. 685), where he said:

G "It is not disputed that the defendants' margarine factory is a factory within the first part of that definition [in s. 151 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937], but the defendants contend, first, that the separate building in which repairs to machinery are carried out—I shall refer to it henceforth as the 'engineering shop'—is to be deemed to be a separate factory by reason of s. 151 (6) . . ."

H Then he deals with the process by which the learned judge arrived at his conclusion (ibid., 686):

"DEVLIN, J., recognised that, if the case cited [London Co-operative Society, Ltd. v. Southern Essex Assessment Committee (3)] had been a decision under the Factories Act, it would have been almost conclusive in favour of the plaintiff in the present case. He said: 'It is a decision under a Rating Act, and I do not think, paradoxical though it may sound, that a definition section which is common to two Acts is necessarily to be given the same meaning in both. The way in which sections taken from an earlier Act should be construed in the later Act has been the subject of varying judicial comment'. He then proceeded to consider a number of authorities and came to the conclusion that he had a free hand. In none of the cases he cited, however, were any words so definite as 'shall have the same meaning' used."

I do not think I need deal with the passage which considered the question of construction on the principle that the Act imposed penalties.

On the authority of this case counsel for the plaintiff contends that the question I have got to consider is: Was this restaurant solely used for some purpose for, or incidental to, the process carried on in the factory? I think that this case is very much a borderline matter. The main difficulty arises from two elements, namely, that the apprentices had a games room there and that one of the dining rooms was occasionally used for the purposes of these joint conferences. However, applying the test which was applied, and looking, as I do, at this question as MACKINNON, L.J., did, in Wood v. London County Council (5), regarding the complete whole and the purposes for which it was used, and also bearing in mind the test of the Divisional Court, whether it was essential for the welfare of the admittedly industrial workers, I have come to the conclusion that this is not a factory. It was, as I find, within the curtilage of the factory and comes within s. 151 (1), but I think it was solely used for some purpose other than the processes carried on in the factory. Therefore, the first part of sub-s. (6) takes it out of the statutory definition of a factory into which it was placed by sub-s. (1), and, in my view, it is not brought back by the latter part of sub-s. (6). I have followed the principles which have been enunciated by the cases, particularly Wood v. London County Council (5), and I have come to the conclusion that it cannot be said that this restaurant is a separate factory. In those circumstances, if I am correct, there is no statutory duty on the defendants under the Factories Act, 1937, towards the plaintiff.

[His LORDSHIP found on the evidence that, if he was wrong in holding that the restaurant was not a factory under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 151, the defendants had not been in breach of their statutory duty under s. 26 (1) and (2) of the Act or guilty of negligence, and that, therefore, the accident was not due to any such breach of duty or negligence. He held further that, if there was such negligence or breach of duty, there was no contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and he assessed the damages (in case of a successful appeal) at £901 6s.]

RITCHIE v. T. G. IRVING & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Morris, L.J.J.), November 26, 27, 1952.]

Ship—Winch—Duty to fence—“So far as is practicable without impeding the safe working of the ship”—Docks Regulations, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 279), reg. 26.

A While a vessel was discharging a cargo of coal at a port, a seaman employed in the ship was asked to raise the derrick to enable the stevedores to shift the coal. As he was re-winding the wire rope on to the drum of the winch, he was caught by the rope, was pulled over the guard towards the drum, and suffered injuries. The guard at the side of the drum was of the usual kind and height, and evidence was given that it would have been impossible to have put more fencing above the drum without impeding the use of the winch, while a further guard at the side of the winch would not have been practicable as it would have prevented access to that part of the ship. In an action for damages against the shipowners the seaman alleged, inter alia, a breach of the Docks Regulations, 1934, reg. 26.

C HELD: the working of the winch was part of the working of the ship; as further fencing would have made it impossible to work the winch properly, it was not practicable to fence the drum more securely “without impeding the safe working of the ship”, within the meaning of reg. 26 of the regulations of 1934; and, therefore, the shipowners were not in breach of the regulation.

D AS TO REGULATIONS RELATING TO DOCKS, see HALSBURY, 1952 Supplement, Factories and Shops, para. 1169.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of STABLE, J., made at Durham Assizes on June 9, 1952, in an action for damages for personal injuries.

The plaintiff was a seaman employed by the defendants in their coastal vessel, the Ashdene, which was used for carrying coal from Sunderland to other places. In the ship was a small winch driven by a diesel engine. On E Nov. 23, 1949, while the vessel was discharging a cargo of coal at Macduff, Banfishire, the plaintiff and another seaman, named Dowell, were asked by the stevedores to raise the derrick so that they might shift the coal in another part of the hold. This involved using the winch, at the side of which was a guard three feet, two inches, high. Below this was the drum of the winch, around which ran the wire rope used for lifting cargo. After doing what was F required, the plaintiff wished to leave the wire rope straight and even, for the convenience of the next users of the winch, and, holding the wire rope in his left hand, he stooped to pick up a hammer with which he intended to keep the wire level round the drum. At the same time he told Dowell to start the winch. In some way, which was not explained, the plaintiff's left arm was drawn towards the winch, and, in trying to free himself, he fell, his right hand G and arm were caught, and he was pulled over the guard towards the drum and injured.

The plaintiff brought an action for damages against the defendants, his claim being based (a) on negligence at common law, and (b) on a breach of the Docks Regulations, 1934, reg. 26. At the hearing of the action evidence was given on behalf of the defendants that the guard at the side of the drum H was of the usual type and that it would have been impossible to put more fencing above or at the side of the drum without impeding the use of the winch or preventing access to it. STABLE, J., held that the defendants were not liable in damages and dismissed the action, and the plaintiff appealed against that part of the judgment whereby the learned judge held that there was no breach of reg. 26 of the regulations of 1934.

Fox-Andrews, Q.C., and J. H. Robson for the plaintiff.

Berryman, Q.C., and W. G. Wingate for the defendants.

SINGLETON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The plaintiff's case is based entirely on reg. 26 of the Docks Regulations, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 279) [which were made under s. 79 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901]. Regulation 26 reads:

"All . . . friction gearing . . . shall (unless it can be shown that by their position and construction they are equally safe to every person employed as they would be if securely fenced) be securely fenced so far as is practicable without impeding the safe working of the ship . . ."

It was pointed out by counsel for the plaintiff that the learned judge's finding, and, indeed, the accident itself, showed that the drum round which the wire rope went was not securely fenced. There is no question as to that, and it is common ground that the drum was "friction gearing" within reg. 26. Therefore, it is submitted on behalf of the plaintiff that, prima facie, there was a breach of the regulation in that the friction gearing was not securely fenced. It then becomes necessary to consider the further words of the regulation:

" . . . so far as is practicable without impeding the safe working of the ship . . ."

A good deal of the argument before us has been devoted to a discussion of what is meant by the "safe working of the ship". The plaintiff was the only witness called in support of his case. He described the working of the winch, and told how the accident happened. On the defendants' side two witnesses were called, the mate of the ship (whose evidence is not important from the point of view of the discussion before this court), and a Mr. Potts, who is a consulting engineer and marine surveyor.

[His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence of Mr. Potts, who said that the winch in question was a popular make with this type of tonnage, that he had never known a winch to be more fenced than this one was, and that it could not function unless there was an open space above the drum where the wire rope went. The learned lord justice continued:] STABLE, J., had to consider whether or not a breach of reg. 26 of the regulations of 1934 was proved. The defendants had called evidence to show that this part of the ship was securely fenced "so far as is practicable without impeding the safe working of the ship", within the regulation. In his judgment, STABLE, J., having dealt with the facts, said:

"Mr. Potts said that he did not know of any winch, and had never seen any make of winch, that was more securely fenced than this was. He said that any additional protection was, in his view, not only impracticable, but would have added to the risk of anybody using the winch . . . These are, of course, practical matters, and in view of the testimony of Mr. Potts, which I accept (because it is the testimony of an expert and it seems to me to coincide with the real issue and the common-sense view of the matter), I have come to the conclusion that the defendants are protected by the words 'so far as is practicable without impeding the safe working of the ship'. In that event, the claim of the plaintiff fails and the action must be dismissed."

Regulation 26 of the regulations of 1934 is in quite different terms from some sections of the Factories Act, 1937. Section 14 (1) of the Act of 1937 provides:

"Every dangerous part of any machinery, other than prime movers and transmission machinery, shall be securely fenced unless it is in such a position or of such construction as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as it would be if securely fenced . . ."

In reg. 26 of the regulations of 1934 there are brought in the words "so far as is practicable without impeding the safe working of the ship". I am impressed by the fact that in the years that these regulations have been in operation there do not appear to have been any suggestions for dealing with a winch other than the way in which this winch was constructed and guarded, so far as the evidence shows. No evidence of an expert nature was called on behalf of the plaintiff, and the witness who gave evidence for the defendants said he had never seen any other form of guard adopted than was adopted in this case, and he was not cross-examined on that. It was suggested to him that there might be different means taken, and the learned judge thought his answers disposed of the very ingenious suggestions made by counsel for the plaintiff. One could cover up a part or the whole of the drum, but, if one did that, one could not work the winch and could not work that part of the ship, from which it follows that it is not practicable without impeding the safe working of the ship. The working of the winch is part of the working of the ship. The winch may be used as it was being used on the day of the accident, or it may be used when the ship is at sea. I do not think anyone would contend that, if a vessel is constructed for the carriage of coal, the working of the winch is not part of the working of the ship. On the evidence, you could not work the ship if the sides of this winch were raised to a greater height, and, as the witness said, if an alteration made it impossible to work the winch, it would have been equally impossible to work it safely. It seems to me to follow that the suggestions which counsel for the plaintiff made to the witness were not things which were practicable without impeding the safe working of the ship. That is the view which the judge formed on the evidence, and I think it was right. I cannot see that any breach of reg. 26 is shown, and I am satisfied that this appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] I agree that the working of the winch was the "working of the ship" in the proper interpretation of that term. In the working of the ship there might be many occasions on which it would be necessary to get at, or into, the winch. As Mr. Potts said, it would be possible to reconstruct the winch in the manner suggested by counsel for the plaintiff, but in that case one would not have a working winch, because it would be inaccessible. In other words, one could not add more fencing without impeding the safe working of the ship. I, therefore, agree that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I am in full agreement with the judgments which have been delivered.

Appeal dismissed.

WHITE v. BRISTOL AEROPLANE CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), December 11, 1952.]

Company—Alteration of members' rights—Proposal to increase capital—Issue of preference and ordinary shares to ordinary shareholders—Whether rights of preference stockholders "affected".

The capital of a company was £3,900,000, consisting of £600,000 preference stock and £3,300,000 ordinary stock, all of which was issued and fully paid. The articles of association of the company provided, by art. 68: "... all or any of the rights or privileges attached to any class of shares forming part of the capital for the time being of the company may be affected, modified, varied, dealt with, or abrogated in any manner with the sanction of an extraordinary resolution passed at a separate meeting of the members of that class ..." By art. 83 it was provided: "... preference shares or preference stock shall not confer on the holders thereof the right in respect thereof to receive notice of or to attend or vote at a general meeting unless the dividend thereon is in arrear or unless the meeting is convened to consider a resolution for winding-up or to reduce capital or to consider a resolution directly affecting their rights or privileges as a separate class ..." The company proposed to create (by way of capitalisation of undistributed profits) (a) 660,000 new cumulative preference shares of £1 each ranking pari passu with the existing preference stock, and (b) 2,640,000 ordinary shares of 10s. each ranking pari passu with the existing ordinary stock. Under the company's regulations both new issues would be distributed to existing ordinary stockholders. On the question of the rights of existing preference stockholders in relation to the proposal, no argument being advanced that their rights were modified, varied or abrogated, and no separate significance being attached to the term "dealt with",

HELD: the proposed transaction would, or might, affect the enjoyment of their rights by the preference stockholders, but their rights as such would not be affected, and, therefore, the proposed transaction could be carried out without the summoning of a separate meeting of the preference stockholders as provided for by art. 68, and without the summoning of the preference stockholders to attend and vote at a general meeting of the company in accordance with art. 83.

APPEAL by the defendant, the Bristol Aeroplane Co., Ltd., from an order of DANCKWERTS, J., dated Nov. 28, 1952.

The plaintiff, a holder of preference stock in the defendant company, sought declarations that (i) on the true construction of the memorandum and articles of association of the company the holders of preference stock were entitled to receive notice of and to attend and vote at a general meeting of the company convened to consider any resolution for increasing the capital of the company or for issuing shares of any class in such capital; and (ii) any resolution for increase of the capital of the company (save a resolution for the creation or issue of further preferential shares ranking pari passu with the existing preference stock up to the limit stated in art. 62 of the articles of association) required the sanction of an extraordinary resolution passed at a separate meeting of the holders of preference stock in accordance with art. 68 of the articles of association. The plaintiff further sought injunctions restraining the company by their servants and agents from increasing the capital in a manner inconsistent with the aforesaid rights of the preference stockholders. On motion DANCKWERTS, J., made an order restraining the company until after judgment in the action or until further order from (a) convening a general meeting to consider a resolution to increase the capital of the company by issuing £660,000 new five per cent. cumulative preference shares to rank pari passu in all respects with the existing £600,000 preference stock, and by issuing 2,640,000 new ordinary shares of 10s. each, without giving notice of such general meeting to the holders of the preference stock of the company; and (b) passing or acting on such resolution without the sanction of an extraordinary resolution passed at a separate meeting of the holders of the preference stock in accordance with art. 68 of the articles of association of the company. The company appealed against the said order.

J. G. Strangman, Q.C., and K. L. Coghlan for the company.

Gray, Q.C., and D. S. Chetwood for the preference stockholder.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The question raised in this appeal is whether, according to the proper construction of the memorandum and articles of association of the Bristol Aeroplane Co., Ltd., to which I will refer hereafter as "the company", the proposed distribution (by way of capitalisation of undistributed profits) of fully paid-up preference and ordinary shares requires (i) that a separate meeting of the existing preference stockholders should be summoned, and an extraordinary resolution in favour of the proposals passed thereat, and (ii) that the existing preference stockholders should be summoned to attend, and vote at, the general meeting of the company.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the existing capital position of the company and the effect of the proposals to increase the capital from £3,900,000 to £5,880,000, and continued:] It is, therefore, manifest that the ordinary stockholders, by obtaining between them the 660,000 preference shares of £1 each, or the equivalent amount of stock, will, on a matter which has solely to be debated by preference stockholders, have a majority over the existing preference stockholders, and it is also manifest that on a matter on which all the stockholders, preference and ordinary, debate together the new ordinary stock to be issued will swell the total number of votes that can be cast by ordinary stockholders, although it is fair to add that the proportion of votes which ordinary stockholders will have as against preference stockholders will be reduced from the present ratio of about eleven to one to the smaller ratio of about $7\frac{1}{2}$ to one.

It has been the contention of the representative of the preference stockholders, who is the plaintiff in the action—a contention which was successful in the court below—that the proposal now made falls within the ambit of certain clauses in the articles which I will read, so as to give the preference stockholders the right to a separate meeting and to attendance at the general meeting of the company. I turn, therefore, at once to the articles, and I am bound to say that the draftsman has displayed a prolixity of expression, which has, I think, given rise to the difficulty with which the company, and the court, is faced. It will be sufficient if I go at once to art. 61, observing only that by a previous article, art. 50, the words "share" and "shareholders" are later used as comprehending "stock" and "stockholders". Article 61 sets out the present capital, and indicates the rights, or some of the rights—for it is not in this respect exhaustive—which belong to the preference stockholders. After stating the figures of the original capital, the article proceeds:

“The said preference stock shall confer upon the holders thereof the right to a fixed cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of five per cent. per annum on the capital paid up or credited as paid up thereon, and the right in a winding-up to repayment of the capital paid up or credited as paid up thereon, together with all arrears and accruals of the said preferential dividend down to the date of such repayment, whether earned or declared or not, before any return of capital is made on the ordinary stock or shares, but shall not confer any further right to participate in profits or assets.”

There follows a number of clauses dealing with increase of capital, of which the most important is the next clause, art. 62, which I will read in full:

“The company may from time to time, in general meeting, whether all the shares for the time being authorised shall have been issued, or all the shares for the time being issued shall have been fully called up or not, increase its capital by the creation of new shares, such aggregate increase to be of such amount and to be divided into shares of such respective amounts as the general meeting resolving upon the creation thereof shall direct. Subject and without prejudice to any rights for the time being attached to the shares of any special class, any shares in such increased capital may have attached thereto such special rights or privileges as the general meeting resolving upon the creation thereof shall direct, or, failing such direction, as the directors shall by resolution determine, and in particular any such shares may be issued with a preferential, deferred or qualified right to dividends or in the distribution of assets and with a special or without any right of voting. No shares shall be issued so as to rank in priority to the preference stock referred to in art. 61 either as to dividend or capital, without the sanction of an extraordinary resolution passed at a separate meeting of the holders thereof in manner provided in art. 68; but preference shares may without any such sanction be created and issued so as to rank pari passu therewith, provided that the total nominal amount of the preference capital for the time being issued shall not exceed the total nominal amount of the ordinary capital for the time being issued and outstanding.”

Article 63 provides for shares being offered to the existing members in a particular manner. Article 64 provides:

“Subject to any directions that may be given in accordance with the powers contained in the memorandum of association or these articles, any capital raised by the creation of new shares shall be considered as part of the original capital, and as consisting of ordinary shares, and shall be subject to the same provisions with reference to the payment of calls, transfer, transmission, forfeiture, lien and otherwise as if it had been part of the original capital.”

Article 68 bears the familiar heading: “Modification of rights”, and is as follows:

“Subject to the provisions of s. 72 of the [Companies Act, 1948] all or any of the rights or privileges attached to any class of shares forming part of the capital for the time being of the company may be affected, modified, varied, dealt with, or abrogated in any manner with the sanction of an extraordinary resolution passed at a separate meeting of the members of that class. To any such separate meeting all the provisions of these articles as to general meetings shall . . . apply . . .”

The Companies Act, 1948, s. 72, relates to the right of holders of special classes of shares to apply to the court in certain circumstances where variation of their rights is proposed. That section does not apply in the present case.

Next I must refer to art. 83, and we now pass from the first point—whether there must be a separate meeting—to the second point—whether the preference stockholders are entitled to be present, and to vote, at the general meeting. Article 83 reads:

A “ Subject to any special rights or restrictions for the time being attached to any special class of shares in the capital of the company, on a show of hands every member personally present shall have one vote only, and B in case of a poll every member present in person or by proxy shall (subject as hereinafter provided) have one vote for every share held by him or in the case of the said preference stock one vote for every £1 of preference stock held by him or in the case of the said ordinary stock one vote for every ten shillings of ordinary stock held by him: Provided that preference
C shares or preference stock shall not confer on the holders thereof the right in respect thereof to receive notice of or to attend or vote at a general meeting unless the dividend thereon is in arrear or unless the meeting is convened to consider a resolution for winding-up or to reduce capital or to consider a resolution directly affecting their rights or privileges as a separate class . . . ”

The only other articles to which I need allude are art. 131 and art. 132. Article 131, under the heading of “ Dividends and reserve fund ”, provides:

D “ Subject to any rights or privileges for the time being attached to any shares in the capital of the company having preferential, deferred or other special rights in regard to dividends, the profits of the company which it shall from time to time be determined to distribute by way of dividend shall be applied in payment of dividends upon the shares of the company in proportion to the amounts paid up thereon respectively ”

E as therein stated. Article 132 provides:

“ The directors may, with the sanction of a general meeting, from time to time declare dividends . . . ”

Finally, it is under art. 139 that the proposed scheme of capitalisation is intended to be carried through, but I need not read that article. From what I have read it will be observed that the rights of the preference stockholders consist, first,
F of the right to priority of the dividend of five per cent. on the paid up capital—i.e., in priority to any dividend paid to ordinary stockholders; secondly, of the right to repayment, on a winding-up, of capital and unpaid dividends on their shares before anything is distributed to the ordinary stockholders; thirdly, of a qualified right to attend meetings and to vote. Their voting rights by reference to the amount of capital paid up are half those of the ordinary stockholders, G and they are only entitled to influence the transactions of the company at meetings at which it is proposed to deal with subject-matters of the kind mentioned in art. 83. They have also certain special rights to be separately summoned in case there is anything to be done affecting, modifying, varying, dealing with or abrogating in any way their other rights or privileges.

H Those being the relevant articles, the question shortly is: Will the effect of this proposed distribution, if carried out, be to “ affect ” the rights of the preference stockholders? I can state it thus briefly, because counsel for the preference stockholder, has not sought to make any distinction between “ rights ” and “ privileges ”, and he has, in view of certain authorities which I shall mention later, not contended that the proposals operate, or would operate, to “ modify ” or “ vary ”, still less to “ abrogate ”, the existing preference stockholders’ rights, and, finally, counsel for the preference stockholder does not attach any separate significance to the words “ dealt with ”.

The argument for the preference stockholder, in its briefest form, is that this word "affect", particularly when followed at the end of the collection of words which I have mentioned by the phrase "in any manner", is a word of the widest import, and, therefore, it must be taken to cover, and as having been intended to cover, a transaction which, though not in any way modifying or varying the rights, would in some way otherwise affect them, and, as junior counsel for the preference stockholder added in his few observations following those of his learned leader, if it has a meaning of that kind, the precise method whereby the result is arrived at cannot matter. On the other side it has been argued that this formula is one of some antiquity—or the substance of it is—that there is authority for the view that no such broad and significant meaning should be given to the word "affected", and, further, that to give so broad a meaning to that word is not consistent with the inevitable implications of other parts of these regulations, particularly art. 62 and art. 64. The learned judge came to the conclusion that the plaintiff's contentions were well-founded, and he granted injunctions to restrain the company from carrying out their proposed scheme of increase of capital and distribution of new shares without first having a separate extraordinary meeting of the preference stockholders and also summoning the preference stockholders to the general meeting of the company. In so holding he followed an earlier decision of his own in Re John Smith's Tadcaster Brewery Co., Ltd. (1), an appeal from his decision in which case is now pending in this court. The learned judge, in the latter case—as, indeed, I think, DANCKWERTS, J., did in the present case—expressed the view that the matter was not free from difficulty. Nor, indeed, is it, and that is as the result, I venture to repeat, of the use of a multiplicity of words without, perhaps, ever considering what their significance, singly or in conjunction, might be. But with all respect to the learned judge, I have come to a conclusion different from that which he entertained. I think, approaching this matter for the moment as a matter of construction of these articles, and without reference to these earlier authorities, that one cannot sensibly give to this word "affected" the wide meaning for which the plaintiff has contended.

It is necessary, first of all, to note—although on this matter counsel for the preference stockholder has not argued to the contrary—that what must be "affected" are the rights of the preference stockholders. The question then is: "Are the rights which I have summarised 'affected' by what is proposed?" It is said in answer—and, I think, rightly said—"No, they are not. They remain exactly as they were before. Each one of the manifestations of the preference stockholders' privileges may be repeated without any change whatever after, as before, the proposed distribution." It is, no doubt, true that the enjoyment of, and the capacity to make effective, those rights is, in a measure, affected, for, as I have already indicated, the existing preference stockholders will be in a less advantageous position on such occasions as entitle them to register their votes, whether at general meetings of the company or at separate meetings of their own class, but there is, to my mind, a sensible distinction between an affecting of the rights and an affecting of the enjoyment of the rights or the stockholders' capacity to turn them to account, and that view—again I am referring still to the construction of these regulations—seems to me to flow necessarily from certain other articles that I have read.

Let me take first of all art. 62. It is divided, so to speak, into three parts. The first indicates that the company may from time to time in general meeting increase the share capital by creating new shares. Up to that stage, no particular characteristics or rights are attached to the new shares created, and, should nothing else be done to give them special character, art. 64 automatically makes them ordinary shares. As a matter of construction, so far, of the article, I find it impossible to hold at that stage that increasing the capital by creating new shares involves an "affecting" of the preference stock—though, of course, if you analyse the matter sufficiently, it is obvious that the result of so doing in some measure, for better or for worse, touches the way in which in the future preference stockholders may turn to account that which they have. The second part of art. 62 introduces for the first time the warning that what follows is without prejudice to the rights of "special classes", by which it is conceded that at least for present purposes the preference stockholders are meant. Without prejudice to them, shares in such increased capital may have attached to them special rights or privileges as to dividends, and in particular as to voting. There, again, that second part seems to me to indicate that it is only when one gives to these new shares special privileges of one kind or another, you may—it does not follow that you must—come into conflict with the rights attached to the existing special classes, so that this second step may only be capable of being taken after you have done what has to be done in the way of calling a separate meeting and so forth.

The matter is carried still further by the third, and perhaps most significant, part of the article:

"No shares shall be issued so as to rank in priority to the preference stock . . . without the sanction of an extraordinary resolution passed at a separate meeting of the holders thereof in manner provided in art. 68 . . ."

But the article goes on to provide:

"but preference shares may without any such sanction be created and issued so as to rank pari passu therewith," subject only to the limitation that one must not go on doing so if the result is that the total amount of paid up preference capital exceeds that of the ordinary capital, and so, I assume, leaves to the preference stockholders an insufficient basis, so to speak, of security in the ordinary issued capital.

Without going into too much detail, I cannot make those provisions consistent with the view that any variation which in any manner touches or affects the value of the preference stock or the character or enjoyment of any of the holders' privileges is within the contemplation of art. 68. I think counsel for the preference stockholder had to admit, going still further, that even a deliberate increase of new ordinary shares to rank pari passu with the existing ordinary shares would on this view of it mean separate meetings of the existing preference stockholders and also of the existing ordinary stockholders. I cannot think that such a result ought to be attributed to articles which are, after all, fairly well known as common form. Such a result seems to me to strike at the usual conception of the relations, in a company of this sort, of preference and ordinary stockholders, where the former take their rights subject always to the normal incidence of the company's right to increase its capital. I also obtain some assistance from art. 83, in two ways. First, with regard to the actual wording—though in documents of this sort I do not attach too much importance to the precise language. Instead of a repetition of the phrase "may be affected, modified, varied, dealt with, or abrogated", etc., one finds the single phrase "directly affecting", which leads me to the conclusion that "directly affecting" in this article and in this context cannot have so broad and general a meaning as the plaintiff contends. Secondly, I notice that a resolution to reduce capital is regarded as in itself such as to require the summoning of the preference stockholders to the meeting, and, therefore, as something distinct from a resolution "directly affecting" their rights. I do not also forget the point made by counsel for the company that, on the broadest view, even the payment of dividend might affect the rights of a preference stockholder. I quite agree that the court ought not, unless it is unavoidable, to reduce to mere futility a particular word which has apparently been deliberately introduced, but I do not think it is necessary to go so far.

Examples were put in the course of the argument, which I think might well answer the question: To what does this word "affecting", as distinct from "variation", apply? For example, it might be, though I express no view on it, that a resolution aimed at increasing the voting power of the ordinary stockholders by doubling it, giving them twofold their present power, without otherwise altering any other of the privileges or rights attached to any class, might be said to be something so directly touching the position, and, therefore, the rights, of the preference stockholders, having regard to the statement of the voting rights in art. 83, as to be within the ambit of art. 68, albeit that there was no variation of their own individual rights. That case is not before us, and I mention it only to indicate that I am not persuaded that the conclusion which I have indicated involves the result that no meaning, as distinct from variation, can be given to the word "affected".

I must say a word now about the earlier cases. There was nothing in the Tadcaster case (1) to correspond with the second and third parts of art. 62 in the present case, and counsel for the company pointed out other differences to which I need not allude. I go to the case which may be said to have been the founding authority in cases of this sort, a case before ASTBURY, J., Re Mackenzie & Co., Ltd. (2) which was decided in 1916. In that case, there were, as here, preference shareholders or stockholders and ordinary shareholders or stockholders. The former had the right to a preferential dividend, but they had no right to priority as to capital in a winding-up. The company proposed to reduce its capital and to make the reduction a rateable reduction on all the shares, preference and ordinary alike. The objection was taken that the written consent of the preference shareholders as a special class was required. The relevant clause in the memorandum there was:

"Subject to any express provision to the contrary made upon the creation of any class of shares, all or any of the special rights, privileges and advantages attached to any class may, with the sanction in writing of the holders of two-thirds of the issued shares of the class (but shall not without such sanction), be altered, modified, dealt with or affected in any manner whatsoever . . ."

Article 64 followed in substantially the same form:

"All or any of the special rights, privileges and advantages attached to any class of shares may, with the sanction in writing of the holders of two-thirds of the issued shares of the class, but shall not without such sanction, be altered or modified, dealt with, or affected, in any manner whatsoever."

The argument, it is true, appears to have proceeded solely on the two words "altered" and "modified". I observe, however, having regard to the argument of the leading counsel who appeared for the opposing preference shareholders, that, so far as I can see, the learned judge was most careful in his judgment to avoid using any one of the four words used in the article, but, if the argument of the company here is correct, I should have thought it inevitable that the rights of the preference shareholders there were in a broad sense "affected". True, the rights as stated in the article remained, viz., the right to receive four per cent. on the nominal amount of the capital from time to time paid up or credited as paid up, but, in the business sense, in truth and in substance, the effect of what was done was to reduce by an amount corresponding to the amount of the reduction the total dividends of the preference shareholders. The learned judge rejected the argument (without, as I have said, referring to any one of the four words used in the article) that the preference shareholders were entitled to be required to sign the necessary consent.

The other case which has been referred to was decided in this court, viz., Greenhalgh v. Arderne Cinemas, Ltd. (3). In that case the plaintiff in the action had, as part of a transaction for advancing money to the defendants, obtained the issue to him of a number of what were called "1941 2s. shares", and it was one of the terms of the original arrangement that each of those shares should, as regards voting, rank pari passu with the other issued ordinary shares of the company, which happened to be 10s. shares, so that, in effect, so long as that arrangement stood in relation to the actual paid-up capital, the plaintiff had five times as many votes as the other shareholders. The proposal on behalf of the other shareholders was to reverse the situation by sub-dividing the existing shares, so that at a stroke their voting power was made five times as great. Not unnaturally the plaintiff strongly objected, and among other points taken by him was the point that they could not do so without first calling a separate meeting of the 1941 2s. shareholders, treating them as a separate class, and the court proceeded to consider that matter on the footing that the 1941 2s. shares were a separate class. It is important to observe that the relevant modification of rights clause was the much less verbose clause taken from Table A (reg. 4). That provided:

"If at any time the share capital is divided into different classes of shares, the rights attached to any class . . . may . . . be varied with the consent in writing of the holders of three-fourths of the issued shares of that class, or with the sanction of an extraordinary resolution passed at a separate general meeting of the holders of the shares of the class."

So that all this court had to consider was whether this proposal of the other ordinary shareholders in the company involved a variation (the terms "altered", "modified", "affected", "disturbed", "dealt with", or "abrogated" were not employed) of Mr. Greenhalgh's rights (the article did not also refer to "privileges" or "advantages") as a substantial holder of 1941 2s. ordinary shares. This court said not, but counsel for the preference stockholder in the present case has laid emphasis on the circumstance that LORD GREENE, M.R., who delivered the leading judgment, apparently did not observe that the word "affected" appeared in the Mackenzie case (2).

I make two references to LORD GREENE's judgment where he said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 517):

"Several authorities have been cited, but the only one, I think, which throws any light on the matter is Re Mackenzie & Co., Ltd. (2), a decision of ASTBURY, J., which I do find, up to a point, helpful. It was a case of a petition for reduction of capital, and under the memorandum and articles the only right of the preference shareholders was to have a fixed cumulative preferential dividend of a certain amount. A rateable reduction of all the shares, preference and ordinary, was proposed to be carried out, subject to the sanction of the court. All the shares, preference and ordinary, suffered the rateable reduction, and the result of that was that the dividend rights of the preference shareholders were substantially affected because, by reducing their capital, as they were only entitled to a fixed cumulative preferential dividend on the nominal amount of their capital for the time being paid up, it reduced the dividend accordingly, although the dividend still remained at four per cent. That reduction operated in a certain way to the benefit of the ordinary shareholders, who were entitled to what is commonly called the equity . . . ASTBURY, J., pointed out that the only dividend right was a right to four per cent. per annum on the nominal amount of the capital from time to time paid up or credited as paid up, and that, under the articles, the company had power to reduce its capital. He then said ([1916] 2 Ch. 450, at p. 457): 'The result of the memorandum and articles shortly is this. Subject to the right of the company to reduce its capital by the votes of the ordinary shareholders in any manner sanctioned by statute these preference shares are to be of the denomination of £20 each, and the only special right, privilege, or advantage attached to those shares is a cumulative four per cent. preferential dividend on the nominal amount of capital from time to time paid up or credited as paid up thereon'."

Later, LORD GREENE, M.R., said (ibid.):

"As VAISEY, J., pointed out, and I agree, the effect of this resolution [in the Greenhalgh case (3)] is, of course, to alter the position of the 1941 2s. shareholders. Instead of Greenhalgh finding himself in a position of control, he finds himself in a position where the control has gone, and to that extent the rights of the 1941 2s. shareholders are affected, as a matter of business. As a matter of law, I am quite unable to hold that, as a result of the transaction, the rights are varied; they remain what they always were . . ."

I cannot attach such importance to the use by LORD GREENE, M.R., of the word "affected" as to lead me to conclude that the authority of the Greenhalgh case (3) depends entirely on the circumstance that in the relevant clause the only word which had to be construed was "varied". I agree that LORD GREENE, M.R., used the word "affected", but I draw attention to the fact that the distinction was not between "affected" and "varied", but between "affected as a matter of business" and "varied as a matter of law".

I have no doubt, as I have already indicated, that, on a sufficient analysis, what is suggested in the present case will "affect" the preference stockholders "as a matter of business", but we are concerned with the question whether the rights of the preference stockholders are "affected", not as a matter of business, but according to the meaning of the articles when construed according to the rules of construction and as a matter of law. I further think that, when regard is had to the fact that the word "affected" was in the article in the Mackenzie case (2), it would be wrong for this court now to say that its presence in this set of articles (and it may be, I dare say, that it has appeared in many others before and since Mackenzie (2)) has so restrictive an effect on the ordinary shareholders in the company that separate meetings of preference stockholders and shareholders would have to be held whenever it could be shown that as a matter of business, on a close analysis, that which was proposed would, or might, affect in some degree the value of the preference shares or the way in which the rights conferred on them by the regulations of the company were to be enjoyed. The result is that, with all respect to the learned judge, I have come to the conclusion that the preference stockholders' claim in this case is not well-founded, or, perhaps, I should say, as this is an appeal by way of a motion, that the plaintiff has not satisfied me that any such interlocutory relief as he asks for on the motion ought to be granted to him. In those circumstances the appeal will be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. I only add a word or two, partly because we are differing from DANCKWERTS, J., and partly because I imagine that this case may have a certain importance in commercial circles and among practitioners in company law. The plaintiff's case is that the rights attached to the class of preference stockholders whom he represents are being "affected" within the meaning of art. 68 of the company's articles of association, and plainly, therefore, the first question one has to ask is: "Of what do those rights consist?" because until one knows what the rights are it is impossible to form a view whether they are being affected.

The rights attached to a class of shares within the meaning of such an article as this means attached by the resolutions creating such shares or by the articles of association of the company as amended from time to time by any relevant resolution, and, accordingly, one has to look to such resolutions and to the constitution of the company to find out what the rights of the preference stockholders are.

The rights which attach to the preference stockholders in the present case are those conferred by art. 61 and art. 83, and the only relevant article for present purposes is art. 83. Under that article it is provided that on a poll every member present in person or by proxy shall have one vote for every share held by him, or, in the case of the preference stock, one vote for every £1 of preference stock held by him. It is suggested that, as a result of the proposed increase of capital, that right of the preference stockholders will in some way be "affected", but I cannot see that it will be affected in any way whatever. The position then will be precisely the same as the position now, viz., that the holder of every £1 of preference stock will have on a poll one vote for every £1 of preference stock held by him. It is quite true that the block vote, if one may so describe the total voting power of the class, will or may have less force behind it because it will pro tanto be watered down by reason of the increased total voting power of the members of the company, but by the constitution of the company no particular weight is attached to the vote as distinct from the right to exercise the vote, and certainly no right is conferred on the preference stockholders to preserve anything in the nature of an equilibrium between their class and the ordinary stockholders or any other class.

During the course of the discussion I asked counsel for the preference stockholder whether, if his argument were sound, it would not be true to say that the rights of ordinary shareholders would be affected by the issue of new ordinary capital on the ground that every one of the considerations on which he was relying would be present in such a case. The votes of the existing shareholders would be diminished in power, and they would have other people with whom to share the profits and, on a winding-up, the capital assets. In answer to that he was constrained, I think rightly, to say that was so, but, in my opinion, it cannot be said that the rights of ordinary shareholders would be affected by the issue of further ordinary capital. Their rights would remain just as they were before, and the only result would be that the class of persons entitled to exercise those rights would be enlarged. I cannot help thinking that a certain amount of confusion has crept into this case between rights, on the one hand, and the result of exercising those rights, on the other hand. The rights, as such, are conferred by resolution or by the articles, and they cannot be affected except with the sanction of the members on whom those rights are conferred, but the results of exercising those rights are not the subject of any assurance or guarantee under the constitution of the company and are not protected in any way. It is the rights, and those alone, which are protected, and for the reasons which my Lord has given, and, in view of what I have myself said, the rights of the stockholders will not, in my judgment, be affected by the proposed resolutions. Accordingly, I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), December 17, 1952.]

Landlord and Tenant—Shop—Renewal of tenancy—Builders and decorators—“Retail trade or business”—Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951 (c. 38), s. 10 (1), s. 20 (1).

Premises were occupied wholly for business premises under a tenancy by the applicants, a firm the main part of whose business was that of builders and decorators. On an application by the firm under s. 10 (1) of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, for a new tenancy,

HELD: as the applicants' business involved their doing the greater part of their work on their customer's property and not on their own premises, they could not be said to occupy their premises "mainly for the purposes of a retail trade or business" within the meaning of s. 20 (1) of the Act, and, therefore, the premises were not a "shop" within that sub-section, and the applicants were not entitled to apply for a new tenancy under s. 10 (1).

APPEAL by the landlords, the Ve-Ri-Best Manufacturing Co., Ltd., against an order of His Honour JUDGE BLAGDEN at Westminster County Court, dated Oct. 8, 1952, granting the tenants, M. & F. Frawley, Ltd., a new tenancy under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, s. 10 (1).

The judge held that the tenants' business, carried on in the premises in question, of a builder and decorator was wholly or mainly a "retail trade or business" within the meaning of s. 20 (1) of the Act of 1951, and, therefore, the premises were a "shop" within that sub-section. He further held that the tenants were entitled to a new tenancy of the premises under s. 10 of the Act.

I. S. Warren for the landlords.

Asher for the tenants.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of His Honour JUDGE BLAGDEN. An application was made by the tenants, under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, s. 10 (1), which provides:

"The provisions of this Part of this Act shall have effect for enabling the occupier of a shop under a tenancy to which this section applies (hereinafter referred to as 'the expiring tenancy') to apply to the court for, and subject to the provisions of this Act to obtain, the grant of a new tenancy . . ."

The tenants, whose business is that of builders and decorators, maintain that they were within that provision. The only question with which we are concerned is whether the premises were a shop within the meaning of the Act. Under s. 20 (1) of the Act

“ ‘shop’ means premises occupied wholly for business purposes, and so occupied wholly or mainly for the purposes of a retail trade or business.”

By the same section,

A “ ‘retail trade or business’ has the same meaning as in the Shops Act, 1950, except that it does not include the sale of intoxicating liquor for consumption on the premises or the sale of meals or refreshments in premises which are licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquor for consumption on the premises . . . ”

The definition in the Shops Act, 1950, s. 74 (1), reads as follows:

B “ ‘retail trade or business’ includes the business of a barber or hair-dresser, the sale of refreshments or intoxicating liquors, the business of lending books or periodicals when carried on for purposes of gain, and retail sales by auction, but does not include the sale of programmes and catalogues and other similar sales at theatres and places of amusement.”

C The learned judge had a “view”, which we have not had the advantage of having, but he sets out very clearly the nature of the premises and the business of the tenants. They have at all material times had a notice up: “Builders’ materials supplied by retail”. Over the door there is a key and the words: “Keys cut”. Entering the premises, one finds a small room where there are pots of paint, packets of cement, and paint brushes, which are available for sale to the general public. There is no counter, but the goods are displayed on a table and in a cupboard under the table. The rest of the premises is not open to the public and is very much greater in area. Those non-public rooms D could fairly be described as offices, though a certain amount of material is kept there and work is done in one of them in cutting keys. In the basement bulkier materials are stored. The tenants are described on their notepaper as builders and decorators. Apart from cutting keys, they also do plumbing and electrician’s work and some sign writing. They have been there for some E seventeen years.

It is not suggested on the part of the tenants that this business of selling building materials to the public is a substantial or appreciable part of the business done by them, and, if the issue whether this was a shop or not depended on this activity, it could not be said that these premises were used wholly or mainly for the purposes of that trade. The learned judge has decided that F the business carried on by the tenants as builders and decorators was the carrying on of a “retail trade or business” within the meaning of the definition, and so the case turns on the construction of those words. It was argued that the word “includes” as it appears in s. 74 (1) of the Shops Act, 1950, is normally used when something is to be included which manifestly would be outside the words to be defined but for the definition. I do not accept that, nor do I wish G to lay down any general observation as to what the word “includes” may mean in every context. But in the present context I think it is plain that what follows “includes” are activities about which, at any rate, there might have been disputes whether they came within the words “retail trade or business”. Undoubtedly, the word “retail”, which governs the two words which follow, does primarily suggest the selling of goods rather than the selling of services.

H In the course of the argument a very wide construction of this phrase was put forward on these lines. It was said, rightly, that the word “business” is a word of very wide import, possibly covering every activity for profit or gain. Then it was said, though I do not agree with this, that the word “retail” means any business activity in which the person carrying it on comes in contact with and supplies services or other facilities to members of the public as distinct from persons in trade. Then it was said that those two matters ought to be read into this tripartite expression “retail trade or business”. The learned judge pointed out that that appeared to cover things which would seem to be a long way from the word with which one starts, which is "shop". The general character of the word to be defined must colour the definition. So far as I can see, the wide construction put forward would include bankers, though one need not pause to consider how far it would go because it is, to me, plain that, if in their context the words "retail trade or business" were to be given a construction of that kind, the definition in the Shops Act, 1950, was wholly unnecessary. A

We were referred to the history of the matter and how the expression "retail trade or business" came to appear in the statutes which have dealt with shops and are now consolidated in the Act of 1950. I do not find it necessary to refer in detail to that, but I think the history supports the argument that these words are not capable of the wide construction suggested. It seems to me that, if the word "business" is to be regarded as extending the meaning beyond the buying and selling of goods, the extension (and we have examples of them in the definition) is of this kind. There are cases, and the barber is a good example, where, although no chattel may be sold, services are sought and received at premises which are normally and naturally described as a shop. The same would apply, properly, to the business of lending books, but a builder and decorator seems to me to be in a different category altogether. His services are rendered normally outside his own premises. The learned judge at the conclusion of his judgment gave as an example a waterpipe bursting in somebody's house and someone being sent to the builder's premises in order that workmen might come to the house and repair the pipe. In my view, one is there in a different area from a "shop", whether according to the narrow definition of the word or according to the extended purview conferred by the definition in the Shops Act, 1950. It is unnecessary in the present case to decide whether the word "business" in the Act of 1951 would bring in other activities than those which are brought in by the express words after "includes" in the Act of 1950. I am clear that they ought not to be construed as bringing in a business such as that carried on by the tenants here, and I would allow the appeal. B C D E

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. It is worth noting that in s. 10 (2) of the Act of 1951 there is this provision:

"This section applies to a tenancy the subject of which—(a) consists of a shop, or (b) consists of a shop and of living accommodation occupied wholly or mainly by the tenant or by a person who is employed by the tenant for the purposes of the retail trade or business carried on in the shop . . ."

That provision is, perhaps, indirectly relevant as showing that the Act contemplates that the retail trade or business by virtue of which the shop qualifies as such under the definition will be carried on in the shop. My Lord has already referred to the facts found by the learned judge, which come shortly to this. The tenants' business is that of builders and decorators. In the premises in question there is an outer room where pots of paint or size, packets of cement, paint brushes, and the like, are available for sale to the general public. They also advertise themselves as key cutters and locksmiths. So far as the sale to the public of pots of paint and so forth is concerned, the learned judge found—and this was clearly in accordance with the evidence—that that part of the tenants' activities formed an insignificant proportion of the business carried on on the premises and that the main part of the business consisted in conducting from those premises the business of builders and decorators, receiving orders for building work, giving estimates for building work, or tendering to undertake building work, to be carried out on the site, wherever it might be, where such work was required. Accordingly, in view of the insignificant character of the trade done in the way of the sale of paint F G H and other materials the issue in this appeal resolves itself into the short question whether, on the true construction of the Act of 1951, the carrying on in the way I have indicated of a builder's and decorator's business, which consists of doing building and decorating work on sites or in houses wherever the services of the tenants are required, is the carrying on of a "retail trade or business" within the meaning of the definition.

A The expression "retail trade" clearly connotes in its primary sense a business consisting of selling goods to members of the public (as distinct from members of the trade) who resort to the shop or premises where the business is carried on to make purchases. The expression "business" may, I think, have a wider connotation than the expression "trade", the latter expression being more closely linked with transactions of purchase and sale than the expression "business". In my view, the learned judge erred in holding, as he did, that B the builder's and decorator's business here in question was a retail business because it involved doing work for the actual customer, but on the customer's property, as distinct, I suppose, from doing work for some middleman other than the individual who actually required the services for himself. So to hold, in my view, involves placing a wider meaning on the expression "retail trade C or business" than it will reasonably bear. I think that conclusion is borne out by the definition in s. 74 (1) of the Shops Act, 1950, for, if the expression "retail trade or business" had the wide significance sought to be placed on it by the tenants, it would not have been necessary to treat as doubtful cases requiring inclusion by definition the business of a barber or hairdresser, the sale of refreshments, the business of lending books, and retail sales by auction, D for all these would be included in the phrase itself without any express extension of the definition. The terms of the definition do, no doubt, suggest, and for my part I would not deny, that a business may be a retail business although it is concerned with matters other than the sale of goods, but, while I have no intention of attempting to lay down any general or exhaustive definition, it does seem to me that the adjective "retail", which is primarily applicable E to the sale of goods in the way I have mentioned, demands in its application, as it were by analogy, to businesses which consist in the sale of services rather than goods that the services rendered should be performed in circumstances comparable with those in which the ordinary retail trade in the sale of goods is normally carried on in a retail shop. For example, the business carried on in a shop where services, such as repairing shoes, or cleaning clothes, or mending watches, are rendered for customers resorting to the premises in circumstances F comparable with those in which the business of selling goods by retail to similar customers might be carried on could, I think, reasonably be held to answer the description of a "retail business". But the designation "retail" seems to me to be wholly alien to the builder's and decorator's business here in question.

G We have been referred to a number of authorities on other Acts, but I do not find it necessary to take up time by reading them. There is nothing in any of them, so far as I am aware, in any way inconsistent with the conclusion at which I have arrived on the construction of the language of this particular Act and its application to the learned judge's findings of fact. Accordingly, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

H HODSON, L.J.: I agree. The word "retail" primarily suggests the sale of goods rather than services, and when one seeks to apply the word "retail" to the sale of services one is, I think, bound to consider whether the services are rendered on the premises as, for example, in the case of a barber, or away from the premises as is the case here. The learned judge seems to have thought that that was a distinction without a difference. At the conclusion of his judgment, when discussing Ritz Cleaners, Ltd. v. West Middlesex Assessment Committee (1), he noted that counsel had sought to distinguish that case on the ground that there business was carried on wholly at the dealer's premises and in this case it was carried on mainly at the customer's premises. That, I think, is a valid distinction in considering the word "retail" and it was supported in Toogood & Sons, Ltd. v. Green (2), by LORD THANKERTON when he quoted ([1932] A.C. 674) a speech of VISCOUNT DUNEDIN ([1931] A.C. 474) in Turpin v. Middlesborough Assessment Committee & Bailey (3). Those cases were under the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, with regard to a retail shop. Speaking of garage premises, LORD DUNEDIN said:

"Now if we compare the hereditament here in question with a retail shop, do we find any common characteristics? My Lords, I think we do; for they are both buildings to which the public can resort for the purpose of having particular wants supplied and services rendered therein."

I think that supports the distinction which counsel has sought to draw and which is, I think, a valid distinction. For these reasons, and the reasons which my Lords have given, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

EAST MIDLANDS GAS BOARD v. DONCASTER CORPORATION.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Hallett, J.), December 11, 12, 1952.]

Gas—Nationalisation—Undertaking formerly maintained by local authority—Recovery of sums transferred from gas undertaking accounts to other accounts—Amounts "debited . . . in the accounts of the gas undertaking . . . and credited . . . in . . . other account"—Expenses and receipts of undertaking to be paid out of and into general rate fund—Authority directed to "show under a separate heading or division" accounts of gas undertaking—Transfers from gas undertaking section to general rate fund—Liability of authority to account to gas board for sums transferred—Finality of determination by Minister of Health—Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926 (c. xxvii), s. 71, s. 72—Gas Act, 1948 (c. 67), s. 37 (1), (2).

By the Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926, s. 71, "all money received by the corporation on account of the revenue of the [gas undertaking] shall be carried to and shall form part of the borough fund and all payments . . . made and incurred in respect of [the undertakings] shall be paid out of that fund". By the Local Government Act, 1933, s. 185, "(1) All receipts of the council of a borough . . . shall be carried to the general rate fund of the borough, and all liabilities falling to be discharged by the council shall be discharged out of that fund. (2) An account, called the 'general rate fund account', shall be kept of all receipts carried to, and payments made out of, the general rate fund." By s. 72 of the Act of 1926 the corporation were required to keep their accounts so as, "as regards the revenue account to show under a separate heading or division in respect of" their gas undertaking all receipts and payments and expenses of the undertaking. One section of the corporation's abstract of accounts for 1947-48 was described as "Gas works account" and was headed "General rate fund (gasworks section)" and it contained a revenue account. There were also a gas section ledger and gas section cash book. On Mar. 31, 1948, the defendant corporation transferred: (i) £8,487 2s. 9d., the balance of profit then appearing in the net revenue account of the gas undertaking, to their general rate fund account; and (ii) £2,144 0s. 3d., a refund of excess profits tax, then standing in the "E.P.T. post-war refund suspense account" of the gas undertaking, from that account to the corresponding account of the defendant corporation's water undertaking. On May 1, 1949, under the Gas Act, 1948, s. 17 (1), the gas undertaking was vested in the plaintiff gas board, who, on Aug. 23, 1949, claimed the payment of the two sums to them by the defendant corporation under s. 37 (1) of the Act. On July 6, 1950, the Minister of Health, after submission of the cases for the two parties under s. 37 (2), upheld the claim. In an action by the gas board to recover the sums in question, HELD: (i) the claim of the gas board against the corporation, having been made within twelve months of the vesting date under the Act of 1948 within s. 37 (2) of that Act and not having been settled by agreement, was required by s. 37 (2) to be determined by the Minister of Health, and had been so determined, and the court had no jurisdiction to decide that it was not a valid claim.

Crisp v. Bunbury (1832) (8 Bing. 394) and dictum of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in Joseph Crosfield & Sons, Ltd. v. Manchester Ship Canal Co. ([1904] 2 Ch. 135), applied.

(ii) in any event, notwithstanding the provisions relating to payments into and out of the general rate fund, the revenue account of the gas undertaking, the general rate fund account, and the two suspense accounts were not merely sections of the general rate fund, but were separate accounts, and after Feb. 10, 1947, the two sums had, without the approval of the Minister, been debited in the accounts of the gas undertaking and credited in other accounts of the corporation within the meaning of s. 37 (1) of the Act of 1948, and, therefore, were payable to the gas board under that sub-section.

ACTION for the payment of two sums alleged to be due to the plaintiffs, the East Midlands Gas Board, by the defendants, Doncaster Corporation, under s. 37 (1) and (2) of the Gas Act, 1948.

The defendant corporation were the owners of a gas undertaking, which, by virtue of the Gas Act, 1948, s. 17 (1), was, on May 1, 1949 (see Gas (Vesting Date) Order, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 392)), vested in the plaintiff gas board. On Aug. 23, 1949, i.e., within twelve months of the vesting date as required by s. 37 (2) of the Act, the board submitted a claim for two sums, alleged to be due to them under that sub-section, to the corporation, who replied to it on Sept. 2. After correspondence had passed between the parties the case for the board was put before the Minister of Health in a document of Mar. 15, 1950, the case for the corporation being put before the Minister in a document forwarded with a letter of June 6, 1950. On July 6, 1950, the Minister upheld the claim of the board who now sought to recover from the corporation the sums in question on the ground that the liability of the corporation had been finally established by the Minister's determination. The corporation contended that the Minister's determination was not conclusive as to their liability and that the claim ought to have been disallowed.

The claim related to the following transfers in the accounts of the corporation: (i) On Mar. 31, 1948, the credit balance of net profit of £8,487 2s. 9d. in the net revenue account of the corporation's gas undertaking on that date was transferred to the general rate fund account by a debit in the gas account and a credit in the general rate fund account of a larger amount which included the £8,487; (ii) Two refunds of excess profits tax in respect of revenue-producing undertakings of the corporation, one an actual cash payment and the other a deduction from a liability of the corporation to the Inland Revenue, were received by the corporation and apportioned among the revenue-producing undertakings, the sum of £2,144 0s. 3d. being apportioned to the gas undertaking and being credited in an account in the gas accounts called "E.P.T. post-war refund suspense account". On Mar. 31, 1948, that sum was transferred to the water account by a debit in the suspense account of the gas accounts and a credit in the "E.P.T. post-war refund suspense account" of the general rate fund (waterworks section) of the accounts of a larger sum which included the £2,144. No approval for these transfers had been obtained from the Minister of Health.

The board contended that the transfers represented amounts "without the approval of the Minister of Health debited . . . in the accounts of the gas undertaking" after Feb. 10, 1948, and "credited . . . in any other account of the authority", within the meaning of the Gas Act, 1948, s. 37 (1), and that the corporation were liable to pay the two amounts to the board in accordance with that sub-section. The corporation contended that under s. 71 of the Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926, and similar provisions in s. 185 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1933, the revenue of the gas undertaking was required to be transferred to and to form part of the borough fund and all payments and expenses made and incurred in respect of the undertaking were required to be paid out of that fund; that, apart from the reserve fund, there was only one fund of the corporation, the general rate fund; that the accounts related to various provisions and sections of that one fund; and that, therefore, there had been no such debiting and crediting of separate accounts as alleged.

HALLETT, J.: This is a claim by the East Midlands Gas Board against the Doncaster Corporation for two sums, £8,487 2s. 9d. and £2,144 0s. 3d. respectively. The claim is made under and by virtue of s. 37 of the Gas Act, 1948. That Act was passed by Parliament for the purpose of compulsorily acquiring the gas undertakings of the country, whether owned by private companies or by local authorities, and vesting them in certain gas boards, of which the plaintiffs are one. At the time when the Act was introduced the vesting date remained to be fixed, and it was ultimately fixed as May 1, 1949, by the Gas (Vesting Date) Order, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 392). The Bill had its first reading on Jan. 23, 1948, and that is, no doubt, the reason why that date appears in s. 36 of the Act, to which I shall presently refer. When the Bill was first introduced it did not contain s. 37, but on the second reading, which took place on Feb. 10, 1948, the Minister of Fuel and Power intimated that he intended to introduce certain further provisions with respect to the transfer of assets before the vesting date, and that was the reason why the date, Feb. 10, 1948, ultimately appeared in s. 37.

It is reasonably clear that, if the new area gas boards were going to be possessed on the vesting date of the assets of the former gas undertakings, those who were interested in the former gas undertakings might seek before the vesting date to put some of their assets out of the reach of the gas boards, and one can conceive that that would be the more likely in the case of local authorities, because, whereas companies owning gas undertakings were to receive compensation, local authorities were to have no compensation for losing what, in many cases, may have been very valuable assets, except that there was a lump sum made available for compensation in respect of severance. The danger that, before the assets vested under s. 37, some of them might have been put out of the reach of the gas boards was appreciated by Parliament, and s. 33 to s. 38 of the Act are printed under the heading:

“Control of dividends and interest and safeguarding of assets pending transfer.”

The heading has no statutory authority, but it does usefully summarise the objects obviously sought to be attained by s. 33 to s. 38. Section 37 has two sub-sections, and there arise, therefore, in this action two points to be determined. Section 37 (1) lays down that in certain events the local authority shall be liable to pay certain amounts to the appropriate board with an exception which is immaterial for the purposes of the present case. The first point taken by counsel for the gas board is that, on a true construction of s. 37 (1), and on the true view of the facts here, there has arisen on the part of the defendant corporation a liability to pay to the gas board the two sums claimed in this action.

Section 37 (2) reads:

“Any claim under this section by the appropriate board against the local authority shall be made before the expiration of a period of twelve months beginning with the vesting date, and if so made and not settled by agreement, shall be determined by the Minister of Health.”

The second point taken by counsel for the gas board is that, whether the claim was or was not a valid claim under the provisions of s. 37 (1) having regard to the facts of this case, by s. 37 (2) the validity of the claim is expressly referred by the legislature to the Minister of Health for determination, and, accordingly, on well-known principles and in the light of abundant authority, this court has no jurisdiction to decide whether or not the claim is valid, because its validity was considered by the Minister of Health who determined the question adversely to the defendant corporation.

I do not think that the law is in any doubt: see Crisp v. Bunbury (1), decided in 1832 and referred to with approval by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. ([1904] 2 Ch. 135), in Joseph Crosfield & Sons, Ltd. v. Manchester Ship Canal Co. (2).

The decision in those cases can be summarised as follows. If two persons agree that any dispute which may arise between them in respect of any matter shall be referred to the determination of a third person, that agreement will not oust the jurisdiction of the court, but, since the court attaches importance to the sanctity of contract, the court will, generally speaking, in the exercise of its discretion and in aid of that sanctity of contract, stay an action which is brought in contravention of or non-compliance with what has been agreed. That is what happens in the usual case where there is what is commonly called an arbitration clause and one party, notwithstanding the arbitration clause, seeks to resort to the courts. On the other hand, where the legislature has thought it proper to lay down that the determination of a certain question should be made by some authority other than the courts, the courts have no jurisdiction to override Parliament and no jurisdiction to determine that which Parliament has said shall be determined by some other person or body. If the other person or body, being in the nature of an inferior tribunal, proceeds to exceed its authority or not to exercise it properly, then, in certain appropriate cases, the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, acting through the Divisional Court, can restrain the person or body so acting by processes which are well-known, but, apart from that authority which can be exercised over inferior tribunals, the court cannot proceed as an appellate authority to review, and, if it thinks right, overrule, the determination of a person or body to whom Parliament has entrusted the determination of the particular problem.

In regard to the two points raised by counsel for the gas board, I think that the logical order in which to deal with them is the inverse of that in which I have stated how they arise, and I shall deal first with the second point, viz., that, whether or not the claim made by the gas board be a valid claim, its validity has been determined in favour of the board by the Minister of Health, and this court has no jurisdiction to investigate its validity. [Dealing with the requirements of s. 37 (2) of the Act of 1948, HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the facts in regard to the claim and found that it was made by the appropriate board against the local authority, within the period required by s. 37 (2), and that, not having been settled by agreement, it was determined by the Minister of Health, and he continued:] It seems to me, therefore, that the only point which remains, as regards the position under s. 37 (2), is whether it was a claim under the section. It seems to me that it clearly was. According to the defendant corporation, it was a claim which, having regard to the terms of s. 37 and to the facts of the case, ought to have been disallowed. To put it in another way, it was not a valid claim. But that it was a claim under s. 37 by the appropriate board against the local authority and made before the expiration of twelve months beginning with the vesting date seems to me to be beyond doubt, and that it was not settled by agreement is also beyond doubt. In those circumstances it was a claim which fell to be determined by the Minister of Health, and, since Parliament has said that it "shall be determined by the Minister of Health", in my judgment, on well settled principles, it is not a claim which this court has any jurisdiction to determine. The Minister of Health having determined that it was a good claim, this court has no authority to say that, in its opinion, it is a bad claim and to give judgment for the defendant corporation accordingly.

If I am right about that, it seems to be an end of this action, but, as the question whether this was a valid claim has been argued by counsel and in case it should be held elsewhere that I am wrong on the first point, I shall deal also with the other point. Before the Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926, certain enactments dealt with the application of the revenue from the corporation's revenue-producing undertakings, and, in particular, from the water, gas, light railways, and electricity undertakings. The application of the revenue of the gas undertaking was dealt with in the Doncaster Corporation Act, 1904, by s. 177 of which the defendant corporation were bound to " . . . apply all money received by them on account of revenue in respect of their gas undertaking in manner and in the order following (that is to say) . . ."

The section concluded:

"And the corporation shall carry to the borough fund so much of any balance remaining in any year of the income of the undertaking (including the interest on the reserve fund . . .) as may in the opinion of the corporation not be required for carrying on the undertaking and paying the current expenses connected therewith."

Thus, under s. 177 of the Act of 1904 the defendant corporation were under an obligation to carry to the borough fund, which was what would now be called the general rate fund, any balance remaining in any year of the income of the undertaking which was not required by the corporation for carrying on the undertaking and paying the current expenses connected therewith. By the Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926, s. 79, the enactments dealing with the application of revenue from the revenue-producing undertakings, including s. 177 of the Act of 1904, were repealed, and by s. 71 of the Act of 1926 it was laid down that as from a certain date

" . . . all money received by the corporation on account of the revenue of the following undertakings (namely) [the section then names six revenue-producing undertakings of which the third is the gas undertaking] shall be carried to and shall form part of the borough fund and all payments and expenses made and incurred in respect of those undertakings shall be paid out of that fund."

A The Local Government Act, 1933, contains substantially similar provisions, in s. 185 as regards borough councils, and in s. 188 as regards urban district councils. By s. 185 (1):

B "All receipts of the council of a borough . . . shall be carried to the general rate fund of the borough, and all liabilities falling to be discharged by the council shall be discharged out of that fund. (2) An account, called the 'general rate fund account,' shall be kept of all receipts carried to, and payments made out of, the general rate fund."

Section 72 of the Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926, however, provides:

C "Separate accounts in respect of certain undertakings . . . the corporation shall keep their accounts so as . . . as regards the revenue account to show under a separate heading or division in respect of each of the following undertakings "

D all the receipts and payments and expenses in respect of the undertakings, being the light railways, water, gas, electricity, market, and baths undertakings. The section also lays down what those accounts shall contain. The object of keeping such separate accounts is, I think, apparent, and so appeared to me before examination of the recent cases. The object of such sections was considered by LORD GREENE, M.R. ([1942] 2 All E.R. 43), in Allchin v. Coulthard (3) and by WYNN-PARRY, J., in North-Eastern Gas Board v. Leeds Corpn. (4), where he quoted ([1952] 2 All E.R. 330) the passage from LORD GREENE's judgment to which I have referred. Section 73 of the Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926, deals with the disposal of surplus revenue of the electricity undertaking in reduction of electricity charges, but apart from that provision there is no provision limiting the way in which the corporation deal with the revenue from their revenue-producing undertakings. Separate accounts of these undertakings, I think, had to be kept, even apart from s. 72 of the Act, in order to satisfy other obligations of the corporation. For instance, as regards gas, accounts had to be furnished by the corporation to the Board of Trade as to undertakings under the Gas Regulation Act, 1920, s. 15 (1), and, as regards the light railways undertaking, accounts had to be furnished to the Minister of Transport under s. 78 of the Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926. That, then, is the position as to their obligation to keep separate accounts.

E The corporation did keep separate accounts of their various revenue-producing undertakings and also of other departments of their activities. The table of contents of the abstract of the treasurer's account for the year ended Mar. 31, 1948, vol. 1, starts off with "Gas works account", and goes on with water works account, electricity account, and so forth. The first section of the book is described as dealing with the "General rate fund (gas works section)". Then there are the revenue account and certain other accounts dealing with the gas works undertaking. I think the heading, "General rate fund (gas works section)", is used because of s. 71 of the Act of 1926, and it would probably have been necessary because of s. 185 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1933. But there is certainly a separate section dealing with the accounts of the gas works undertaking, and it appears that originally the section was physically separate for the purpose of its submission to the appropriate committee of the corporation for approval. So all through this volume there are these different sections dealing with different undertakings, some of them revenue-producing and some not revenue-producing, and at p. 258 there is the aggregate balance sheet as at Mar. 31, 1948. On p. 258 on the liabilities side of the account, and on p. 259, the property, assets and outlay side, the heading in the left-hand column is "Account or fund. Gas, water, electricity, trackless trolley", and so forth. To my mind, it is unarguable that there was not a separate gas account and also a separate general rate fund account. Counsel for the corporation has urged on me strongly, with the authority of Allchin v. Coulthard (3) and on the strength of s. 71 of the special Act of 1926 (and, as he would have submitted, on the strength of s. 185 of the general Act of 1933), that, apart from the reserve fund, which, I think, he would concede was in a special position, there is only one fund, viz., the general rate fund, and I would assume, without deciding it, that in that submission he is correct. But, whether there be only one fund or not, I am satisfied on the evidence that there was more than one account, and, in particular, that there was a gas account, as there was a water account and the general rate fund account. Among the defendant corporation's books of account there were also a gas section ledger and a gas section cash book, a waterworks ledger and a waterworks cash book, and a general rate fund ledger and a general rate fund cash book.

With regard to what happened to the amounts with which I am concerned, in the net revenue account of the gas account for the year ending Mar. 31, 1948, there was a balance of net profit of £8,487 2s. 9d. That net profit was transferred to the general rate fund as shown by a cash book entry and forms part of the figure of £79,099 2s. 0d., trading surpluses account, in the abstract in the general rate fund summary revenue account as a contribution in aid of rates. The same thing appears also from the ledger and cash book entries relating to the gas undertaking and to the general rate fund. In other words, the £8,487 2s. 9d. is debited in the gas account and the same amount, though concealed in a larger amount, is credited in the general rate fund revenue account. The other item in dispute is somewhat more difficult to deal with, although I have come to the conclusion that there is no difference in principle which affects the matter. At some time before 1946 the defendant corporation had been compelled to pay excess profits tax in respect of their revenue-producing undertakings, and at the time with which I am concerned a refund of the tax had become payable. It seems to be agreed that the undertakings of the corporation, for the purpose both of the payment of excess profits tax and also of any refund becoming due, are considered together. Under the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945, s. 39 (1) and s. 40 (1), no post-war refund was to be made to any person unless an undertaking was given that the net amount of the refund would be used in developing or re-equipping the trade or business and, until so used, would be so dealt with as to remain available for use, when required, in so developing or re-equipping the trade or business. The corporation received two amounts by way of refund of excess profits tax. The first was an actual cash payment. The second was recovered by way of deduction from a liability of the corporation to the inland revenue authorities. Those two different ways of receiving the refund have complicated the facts a little by splitting up the amount claimed by the gas board under the second head into two items, £1,012 4s. 5d. and £1,131 15s. 10d. The refunds were apportioned by the borough treasurer among the revenue-producing undertakings in the accounts of those undertakings. Without deciding it, as at present advised I am disposed to agree with the borough treasurer that he was bound to apportion those refunds by virtue of s. 75 of the Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926, though he said he would have done it in any event as the right thing to do, though Mr. Hill, a financial expert witness, disagreed. It is sufficient, however, that £2,144 0s. 3d. was in fact apportioned to the gas account and appears in the accounts of the gas section under the heading "E.P.T. post-war refund suspense account". For, perhaps, obvious reasons, since it had either to be spent on development, etc., or to be kept available for that purpose, and since that is, I imagine, the normal way of keeping a sum available for a future purpose, the total was put into a suspense account. On Mar. 31, 1948, that account was debited with £2,144 0s. 3d. in respect of a cash transfer to the water account. In the waterworks ledger and in the waterworks cash book it appears as: "To various accounts excess profits tax, post-war refunds, gas, £2,144 0s. 3d." So there is a debit in the gas account of that sum in respect of a transfer to the water account, and a credit in the water account in respect of that sum received from gas. The item is to be found under the general rate fund (waterworks section) of the accounts under "E.P.T. post-war refund suspense account" as: "Transferred from other trading undertakings, £11,837 10s. 3d." How that £11,837 10s. 3d. is made up is disclosed in the waterworks cash book and the water ledger, where it is shown that into that £11,837 10s. 3d. there enters £2,144 0s. 3d. from the gas account. The authority for that method of dealing with the items in the gas account is to be found recorded as I understand it, on the correspondence.

I have not found any case which directly assists me on this point. In North-Eastern Gas Board v. Leeds Corpn. (4), the transfer or dealing by the local authority with the sums there in question had taken place long before Feb. 10, 1948. As I understand it, the corporation there transferred the sums in question to their general rate fund in 1947. Accordingly, s. 37 of the Gas Act, 1948, had no relevance, but the gas board had to demonstrate, in the words of WYNN-PARRY, J. ([1952] 2 All E.R. 328),

"that the corporation had no power to perform these operations at the time when they did so."

For reasons given in his judgment, he came to the conclusion that in 1947 they had power to perform those operations and that, the moneys having as a result been merged in the general rate fund—"lost" was the word used by LORD GREENE, M.R., in Allechin v. Coulthard (3) ([1942] 2 All E.R. 43)—the gas board could not disentangle them and claim them as assets of the gas undertaking vested in them under the vesting sections of the Act of 1948. If I have rightly summarised the substance of that case, it clearly is no help to me here. I assume, without deciding it, that, but for the passing of the Gas Act, 1948, and, in particular, but for the results of s. 37, the defendant corporation could have merged the two amounts now in question in the general rate fund, or, if so desired, as it actually did, have merged one of them in the general rate fund and the other in the accounts of the water undertaking. But I have to decide what is the effect on the liability of the corporation of s. 37 of the Act.

As I find no help in the cases I have mentioned, I must take the words of the section and see if there is any doubt about their meaning or their application to the present facts. Section 37 (1) provides:

"Where at any time after Feb. 10, 1948, a local authority have, without the approval of the Minister of Health, debited any amount in the accounts of the gas undertaking of the authority . . ."

There has been no dispute here that what the defendant corporation did with regard to the two sums in question, which has given rise to the present claim, was done after Feb. 10, 1948, and without the approval of the Minister of Health. In spite of the argument of counsel to the contrary I should have said it was obvious on the documents and books before me that the corporation debited both the amounts in question in the accounts of the gas undertaking of the authority on Mar. 31, 1948, one being in respect of a cash transfer to the general rate fund and the other in respect of a transfer to the water undertaking. I cannot see how there could be a clearer debiting of the two amounts in the accounts of the gas undertaking. Section 37 (1) provides that where a local authority have

“debited any amount in the accounts of the gas undertaking of the authority and credited that amount in any other account of the authority, the local authority shall be liable to pay that amount to the appropriate board”, with an exception which, as I have said, is immaterial. Here, again, in my view, there could not be a clearer crediting in other accounts of the defendant corporation.

When I look at the words of the section, it seems to me plain that in upholding the claim of the gas board against the corporation the Minister of Health was correct. It seems to me idle to discuss what might have been the result if the words of the section had been different from what they are. For instance, if there had been words referring to a transfer from one fund to another, the argument of counsel for the defendant corporation might well have prevailed that, having regard to the provisions of s. 71 of the private Act of 1926, and, maybe, also to the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1933, there is only one fund apart from a reserve fund, that that fund is the general rate fund, and that these accounts relate to various provisions and sections of that one fund. But Parliament chose to use very plain language, and the facts of this case seem to fall within the scope of that language without any doubt. For those reasons, I think that the plaintiff gas board should succeed on both grounds. First, I think there has been a determination by the Minister of Health in their favour on their disputed claim, and such determination has by statute been left to the Minister of Health and this court has no right to differ from his decision or to review it. Secondly, even if it were open to me to review the decision of the Minister of Health contrary to the view which I take, I have no doubt that the determination of the Minister of Health was in fact correct. There will be judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

BADDELEY AND OTHERS v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), December 2, 3, 18, 1952.]

Stamp Duty—Charity—Moral, social, and physical training and recreation—Whether object charitable—Finance Act, 1947 (c. 35), s. 54 (1).

A Property was conveyed to trustees on trust, inter alia, for the moral, social, and physical training and recreation of persons resident in certain districts who were members of the Methodist Church or were likely to become members of that church and lacked the means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by the trusts, and for the promotion and encouragement of all forms of such activities as were calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons. On the question whether, under s. 54 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, the conveyances were exempt from the doubled stamp duty imposed by s. 52 (1) of that Act, on the ground that the conveyances were made to the trustees of a trust established for charitable purposes only,

B HELD: (i) the trusts were not for the relief of poverty, since “relief” connoted the need of the means to provide for some necessity or quasi-necessity, and not for a mere amusement, however healthy;

C (ii) a trust for the promotion of recreation was not a trust for a “purpose beneficial to the community”: Londonderry Presbyterian Church House Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1946) (27 Tax Cas. 431), followed;

D (iii) and, therefore, the purposes of the trusts were not exclusively charitable and the conveyances did not fall within s. 54 (1).

CASE STATED by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under s. 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

The commissioners refused the taxpayers' claim, under s. 54 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, to be exempt from the doubling of stamp duty imposed by s. 52 (1) of the Act, the contention of the taxpayers being that the conveyances subject to stamp duty were made to trustees of a trust established for charitable purposes only.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment. These are appeals by Case Stated from two decisions of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the Stamp Act, 1891, holding that two conveyances both dated Aug. 21, 1951, and made in favour of the taxpayers fell to be stamped under sched. I to the Act as either conveyances on sale or voluntary conveyances to be treated as such under s. 74 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, and, accordingly, were liable to ad valorem duty at the rate of £1 for every £50 under s. 52 of the Finance Act, 1947. The taxpayers' contention in each case is that the stamp duty ought to be at one-half that rate on the ground that the conveyances were made to "a body of persons established for charitable purposes only or to the trustees of a trust so established" within the meaning of s. 54 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947. The question in each case is, therefore, the same, namely, whether the taxpayers are trustees of a trust established for charitable purposes only.

Of the two deeds the first transfers to the trustees a piece of land on which were already erected a mission church, a lecture room, and a store, and the second transfers to them four pieces of land. The second also deals with a sum of £10,000 as an endowment fund. The conveyances both bear the same date and are intimately connected though the trusts are not stated in the same terms. The taxpayers, who are throughout called the trustees, are directed to allow the property in each case

"to be appropriated and used by the leaders for the time being of the Stratford Newtown Methodist Mission under the name of 'The Newtown Trust' " which in the deeds is referred to as "the foundation". From this point the words of the two deeds diverge and I must, I think, deal with them separately. The first deed, which is the conveyance of the mission church, lecture room, and store, uses these words in cl. 2 (a) and (b):

"The trustees shall permit the said property to be appropriated and used by the leaders for the time being of the Stratford Newtown Methodist Mission under the name of 'the Newtown Trust' (hereinafter called 'the foundation') for the promotion of the religious social and physical well-being of persons resident in the county boroughs of West Ham and Leyton in the county of Essex by the provision of facilities for religious services and instruction and for the social and physical training and recreation of such aforementioned persons who for the time being are in the opinion of such leaders members or likely to become members of the Methodist Church and of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by these presents and by the provision of facilities for religious social and physical training and recreation and by promoting and encouraging all forms of such activities as are calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons . . . (b) The trustees may from time to time: (i) Maintain the said property or any part thereof as a centre for religious services and instruction and for social and physical training and recreation."

The second deed, which deals with the four pieces of land adjacent to the mission hall comprised in the first deed and described as being "laid out as a playing field and upon parts of which a pavilion and a groundsman's bungalow have been erected", is in these terms: Clause 2 (a) provides:

"The trustees shall permit the said property to be appropriated and used . . . for the promotion of the moral social and physical well-being of persons resident in the county boroughs of West Ham and Leyton in the county of Essex who for the time being are in the opinion of such leaders members or likely to become members of the Methodist Church and of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by these presents by the provision of facilities for moral social and physical training and recreation and by promoting and encouraging all forms of such activities as are calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons . . . (b) The trustees may from time to time: (i) Maintain the said property or any part thereof as a ground for moral social and physical training and recreation."

The £10,000 is to be held on trust as though it were capital money arising from the sale of land settled by the second deed. There are in both deeds limitations over on the failure of the primary trust, but, in my judgment, these do not affect the present question.

Charity, we are taught, covers a multitude of sins, but whether that doctrine ought to extend to the draftsman of these documents may, I think, well be doubted. It was conceded by the Crown during the argument before me that the first deed contained words to which no meaning could be attached and which must have been inserted by mistake. The words are these: "and by the provision of facilities for religious social and physical training and recreation and". If these words are treated as cut out of the clause the trusts may be paraphrased as follows:—(a) The promotion of the religious, social, and physical well-being of persons resident in the county boroughs of West Ham and Leyton by the provision of facilities for religious services and instruction. (b) The social and physical training and recreation of such persons so resident as are (i) in the opinion of the leaders, members, or likely to become members, of the Methodist Church, and (ii) of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by the trust. (c) The promotion and encouragement of all forms of such activities as are calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons. The trusts of the second deed are more shortly stated and may be thus paraphrased:—(a) The promotion of the moral, social, and physical well-being of persons resident in the same boroughs and with the same qualifications as to religious belief and means as in the first deed (i) by the provision of facilities for moral, social, and physical training and recreation, and (ii) by permitting and encouraging all forms of such activities as are calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons.

For the purposes of what follows I may exclude trust (a) in the first deed which would seem to be a charitable object as being for the advancement of religion. What, then, remains? In my judgment, the two deeds in other respects are in terms so alike that they can be dealt with together. Are the objects stated exclusively charitable—that is to say, are there objects for which the trustees could allow the property to be used which are not charitable objects? They could, in my judgment, without a breach of trust, allow the property to be used either for the physical training or for the recreation of persons resident within the named boroughs, provided those persons either are of the Methodist belief, in the leaders' opinion, or, in that opinion, likely to become so, and are also of insufficient means to enjoy the advantages provided. These advantages may, in my judgment, include, so far as the hall is concerned, social activities such as tea parties or dances, or recreations, such as whist drives, table tennis, or billiards, and, so far as the playing field is concerned (which I note in passing was formerly the property of a body called the Gaiety Lawn Tennis Club, Ltd.), lawn tennis or any other open-air game. It was not argued before me that by reason of the connection of the foundation with the Methodist Church these trusts could be said to be for the advancement of religion, an argument advanced without success in the North Irish case of Londonderry Presbyterian Church House Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) to which I shall have to refer again, but it was sought to uphold them on two grounds—(i) that they were for the relief of poverty, and (ii) that they came within the fourth category of LORD MACNAGHTEN'S classification in Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (2) as being "for other purposes beneficial to the community".

I will deal first with the poverty qualification. This is based on the words in 43 Eliz. c. 4 "the relief of aged, impotent and poor people". I must ask myself whether these words cover the provision of facilities for playing, for instance, billiards or lawn tennis for people who could not otherwise afford to do so. If there were no authority, I should at once answer that this was not relief of the poor. "Relief" seems to connote need of some sort, either need of a home or of the means to provide for some necessity or quasi-necessity and not merely for an amusement, however healthy it is. The definition of poverty for the present purpose is not without authority. It does not mean absolute want or grinding need. For instance, SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., appears to have held in Spiller v. Maude (3) that a fund was charitable although recipients of bounty under it might have an income up to £50 a year. The authorities on the subject are collected in MAUGHAM, J.'s decision in Re De Carteret (4), where he came to the conclusion that there might be a good charity for the relief of poverty though the persons to be benefited are by no means destitute. It is, however, to be observed that the class of persons whom the learned judge there declared to be the objects of charity were widows with young children whose income was not more than £120 a year and who were thus very much in need of an allowance to help them bring up their children. In my judgment, counsel for the Crown was justified in his submission that this is not a poverty case at all because no question of need is involved.

There remains the question whether the trust is charitable on the other ground alleged. As to this the House of Lords has recently pointed out in Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5) that an object may be of great public utility but still not be a charity. The headnote reads as follows:

"Every object of public general utility is not necessarily a charity, for in order to be charitable a trust must be within the spirit and intendment of the statute 43 Eliz. c. 4. Accordingly, no trust can be charitable unless it is beneficial to the community in a way which the law regards as charitable."

LORD SIMONDS says ([1947] 1 All E.R. 518):

"My Lords, there are, I think, two propositions which must ever be borne in mind in any case in which the question is whether a trust is charitable. The first is that it is still the general law that a trust is not A charitable and entitled to the privileges which charity confers unless it is within the spirit and intendment of the preamble to 43 Eliz. c. 4, which is expressly preserved by s. 13 (2) of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888. The second is that the classification of charity in its legal sense into four principal divisions by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Pemsel's case (2) ([1891] A.C. 583) must always be read subject to the qualification appearing in the judgment of LINDLEY, L.J., in Re Macduff (6) ([1896] 2 Ch. 466): 'Now SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY did not mean, and I am certain that LORD MACNAGHTEN did not mean to say, that every object of public general utility must necessarily be a charity. Some may be and some may not be.' This observation has been expanded by VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in this House in A.-G. v. National Provincial & Union Bank of England (7) ([1924] A.C. 265) in these words: 'LORD MACNAGHTEN did not mean that all trusts beneficial to the community are charitable, but that there were certain beneficial trusts which fall within that category: and accordingly to argue that because a trust is for a purpose beneficial to the community it is therefore a charitable trust is to turn round his sentence and to give it a different meaning. So here it is not enough to say that the trust in question is for public purposes beneficial to the community or is for the public welfare; you must also show it to be a charitable trust.' But it is just because the purpose of the trust deed in this case is said to be beneficial to the community or a section of the community and for no other reason that its charitable character is asserted. It is not alleged that the trust is (a) for the benefit of the community and (b) beneficial in a way which the law regards as charitable. Therefore, as it seems to me, in its mere statement the claim is imperfect and must fail."

If I were free to do so, I should hold that recreation is not a charitable object. It was argued before me that this is not so having regard to the views of the legislature on this subject, and I was referred to two Acts, first, the Physical Training and Recreation Act, 1937, which set up a national council for physical training and recreation and empowered the Board of Education and local authorities to spend money on playing fields for the use of organisations having athletic objects, and, secondly, to the Education Act, 1944, by s. 53 of which the education authorities are enjoined in connection with schools to provide adequate facilities for recreation and to provide playing fields for persons enjoying State education. I do not feel impressed by these statutes which provide, no doubt, admirable activities in connection with education and for the benefit of the public, but the State nowadays spends a deal of money on objects which no one could consider charitable in the legal sense. I was also referred to Shillington v. Portadown Urban Council (8) in which BARTON, J., held that the application of money for providing the means of healthy recreation was a good public charitable purpose in the context in which it appeared in that will. The learned judge, after reciting the words of the will which were ([1911] 1 I.R. 256):

"for the purpose of fostering, encouraging, and providing the means of obtaining healthy recreation, including the teaching of singing in classes or choruses, for the residents of the town of Portadown and the surrounding districts, and for the purpose of providing music and instruments (in so far as my trustees think advisable) for the town band", said:

"This direction to the trustees as to the application of the balance or residue of the income of the trust estate constitutes, in my opinion, a valid charitable devise and bequest. The testator's purpose was a charitable or public purpose. He wished to benefit the residents of his native town and of its immediate neighbourhood. The benefits which he intended to confer on them were such as he believed to be of public advantage. That belief was rational and not contrary to the laws of the land or the principles of morality."

I was referred further to Re Hadden (9) where CLAUSON, J., held that the provision of means for public recreation is a charitable object within 43 Eliz. c. 4. After referring to Shillington v. Portadown Urban Council (8), and to certain Acts of Parliament, and, in particular, to the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, he said this ([1932] 1 Ch. 141):

"That section [s. 6] enacts that Part II of the Act, which relates to assurances to charitable uses, shall not apply to an assurance of a limited amount of land for the purposes of a park, garden, or other land dedicated or to be dedicated to the recreation of the public. That enactment seems to me necessarily to involve that in the view of the legislature dedication of land to the recreation of the public is dedication to a charitable use; and in face of that enactment I am, I conceive, bound to hold (nor am I at all reluctant so to do) that the provision of means for public recreation is a charitable object within 'the meaning, purview and interpretation' of the preamble to the Act of 43 Eliz. c. 4."

Against these authorities must be set the decision in Re Nottage (10), distinguished by CLAUSON, J., on the ground that "mere" sport was, no doubt, not charitable. I find it difficult to see why the addition of the word "mere" constitutes a distinction, and why public recreation is not tantamount to "mere" sport. Watching a football match on Saturday afternoon may claim to be the most popular public recreation in this country, but I feel that a fund devoted to providing gate money could not be held to be a charitable activity without passing that bursting point referred to by RUSSELL, L.J., in Re Grove-Grady (11). However this may be, I am not without guidance in the form of Londonderry Presbyterian Church House Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) already referred to, where the Court of Appeal of Northern Ireland held that property conveyed subject to trusts very similar to the present, was not exempt from tax under a statute similar to the English statute. The trusts are stated as follows in the headnote (27 Tax Cas. 431):

"The appellant trustees held certain properties 'upon trust to permit the same or any part thereof to be used as a hall for meetings or for social or recreation purposes in connection with the various Presbyterian churches in the city of Londonderry and the surrounding district or as a hostel or boarding house or as a library or for such other . . . purposes as the board of governors . . . shall . . . think fit, it being the true intention and meaning of these presents that the said premises shall be used for the purposes of assisting and helping in the religious moral social and recreative life of those connected with the Presbyterian church in the city of Londonderry and surrounding district in such manner as the said board of governors . . . shall . . . think right'."

MACDERMOTT, J., held these to be charitable trusts as falling within LORD MACNAGHTEN's fourth category, but he was reversed in the Court of Appeal of Northern Ireland. I find the following passage in the judgment of ANDREWS, C.J. (ibid., 446):

"The authorities, whose number is legion, upon whether particular trusts fall within or without LORD MACNAGHTEN's fourth category, baffle all efforts on my part to reconcile them with one another, and no useful purpose would be served in the circumstances by reviewing them. Judicial minds have operated not always consistently on facts admittedly different; and the result can only be described as in a measure chaotic. I shall simply content myself with saying that I find nothing in the statutes referred to which would assist me in holding that the trusts in the present case for religious, moral, social and recreative purposes, excluded as I have held them to be from LORD MACNAGHTEN's third class, fall within the fourth class as a valid charitable trust. The test is not whether the objects or purposes aimed at are beneficial to or receive the general acceptance of the community. It is simply whether they conform or not to the requirements and essentials of a legal charity."

A This is a tax case which I find to be of high persuasive authority, and I think I ought to follow it and to hold that the trusts in the present case are not charitable.

B Had I favoured the taxpayers on this point as to recreation, there would still remain a difficult question whether the purpose was "public recreation". Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5), above cited, shows that one of the qualifications is that the object must be public, that is to say, it must benefit the community or a class of the community. This is, perhaps, best stated in Verge v. Somerville (12) ([1924] A.C. 499). Applying the opinion there expressed to the present facts, this trust is confined to the inhabitants of two boroughs—so far, good—but not all the inhabitants—only to persons of insufficient means and either Methodists or likely to become Methodists. Now these three qualifications must all rest on the decision of the leaders. C Whether a man is of insufficient means and a Methodist can, I suppose, be satisfactorily ascertained as a fact. Whether he is likely to become a Methodist is not ascertainable with any certainty, and it is argued that a body of persons so qualified cannot claim to constitute a class of the community, but are a mere shifting body of individuals. It has recently been held in Oppenheim v. Tobacco Securities Trust Co., Ltd. (13) that the nexus of employment is not sufficient, and it is said that this is far more definite than the nexus of being likely to become a Methodist. This question has been much canvassed recently, beginning with the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Re Compton (14) and going on with Re Hobourn Aero Components Ltd.'s Air Raid Distress Fund (15) and I do not pretend to be a master of all its niceties. Nor is it necessary that I should decide it having regard to the view already expressed. It was, however, E fully argued before me, and it may be right, that I should state my conclusion. On the whole, it seems to me that this is a section of the community. Its members are united by adherence to or inclination towards a form of Christianity. They must have a territorial qualification, as was held in Goodman v. Saltash Corpn. (16), and they must pass a means test. The nexus is not a personal one. I cannot subscribe to the view expressed by BABINGTON, L.J., in the Londonderry Presbyterian Church case (1) that adherence to the Presbyterian faith in the F town of Derry would not do. I prefer the contrary views of MACDERMOTT, J., and ANDREWS, C.J. If Presbyterians in Derry are not a class for this purpose, then Jews in Whitechapel are not, nor Christians in Hoxton, and it seems to me that this kind of reasoning leads to absurdity. Accordingly, if I had held that recreation was a charitable object, I should have held that the purpose G here was public recreation. As it is, I dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

EVANS v. EVANS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton and Morris, L.JJ.), December 11, 12, 1952.]

Divorce—Costs—Security for wife's costs—Husband an "assisted person"—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940), r. 65 (3).

Legal Aid—Costs—Security for costs—Application by wife in divorce proceedings—Husband an "assisted person"—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (c. 51), s. 12 (2) (b) (ii).

A

A wife, whether she is an assisted person or not, is entitled to apply for security for her costs under the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, r. 65 (1), although the husband is an assisted person, but, where the wife is also an assisted person, an application should seldom be made.

B

On Jan. 3, 1952, the husband filed a petition for divorce on the ground of the wife's cruelty. On Feb. 9, 1952, the wife obtained a civil aid certificate to defend the suit. On Sept. 18, 1952, the husband was granted a civil aid certificate in which it was stated that his disposable income was £296 and his capital was nil. The National Assistance Board determined his maximum contribution as £70, and the local committee assessed his contribution at that sum. On Nov. 3, 1952, the wife applied, under r. 65 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, for security for her costs. After referring to the husband's civil aid certificate for particulars of his means and without any further evidence on the matter, the registrar ordered that he should provide security to the extent of £20 for the wife's costs. On appeal, HELD: under r. 65 (3) of the rules of 1950 the Divorce Division had jurisdiction to make an order for security for the wife's costs even though the parties were assisted persons, but on the facts of the present case the order should not have been made.

C

G

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the husband from an order of COLLINGWOOD, J., made in chambers on Nov. 18, 1952, whereby he affirmed an order of the Brighton district registrar that the husband, who had filed a petition for divorce, should give security for the wife's costs. Both parties were "assisted persons", within the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and it was contended by the husband (a) that, as an assisted person, he could not be ordered to give security, and (b) that, if an order for security for the wife's costs could be made against an assisted person, it should not have been made in the circumstances.

K. G. I. Jones for the wife.

SINGLETON, L.J.: By a petition filed on Jan. 3, 1952, the husband, William Harold Evans, sought a decree of dissolution of his marriage with Clara Ethel Evans on the ground of cruelty. The wife applied for legal aid under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and on Feb. 9, 1952, she was granted a civil aid certificate to defend the suit. Her disposable income was stated to be £156, her disposable capital to be £8, and her maximum contribution to the legal aid fund to be nil. Her answer was filed on July 21, 1952. The husband applied for legal aid and on Sept. 18, 1952, he was granted a civil aid certificate. Under s. 4 (6) of the Act of 1949 the National Assistance Board determined his disposable income at £296, his disposable capital as nil, and his maximum contribution as £70. The local committee assessed his contribution at the same sum, £70, payable by a first instalment of £4 and eleven subsequent monthly payments of £6 each.

The Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, s. 12, provides:

“(1) The Lord Chancellor may make such regulations as appear to him necessary or desirable for giving effect to this Part of this Act or for preventing abuses thereof. (2) Without prejudice to the foregoing subsection or any other provision of this Act authorising the making of regulations, regulations may . . . (b) regulate the procedure of any court or tribunal in relation to legal aid, and in particular make provision . . . (ii) as to the cases in which and extent to which a person receiving legal aid may be required to give security for costs, and the manner in which it may be given.”

No such regulations have been made as yet.

The Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, r. 65 (3), provides:

“Where an application for security has been made under this rule, a registrar shall ascertain what is a sufficient sum of money to cover the costs of the wife, and if, after taking all the circumstances into account, including the means of the husband and the wife, he considers that the husband should provide security for all or some of the wife’s costs, he may order the husband to pay the sum so ascertained, or some portion of it, into court or to give security therefor within such time as he may fix, and may direct a stay of the proceedings until the order is complied with.”

This rule in regard to security for the wife’s costs is not in quite the same form as it was of old: see the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1937, r. 74 (2) and (3). An alteration made in the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 74 (3), is preserved in r. 65 (3) of the rules of 1950, which expressly provides that one of the matters to be taken into account on such an application is the means of the husband.

In the present case an application under r. 65 (1) for security was made by the wife to the registrar on Nov. 3, 1952, and he ordered that the husband should provide security to the extent of £20 for the wife’s costs of the hearing. The husband appealed to COLLINGWOOD, J., against that order. COLLINGWOOD, J., we are told, felt that he was bound by a decision of BARNARD, J., in Vincent v. Vincent (1), and upheld the judgment of the registrar. From that order of COLLINGWOOD, J., the husband appeals to this court. Both parties are assisted persons for the purposes of this appeal. Counsel for the husband put forward two submissions to this court. The first was that, where both parties are legally aided, there is no power to make an order for security for costs. His second point was that, even if there was power, the making of the order for £20 security in this case was a wrong exercise of the discretion conferred on a registrar and that the order ought to be set aside.

In December, 1950, Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (2) was before this court. In that case security for the costs of an appeal by the plaintiff had been ordered under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15 (2). Immediately thereafter the plaintiff became an assisted person and an application was made that the order for security should be discharged. The judgment of the court was that, until the regulations envisaged by s. 12 (2) (b) (ii) of the Act of 1949 were made, in the absence of special circumstances an order for security for costs should not be made against an assisted person, and, therefore, the order which had been made would be discharged. COHEN, L.J., who gave the judgment of the court, used these words ([1951] 1 All E.R. 57):

"None the less, until we get the guidance of the regulations which are indicated by the provisions in s. 12 . . . I think we must proceed on the basis that, generally speaking, and in the absence of special circumstances, it would be inappropriate to make an order for security for costs at a time when an emergency certificate is in force."

It is submitted by counsel for the wife in this case that the position is different when the application which is before the court is for security for the wife's costs under r. 65 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, and it is as well to notice that these rules were made after the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, was enacted. I do not think that, in the absence of regulations, it can be said that the power of the Divorce Division to order security for a wife's costs has ceased. I think that it remains, and that a wife, whether she is an assisted person or not, is entitled to make an application under r. 65 (1) even though the husband be an assisted person. On the hearing of the application, the question whether or not an order for security should be made, under r. 65 (3), has then to be considered. At the same time, I think that such an application should seldom be made.

When the decision of this court in Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (2) was given, it seems to have been thought that it should be taken to cover divorce practice as well. I am inclined to think that it would have been a good thing if it had been so treated, though the court was not then dealing with a matrimonial suit. A practice direction was issued by the Senior Registrar which I should describe as extremely useful, though in Vincent v. Vincent (1) BARNARD, J., seems to have thought the wording of it was not satisfactory. We were given to understand that the registrar at Brighton, from whose decision this is an appeal, did not have it before him. The direction is this:

"Legal Aid. Costs, security for. In the absence of any regulations under s. 12 of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, the decision in Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (2), must be taken to prevent the making of any order for security for costs against an assisted person unless there are special circumstances. The fact that a legally aided husband has been directed by a local committee to pay a contribution less than the maximum contribution may be regarded as a special circumstance, and an order to secure for the wife's costs a sum not greater than the difference between the actual and maximum contributions may be made in a proper case."

In Vincent v. Vincent (1), which was before BARNARD, J., in November, 1952, the husband, on Apr. 23, 1951, filed a petition for divorce on the ground of the wife's desertion. On Jan. 14, 1952, he obtained a civil aid certificate to enable him to carry on the proceedings. On July 22, 1952, the wife obtained a civil aid certificate limited to obtaining an order for security against the husband. On Aug. 28, 1952, the wife's application to the registrar for an order for security was dismissed on the ground that no order for security could be made against an "assisted person." On appeal, BARNARD, J., held that it was a well-established practice in the Divorce Division that a wife had a right to apply for security for her costs and this was not affected by the husband being an "assisted person", and, therefore, the registrar was bound to comply with r. 65 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, and the case would be referred to him for that purpose. In giving his decision BARNARD, J., pointed out that in Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (2) COHEN, L.J., was careful to make it clear that he was not seeking to lay down a general rule covering all classes of case and all circumstances. BARNARD, J., continued ([1952] 2 All E.R. 979):

A "The registry, by their direction, have interpreted the decision in Conway's case (2) as applying to a wife's application for security for costs in the Divorce Division. I have come to the conclusion that this direction is a misinterpretation of the decision in Conway's case (2). It is a well-established practice of this Division that a wife has a right to apply for security for her costs, and LORD MERRIVALE, P., once said, in Re A.B.'s Petition (3) ([1928] P. 27): '... there is something in the nature of a prescriptive right upon cause shown to secure to the wife the means for defence'."

B BARNARD, J., then referred (ibid., 980) to Williams v. Williams (4), where HILL, J., said ([1929] P. 118):

C "The main object of security, in recent years at any rate, is that justice may be done by the wife being enabled to procure the assistance of solicitor and counsel and come to court. That is the main object in modern times. The old basis for the rule, namely, that all the wife's property on marriage passes to the husband, and therefore the husband alone can foot the bill, has gone altogether, and now you must consider whether in the circumstances the wife can foot the bill, and it is a very important matter to consider whether the solicitor can conduct the business without something in court to pay him up to setting down and without security."

D After citing this passage BARNARD, J., continued ([1952] 2 All E.R. 980):

E "I think that the present case is a different class of case from Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (2), by reason of the peculiar nature of a wife's security for costs in the Divorce Division, which I have already indicated and is not covered by Conway's case (2). I, therefore, allow this appeal and refer the matter back to the Leeds registrar to comply with r. 65 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950. The registrar will, of course, take into account the fact that the husband is an assisted person and will also have regard to the facts stated in the civil aid certificate and it may well be that he will come to the conclusion that this is a case in which no security should be ordered."

F BARNARD, J., upheld the power of the Divorce Division to make an order for security, even though the person against whom it is made is an assisted person. I have said that I think that power remains. The learned judge pointed out that, if the case went back to the registrar, he might well order nothing by way of security.

G In the case now under appeal the wife is an assisted person, and there is no difficulty about her coming to court with solicitor and counsel. In my view, it would have been better if she had not applied for security for her costs. If the registrar had properly found himself able to make an order for security, it could only have been for a trifling sum, and the cost of getting it is at the expense of the legal aid fund on both sides. Moreover, when an application of this kind is made, the customary practice is that there should be an affidavit as to means and the like, and that costs a good deal of money. There was, however, nothing like that before the court in this case. The registrar had the husband's civil aid certificate before him and he indorsed the summons:

"I have referred to the petitioner's legal aid certificate for particulars of the petitioner's means and consider he is able to give security for £20."

The civil aid certificate states that the petitioner has no disposable capital, but counsel for the wife pointed out to us that he might have some capital which was not disposable capital. The legal aid committee and the National Assistance Board decided what the husband should provide by way of contribution. The wife having applied, under r. 65 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, for security for her costs, under r. 65 (3) it was the duty of the registrar, after taking all the circumstances into account, including the means of the husband and the wife, to consider whether or not the husband should provide security and how much he should provide, if anything. It looks as though he considered that the husband was in a position to do something which the National Assistance Board thought they ought not to ask him to do. I recognise that the test is not precisely the same, but it is the duty of the National Assistance Board, in a case such as this, to find out, having regard to the terms of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and the rules thereunder, what it is reasonable for the husband to pay when he is granted legal aid. In this case, the registrar, who considered the matter very soon afterwards, thought that, notwithstanding the facts stated in the husband's civil aid certificate, the husband was able to give security for £20. It is almost akin to a registrar sitting on appeal from the National Assistance Board, and it is undesirable that such a position should arise.

Moreover, the object of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, is to enable a party who has a proper case, one worthy of assistance, to put before the court and has not the means to do so, to put it forward with the help of the legal aid fund. As a result of the wife's application for security for her costs, the husband might be prevented from bringing his petition forward, or it might be held up for months, although the legal aid committee have decided that he has a proper case to bring forward. Where a wife is an assisted person and there is no reason to think that the husband has any means other than those which the National Assistance Board has found, I do not see what good an application for security can do when it follows immediately on the assessment of the husband's financial position by the National Assistance Board. It is a waste of time and money. If there is any reason to think there has been a change of circumstances or that something has been overlooked, the position is quite different, but that there should be an application of this kind without any material put before the registrar except the civil aid certificate is difficult to understand. I do not question the power to make an order under r. 65 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, but I draw attention to the fact that in Vincent v. Vincent (1) BARNARD, J., said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 980) that the matter must go back to the registrar and that "... it may well be that he will come to the conclusion that this is a case in which no security should be ordered."

That is the conclusion to which I think the registrar ought to have come in the present case. It is for that reason that I think the application was a mistake. I do not think it is desirable, in view of the circumstances which are before this court, that there should be an order of this kind made against the husband on no information other than that which was before the National Assistance Board. For these reasons I have reached the conclusion that this appeal should be allowed and that the order for security made by the registrar should be set aside.

MORRIS, L.J.: I am entirely of the same opinion. When considering the circumstances in this case, it is of interest to note some remarks made by my Lord, SINGLETON, L.J., when delivering judgment in Wigley v. Wigley (5).

In that case the wife was an assisted person, but the husband was not. SINGLETON, L.J., said ([1951] P. 160):

“ But, if that assisted person is a husband, and the suit is a matrimonial suit, it may be that thereafter an application comes for security for the wife’s costs. It is with that sort of case in mind that I think it might be as well if regulations under s. 12 (2) (b) (ii) were made. Otherwise, some-one will be faced with the task of deciding what is to be done in regard to the wife’s application for security for costs when, with the help of the National Assistance Board, the local committee have already decided that the husband shall make the maximum payment which he can make to the legal aid fund. There may be an overlapping and it will be extraordinarily difficult for anyone to say what shall be done unless further guidance be given on that matter.”

It is to be observed that s. 1 (7) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, provides:

“ Save as expressly provided by this Part of this Act or by regulations made thereunder . . . (b) the rights conferred by this Part of this Act on a person receiving legal aid shall not affect the rights or liabilities of other parties to the proceedings or the principles on which the discretion of any court or tribunal is normally exercised.”

The Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, were dated Dec. 4, 1950, and were amended by the Matrimonial Causes (Amendment) Rules, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 840), dated May 9, 1951. The provisions of r. 65, therefore, have been in force after the passing of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949. I can find nothing which supersedes or in any way nullifies the effect and validity of r. 65 of the rules of 1950. I, therefore, find myself in agreement with the judgment of BARNARD, J., in Vincent v. Vincent (1), to which my Lord has referred. BARNARD, J., there pointed out that in Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (2) this court was dealing with a situation to which R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15 (2), applied and it was from that rule that the expression “ special circumstances ” came. It follows, therefore, that r. 65 of the rules of 1950, is operative and that the power to make an order for security under r. 65 (3) remains, even though the parties are assisted persons. But it is of great consequence to have in mind the concluding words of BARNARD, J., in Vincent v. Vincent (1), to which my Lord has drawn special attention. They form a guide and are a pointer to the view which, I think, must have been held by the learned judge as to what is likely to happen in cases of this kind.

In Jackson v. John Dickinson & Co. (Bolton), Ltd. (6), which was before this court, the plaintiff, who was ordinarily resident abroad, claimed, as an assisted person, damages for personal injuries. The defendants applied for an order for security for costs. It was held that the fact that the plaintiff was an assisted person did not disentitle the defendants to an order for security.

Counsel for the wife in the present case referred to s. 2 (2) (e) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949. Section 2 (2) provides:

“ Where a person receives legal aid in connection with any proceedings . . . (e) his liability by virtue of an order for costs made against him with respect to the proceedings shall not exceed the amount (if any) which is a reasonable one for him to pay having regard to all the circumstances, including the means of all the parties and their conduct in connection with the dispute.”

Counsel correctly pointed out that that shows that, though a party is an assisted person, if due regard is had to that fact and to all the circumstances, an order for costs may be made against him. In the present case, we have been definitely told that the only material before the learned registrar was the civil aid certificate. Counsel for the wife submitted that, in spite of the terms of that certificate, the husband might have some resources. He pointed, for example, to the Legal Aid (Assessment of Resources) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1358), sched. II, para. 6, which reads:

"No account shall be taken of any loose cash in the possession of the person concerned reasonably necessary to meet his current requirements so far as it does not exceed £20."

He contended that the husband might have had up to £20, and he pointed to other possibilities. It seems to me, however, that all that is pure speculation and that, as the only material before the registrar in this case was what is contained in the civil aid certificate, there was no material on which he could make the order that he made. The order might have the effect of preventing the husband from proceeding with his petition, as, unless he could find the £20, he would not be able to proceed. I agree fully with all that my Lord has said, and I concur with the order proposed by him.

Appeal allowed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Romer, L.JJ.), November 18, 19, 20, December 15, 1952.]

Estate Duty—Allowance—Double taxation—Canadian succession duty—Legacies given "free of legacy duty and all other death duties"—Allowance of amount of Canadian succession duty against estate duty—Benefit of allowance—Double Taxation Relief (Estate Duty) (Canada) Order, 1946 (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 1884), art. V.

By cl. 2 of her will, dated Mar. 2, 1949, a testatrix provided: ". . . all legacies and annuities bequeathed by this my will or any codicil thereto are to be paid free of legacy duty and all other death duties". By cl. 8 to cl. 47 inclusive the testatrix bequeathed a number of pecuniary legacies and annuities, and by cl. 50 she devised and bequeathed to her trustees her residuary real and personal estate on the usual trusts for sale and conversion, and provided: "And my trustees shall out of the moneys to arise from the sale . . . and out of my ready money pay my funeral and testamentary expenses (including all payments to be deemed testamentary expenses under the provisions of this my will) and debts and shall pay or provide for all legacies and annuities bequeathed by this my will or any codicil hereto and the duty on all such legacies and annuities And subject as aforesaid my trustees shall hold the residue of my estate in trust" for C. On Feb. 12, 1951, the testatrix died domiciled in England. Her estate included shares in a Canadian limited company which amounted in value to more than one-half of her estate and were liable both to estate duty in the United Kingdom (by virtue of the domicile of the testatrix) and also to succession duty in Canada (by virtue of their situation). According to Canadian law, the succession duty was assessed on the beneficial interests and would fall ultimately to be borne by the beneficiaries concerned. Under art. V of the agreement between the governments of the United Kingdom and Canada set out in the schedule to the Double Taxation Relief (Estate Duty) (Canada) Order, 1946, the government of the United Kingdom bound itself to allow against so much of its duty as was attributable to property situated in Canada a credit equal to so much of the duty imposed in Canada as was attributable to such property. On the question as to the incidence of the Canadian succession duty so far as attributable to the pecuniary legacies and annuities, it being conceded that that duty was not a testamentary expense, and that, therefore, the legatees and annuitants would, apart from express provision in the will or the effect of the order of 1946, be bound to bear their due proportion of the duty,

A HELD: the effect of art. V of the order of 1946 was that the Canadian succession duty was to be allowed as a payment operating to discharge a like amount of United Kingdom estate duty, and, if the Canadian duty attributable to the pecuniary legacies and annuities were thrown on those benefits, they would not have been paid free of United Kingdom estate duty, for the amount paid in respect of the Canadian duty was none the less for the present purpose a payment of United Kingdom estate duty because under the terms of the order it served to discharge both the B Canadian duty and also a like amount of United Kingdom duty, but the will directed that they should be so free, and, therefore, the whole of the United Kingdom estate duty should be borne by C., the residuary legatee, including the proportion thereof satisfied by the payment of the Canadian duty.

C Per JENKINS and ROMER, L.JJ.: the directions in the will with regard to death duties related prima facie to United Kingdom death duties only, and the circumstances that the testatrix held more than half her estate in the form of shares situated in Canada and that she was a good business woman who had caused to be prepared a statement showing the value of her residuary estate calculated without any reference to Canadian succession duty as payable out of the pecuniary legacies and annuities and D producing a credit of like amount for the benefit of residue against the full amount of United Kingdom estate duty it would otherwise bear were insufficient to displace that construction.

Rule as stated by WYNN-PARRY, J., in Re Cunliffe-Owen ([1951] 2 All E.R. 223), approved and applied.

G APPEAL by a pecuniary legatee under the will of Constance Goetze, deceased, from an order of UPJOHN, J., dated May 14, 1952.

UPJOHN, J., held, inter alia, that, on the true construction of the will of the testatrix, (i) Canadian succession duty paid in connection with her death ought, in so far as it was attributable to the legatee's legacy, to be borne by her, and H (ii) that the credit of the amount of such Canadian succession duty allowed against the United Kingdom estate duty under the Double Taxation Relief (Estate Duty) (Canada) Order, 1946, enured for the benefit of the residuary estate.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 15. SOMERVELL, L.J.: I will ask JENKINS, L.J., to read his own judgment and then the judgment of ROMER, L.J.

JENKINS, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order made by UPJOHN, J., on May 14, 1952, concerning the incidence as between the pecuniary legatees and annuitants under the will of the testatrix, Constance Goetze (represented by the appellant, Elizabeth Mond), and the residuary estate of the testatrix (to which the respondent, Countess Cippico, is solely entitled under such will) of the United Kingdom estate duty and Canadian succession duty attributable to the personal estate of the testatrix situated in the Dominion of Canada. The learned judge declared that the United Kingdom estate duty so attributable and the interest thereon ought to be borne by the residuary estate of the testatrix, and that declaration is not appealed from by the respondent residuary legatee. But he also declared that the Canadian succession duty so attributable ought to be borne by the legatees or annuitants concerned, and that the credit of the amount of such Canadian succession duty allowed against the United Kingdom estate duty under the Double Taxation Relief (Estate Duty) (Canada) Order, 1946, enured for the benefit of the residuary estate of the testatrix, and from this part of the learned judge's order the appellant, as representative of all the pecuniary legatees and annuitants, now appeals to this court.

The testatrix died domiciled in England on Feb. 12, 1951. By her will dated Mar. 2, 1949, and (with one codicil thereto not material for the present purpose) proved on Apr. 4, 1951, the testatrix appointed the respondents, National Provincial Bank, Ltd., Hyman Stone, and Countess Cippico, to be executors and trustees thereof, and (so far as relevant to the present appeal) made the following dispositions: By cl. 2 she declared that

"all legacies and annuities bequeathed by this my will or any codicil thereto are to be paid free of legacy duty and all other death duties."

By cl. 3 she declared that

"In case any death duties shall become payable on my death in respect of the money or property comprised in any gifts made or covenants entered into by me in my lifetime such death duties (and any duty thereon payable by reason of the provisions of this clause) shall be paid by my trustees out of my estate in exoneration of any other person accountable for such duty [and, further, that] all payments made hereunder shall be deemed to be testamentary expenses of my estate."

By cl. 8 to cl. 47, inclusive, the testatrix bequeathed forty-three pecuniary legacies and annuities to persons who, with two exceptions, all survived the testatrix, including (by cl. 9) a legacy of £1,000 to the appellant. By cl. 50, the testatrix devised and bequeathed to her trustees her residuary real and personal estate on usual trusts for sale and conversion, and directed as follows:

"And my trustees shall out of the moneys to arise from the sale calling in and conversion of or forming part of my residuary estate and out of my ready money pay my funeral and testamentary expenses (including all payments to be deemed testamentary expenses under the provisions of this my will) and debts and shall pay or provide for all legacies and annuities bequeathed by this my will or any codicil hereto and the duty on all such legacies and annuities And subject as aforesaid my trustees shall hold the residue of my estate in trust for " the respondent, Countess Cippico.

The net value of the testatrix's estate, for the purposes of United Kingdom estate duty, was £431,501 4s. 3d. and, in addition to other assets all of which were situated in England, it comprised 26,150 preferred and 10,976 common shares in the International Nickel Co. of Canada, Ltd., valued for duty purposes at £230,243 15s. 1d., which were situated in Canada. As the testatrix was domiciled in England, these shares, notwithstanding their Canadian situation, attracted United Kingdom estate duty on her death, and, accordingly, fell to be included in the above-mentioned total net estate of £431,501 4s. 3d. on which United Kingdom estate duty at the appropriate rate (viz., sixty-five per cent.) amounting to £280,475 13s. 2d., was assessed. But, notwithstanding the testatrix's English domicile, the last-mentioned shares (which I will call "the Canadian estate") also attracted, by reason of their Canadian situation, the succession duty exigible under the law of Canada on the beneficial interests in the Canadian estate created by her will. In these circumstances, the Double Taxation Relief (Estate Duty) (Canada) Order, 1946 (which I will call the "Double Taxation Order"), applied to the case. The Double Taxation Order is an Order in Council made under the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945, s. 54, which provides as follows:

"(1) If His Majesty by Order in Council declares that arrangements specified in the order have been made with the government of any territory outside the United Kingdom with a view to affording relief from double taxation in relation to estate duty payable under the laws of the United Kingdom and any duty of a similar character imposed under the laws of that territory, and that it is expedient that those arrangements should have effect, the arrangements shall, notwithstanding anything in any enactment, have effect so far as they provide for relief from estate duty, or for determining the place where any property is to be treated as being situated for the purposes of estate duty."

After declaring (by cl. 2)

"(a) that the arrangements specified in the agreement set out in the schedule to this order have been made with the government of Canada with a view to affording relief from double taxation in relation to estate duty payable under the laws of the United Kingdom and duty of a similar character imposed under the laws of Canada; and (b) that it is expedient that those arrangements should have effect", the Double Taxation Order sets out in the schedule thereto the agreement between the two governments, which includes the following provisions:

"Art I. (1) The duties which are the subject of the present agreement are:—(a) In the United Kingdom, the estate duty imposed in Great Britain, and (b) In Canada, the succession duty imposed by Canada. (2) The present agreement shall also apply to any other duties of a substantially similar character imposed by either contracting government subsequent to the date of signature of the present agreement . . ."

Article IV provides:

"(1) In determining the amount on which duty is to be computed, permitted deductions shall be allowed in accordance with the law in force in the territory in which the duty is imposed. (2) Where duty is imposed by one contracting government on the death of a person who was not domiciled at the time of his death in any part of the territory of that contracting government . . . no account shall be taken, in determining the amount or rate of the duty so imposed, of property situated outside the former territory."

Article V provides:

imposed in the territory of the other contracting government as is attributable to such property . . . (4) For the purposes of this article, the amount of the duty of a contracting government attributable to any property shall be ascertained after taking into account any credit, allowance or relief, or any remission or reduction of duty, otherwise than in respect of duty payable in the territory of the other contracting government."

From the affidavit of a Canadian lawyer filed in the present proceedings, it appears: (i) That Canadian succession duty is assessed and chargeable on all successions on death to Canadian property. (ii) That for this purpose (so far as now material) "succession" means every disposition of property whereby any person becomes entitled to any property or the income thereof on the death of any person. (iii) That where the deceased was at the time of his death domiciled outside Canada, the duty is exigible on or in respect of the succession to all property situated in Canada. (iv) That the duty in respect of any succession under the will of a testator is assessed at rates varying with the aggregate net value of the Canadian property passing on the death and the relationship of the successor to the testator, and that there are certain exemptions one of which frees successions of less than $1,000 from the duty. (v) That the successor is liable for the duty assessed in respect of any succession under the will of a testator, but that such duty is nevertheless payable by and recoverable from the executors to the extent of the property administered by them, with a right for executors who are required to pay the duty to deduct it in paying over the amount of the succession or to recover it from the successor personally in the event of the succession being satisfied otherwise than in money.

The notice of assessment which is in evidence shows how the Canadian succession duty was assessed in the present case. To put it shortly, the net Canadian estate was ascertained by deducting from the gross value of the Canadian estate a proportion of the total debts of the testatrix corresponding to the proportion borne by the gross value of the Canadian estate to the gross value of the total estate, and the pecuniary legatees and annuitants and the residuary legatee were respectively treated as entitled to beneficial interests (or "successions") in the net Canadian estate bearing the same proportions to their respective interests in the total net estate as the proportion borne by the net Canadian estate to the total net estate, and (apart from exemptions) each proportionate beneficial interest so ascertained was assessed, as a "succession", to duty at the appropriate rate, consisting of the basic rate of 11.7 per cent. appropriate to the aggregate net value of the Canadian estate plus an additional percentage varying with the relationship of the particular successor to the testatrix. The total amount of the Canadian succession duty thus assessed was $245,087.16 or £82,034 10s. 9d. This Canadian duty was duly paid by the executors, who under art. V of the Double Taxation Order were accordingly allowed a credit of £82,034 10s. 9d. against the United Kingdom estate duty attributable to the Canadian estate, leaving a balance payable, and in fact paid, of £198,441 2s. 5d. in respect of the last-mentioned duty, out of the total assessment of £280,475 13s. 2d.

The questions which, in the circumstances I have stated, arise for determination in the present appeal are, in effect: (i) whether on the true construction of the testatrix's will the Canadian succession duty attributable to the pecuniary legacies and annuities ought (apart from the provisions of the Double Taxation Order) to be borne by the respective legatees and annuitants or by the residuary estate; and (ii) if that question should be answered in the former sense, whether the provisions of the Double Taxation Order have the effect of throwing the liability for such Canadian succession duty on to the residuary estate in exoneration of the pecuniary legacies and annuities. Counsel for the pecuniary legatee conceded that the Canadian succession duty was not a testamentary expense, and, accordingly, that, unless he could show the pecuniary legacies and annuities to have been exonerated from this duty by some express provision in the will, they must (apart from the effect of the Double Taxation Order) bear their due proportions of it ascertained in accordance with the Canadian assessment on the footing that they were payable rateably out of the English and Canadian estates. He argued, however, that the will, on its true construction, when read in the light of the attendant circumstances, did expressly exonerate the pecuniary legacies and annuities from Canadian succession duty as well as United Kingdom estate duty, so far as the latter was not automatically payable out of residue as a testamentary expense.

The passages in the will on which he relied were the direction in cl. 2 that all legacies and annuities were to be paid "free of legacy duty and all other death duties", and the direction in cl. 50 to "pay or provide for all legacies and annuities . . . and the duty on all such legacies and annuities". He contended that these words were in themselves wide enough to include Canadian succession duty, and should be construed as including that duty, especially when read in the light of the attendant circumstances. Now the words relied on by counsel for the pecuniary legatee are no more than ordinary directions as to duty such as might be found in any English will, and the only duty specifically described is (or was) an English one, viz., legacy duty. The attendant circumstances on which counsel for the pecuniary legatee relies come to no more than this, that the testatrix held more than half her estate in the form of shares situated in Canada, that she was a good business woman who took an interest in her affairs and had caused to be prepared annually a statement showing the value of her residuary estate as it would be, having regard to the terms of her will, and that the latest of such statements dated May 10, 1950 (which is one of the exhibits in the case) allows for the payment out of residue of United Kingdom estate duty at sixty-five per cent., without any reference to Canadian succession duty as payable out of the pecuniary legacies and annuities and producing a credit of like amount for the benefit of residue against the full amount of United Kingdom estate duty it would otherwise bear.

The fact that the testatrix held more than half her estate in the form of shares situated in Canada is, no doubt, a circumstance proper to be taken into consideration in construing the directions as to duty contained in her will, but with this qualification I cannot regard the so-called attendant circumstances to which I have referred as throwing any light on the meaning of the relevant passages in the will, and I think the use sought to be made of the statement of May 10, 1950 (which was relied on by counsel for the residuary legatee, as pointing, if anything, the other way), came perilously near to its introduction as direct evidence of the testatrix's intention, which would plainly be inadmissible. UPJOHN, J., held that the directions as to duty contained in the testatrix's will did not, on their true construction, extend to Canadian succession duty, and in so holding he followed the decision of WYNN-PARRY, J., in Re Cunliffe-Owen (1). In that case WYNN-PARRY, J., reviewed the authorities and held them to establish a rule of construction that prima facie directions such as those in the present will by which duties are thrown on the residuary estate in exoneration of legacies are to be construed as referring only to United Kingdom death duties, with the qualification that directions of this nature ([1951] 2 All E.R. 223)

" . . . may in appropriate circumstances be given a wider scope if the surrounding circumstances are sufficiently compelling, and that that is so even in the absence of express words in the will referring to duties imposed by the law of foreign countries."

I need not repeat the review of the authorities made by WYNN-PARRY, J. They leave the question open in this court, but, in my view, the rule, and the qualification on it, deduced from them by WYNN-PARRY, J., are right in principle, and the scope of the directions as to duty contained in the present will should be judged accordingly. So judged, those directions must, in accordance with the rule, be held confined to United Kingdom duties, unless the attendant circumstances are sufficiently compelling to warrant the extension of their primary meaning so as to include Canadian succession duty. As appears from what I have said above, the attendant circumstances relied on, in my view, really provide no assistance beyond the bare fact that more than half the testatrix's estate consisted of assets situated in Canada in the form of her holdings of shares in the International Nickel Co. of Canada, Ltd. Is that fact in itself enough to displace the rule? In my view, it is not. The directions in question are well satisfied if construed in accordance with the rule as referring only to United Kingdom duties, and, therefore, the case is not one in which directions as to duty in the ordinary form must be taken to refer to foreign duty because no United Kingdom duty is payable. The mere fact that the testatrix had important assets in Canada as well as in this country falls far short of raising a necessary implication that she used the expression "death duties" as meaning Canadian as well as United Kingdom duties. She or her advisers may well have omitted to take Canadian duties into account at all, or may have thought that such duties would automatically fall on residue without any express direction to that effect, or may not have appreciated that the Canadian shares were technically situated in Canada for duty purposes and would, therefore, attract Canadian duty notwithstanding the testatrix's English domicile. One might add that the question commonly arises by reason of the fact that a testator or testatrix dies possessed of assets situated abroad, and that it would be curious if the circumstance giving rise to the question in itself sufficed to displace the general rule. Accordingly, I am not prepared to hold that the directions as to duty in the present case extend to the Canadian succession duty.

It follows that, apart from the effect of the Double Taxation Order, the pecuniary legatees and annuitants must, on the basis of the concession made by counsel for the pecuniary legatee, bear their due proportion of the Canadian succession duty. But, in considering the effect of the Double Taxation Order, it must be borne in mind that (to relate the relevant directions to the particular United Kingdom duty actually in question) the testatrix did, undoubtedly, give the pecuniary legacies and annuities free of United Kingdom estate duty and direct that the United Kingdom estate duty on such legacies and annuities (so far as not automatically payable out of residue as a testamentary expense) should be paid or provided for out of her residuary estate. This means that residue had to bear all payments necessary to make the pecuniary legacies and annuities free of United Kingdom estate duty before the residuary legatee could take anything. It also means, so far as the Canadian estate was concerned, that the Canadian estate had to provide its due proportion of the pecuniary legacies and annuities and the United Kingdom estate duty thereon before any part of that estate could go to the residuary legatee.

The effect of art. V of the Double Taxation Order appears to have been that the United Kingdom estate duty was to be assessed in full on the Canadian estate without regard to Canadian succession duty, that the Canadian succession duty was to be similarly assessed thereon without regard to the United Kingdom estate duty, and that the Canadian succession duty was then to be allowed as a credit of like amount against the United Kingdom estate duty, or, in other words, as a payment operating to discharge a like amount of United Kingdom estate duty. It seems to me, therefore, that, if the Canadian succession duty attributable to the Canadian proportion of the pecuniary legacies and annuities was thrown on those benefits, they would not have been paid free of United Kingdom estate duty. They would have been paid free of United Kingdom estate duty save in so far as that duty was satisfied by the payment of Canadian succession duty out of the pecuniary legacies and annuities.

The amount paid in respect of Canadian succession duty was, to my mind, none the less for the present purpose a payment of United Kingdom estate duty because under the terms of the order it served the double purpose of discharging both the Canadian succession duty and also a like amount of United Kingdom estate duty.

A The matter can, I think, be put in another way which leads to substantially the same conclusion. By virtue of the directions in the will the liability for the whole of the United Kingdom estate duty attributable to the Canadian estate was thrown on the residue of that estate in exoneration of the proportion so attributable of the pecuniary legacies and annuities. The directions in the will did not, however, extend to Canadian succession duty, and, therefore, on the basis of the concession of counsel for the pecuniary legatee, so much of that duty as was attributable to the pecuniary legacies and annuities had to be paid out of those legacies and annuities. But by virtue of the Double Taxation Order the effect of such payment was to discharge at the expense of the pecuniary legatees and annuitants a like amount of the United Kingdom estate duty which, according to the terms of the will, the residuary legatee was to bear. Therefore, the credit against United Kingdom estate duty secured under art. V of the Double Taxation Order by the payment of Canadian succession duty out of the pecuniary legacies and annuities should enure for the benefit of the pecuniary legatees and annuitants in order to give full effect to the direction in the will whereunder the whole of the United Kingdom estate duty on the Canadian estate fell to be borne by the residuary legatee. It was not, I think, disputed that, if there had been no special directions at all in the will concerning death duties, so that each of the pecuniary legacies and annuities had to bear its due proportion of the United Kingdom estate duty attributable to the Canadian estate, the credit against such United Kingdom estate duty secured under art. V of the Double Taxation Order by payment out of each pecuniary legacy or annuity of its due proportion of the Canadian succession duty would have enured for the benefit of the pecuniary legatee or annuitant concerned (which appears to have been the effect of the decision in the second judgment in Re Cunliffe-Owen (1)). I do not see why the result should be any different because the pecuniary legacies and annuities were given free of United Kingdom estate duty, for the effect of this quoad the Canadian estate was to give to each pecuniary legatee or annuitant an additional benefit out of the Canadian estate in the shape of the proportion of the United Kingdom estate duty on the Canadian estate which his or her legacy or annuity would otherwise have had to bear, and inasmuch as payment of the Canadian succession duty on such legacy or annuity operated to discharge a like amount of United Kingdom estate duty, payment of the former duty out of such legacy or annuity would have the effect of depriving the legatee or annuitant of a corresponding part of the additional benefit to which he or she was entitled under the terms of the will, if such payment was not counterbalanced by giving to him or her the benefit of the credit against the United Kingdom estate duty which it had secured by virtue of the provisions of the Double Taxation Order. Perhaps the simplest way of putting the point—I trust it is not an oversimplification—is to describe the effect of the Double Taxation Order as being in substance to preserve the liability of the Canadian estate to assessment to United Kingdom estate duty at the full appropriate rate of sixty-five per cent., but to make the Canadian succession duty payable out of the amount of the United Kingdom estate duty as so assessed.

I conclude, therefore, that the whole of the United Kingdom estate duty at the appropriate rate of sixty-five per cent. on the Canadian estate should be borne by the residuary legatee and that she is not entitled to throw on the pecuniary legatees and annuitants the proportion of it which was satisfied by the payment of, or, in other words, was applied in payment of, the Canadian succession duty on the pecuniary legacies and annuities. The argument for the residuary legatee proceeds on the footing that the effect of the Double Taxation Order is to make the Canadian estate liable to (i) United Kingdom estate duty reduced by the amount of the Canadian succession duty, and (ii) Canadian succession duty; that by the terms of the will the pecuniary legatees and annuitants are relieved of the reduced United Kingdom estate duty, but not of the Canadian succession duty; and, accordingly, that, while the residuary legatee must bear the former, the pecuniary legatees and annuitants must bear their due proportions of the latter. I reject this argument as involving a departure from the actual terms of the Double Taxation Order, which does not reduce the amount of the United Kingdom estate duty, but allows the payment of Canadian succession duty as a credit against, or, in other words, treats it as discharging a like amount of, the full United Kingdom estate duty. For the reasons I have endeavoured to state, I would allow the appeal and vary the declarations made by the learned judge as regards Canadian succession duty so as to give effect to the conclusion above expressed.

I feel I should add that in the course of the argument a suggestion which counsel for the pecuniary legatee felt unable to support was made to the effect that, irrespective of any special direction in the will and independently of the provisions of the Double Taxation Order, the Canadian succession duty might, perhaps, properly be regarded simply as part of the cost of getting in the Canadian estate, and as such falling on residue generally. This is not a case of a specific gift of property situated in a foreign country and attracting duty by virtue of the laws of that country, or a gift to a legatee domiciled or resident abroad which attracts duty in the hands of the legatee under the law of his or her domicile or place of residence. It is simply a case in which property situated in Canada has passed under a general residuary devise and bequest in the English will of a testatrix domiciled and resident here, and in which this country is the appropriate forum of administration. The residue, including the Canadian estate, is given on the usual trusts for sale and conversion and payment of funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and pecuniary legacies and annuities and the United Kingdom duties thereon, and subject to these payments in trust for the respondent residuary legatee. To get in the Canadian estate and make it available for application as above, the executors had to pay the Canadian succession duty. It is true that under the law of Canada the duty in question was assessed on the beneficial interests, and according to that law would fall ultimately to be borne by the beneficiaries concerned, the extent of their beneficial interests in the Canadian estate being ascertained by treating them as provided rateably out of the net Canadian and English estates, and the rates of duty varying with the relationship of the beneficiaries to the testatrix. But it does not necessarily follow that these features of the Canadian fiscal law, involving as they do a wholly artificial apportionment of debts and benefits as between the Canadian and English estates should be imported into an English administration, and the alternative course of treating the amount of the Canadian duty simply as part of the cost of getting in the Canadian estate, without regard to the peculiarities of the local law as to mode of assessment and incidence, would certainly have the merit of simplicity.

The possible view to which I am now calling attention is supported by Peter v. Stirling (2) and Re Maurice (3), and, particularly, the latter case, where an Australian duty assessed by reference to the ages of the beneficiaries was held payable out of the estate as a whole and not out of the respective interests of the beneficiaries in accordance with the amounts assessed on them in Australia. Those two cases were distinguished by SWINFEN EADY, J., in Re Brewster (4), which was a case of a specific devise, on trusts separate from those of the residuary estate, of land in Melbourne, Victoria, Australia, in which it was held that the local death duties and other costs of realising the Melbourne property fell on that property and not on residue. Peter v. Stirling (2) was also distinguished by WARRINGTON, J., in Re Scott (5), where it was held that the French mutation duty on chattels situated in France should be borne by the specific legatees thereof and not by residue, and the decision of WARRINGTON, J., was upheld in the Court of Appeal. But there is nothing in the judgment of SWINFEN EADY, J., in Re Brewster (4) or of WARRINGTON, J., or the Court of Appeal in Re Scott (5) to suggest that Peter v. Stirling (2) and Re Maurice (3) were wrongly decided. On the contrary, the explanation given by WARRINGTON, J., in Re Scott (5) ([1914] 1 Ch. 854, 855) of the ratio decidendi in Peter v. Stirling (2) seems to me to bring it fairly close to the present case, and his judgment was affirmed without qualification in the Court of Appeal. As the point has not been argued in the present case, and if made good would lead to the same conclusion as I have reached on other grounds, I express no opinion about it one way or the other, but merely refer to it lest this judgment, which is framed in accordance with the arguments presented, should be regarded as implicitly concluding it if raised in any future case.

In conclusion, I would associate myself with the reservation made by ROMER, L.J., at the end of his judgment in regard to possible arguments as to the effect on the construction and operation of testamentary directions as to death duties of the abolition of legacy and succession duties brought about by the Finance Act, 1949, s. 27. So far as the present will is concerned, I find nothing in the Act of 1949 to affect the conclusion expressed above on this aspect of the case, and no argument founded on it was presented to us on the appellant's behalf.

ROMER, L.J. (read by JENKINS, L.J.): I am in full agreement with the reasons on which JENKINS, L.J., has founded his conclusion that this appeal should be allowed. It is as well, however, that I should shortly state my opinion on the question whether a gift of a legacy "free of death duties" or even "free of all death duties" suffices, without more, to exonerate the bequest not only from United Kingdom duties, but also from those imposed in respect of the gift under the laws of a foreign state. In my judgment, an exonerating provision in either of the above terms, if found in a will, executed in Great Britain and in accordance with the testamentary formalities required by our law, of a domiciled British subject is prima facie confined in its operation to death duties exigible by the laws of this country, but if, in any given case, there are attendant circumstances of a quality and degree sufficient to show beyond reasonable doubt that the testator must have intended to include freedom from foreign duties also, then effect will be given to the intention so disclosed.

This view is in substance that which commended itself to WYNN-PARRY, J., in Re Cunliffe-Owen (1). I agree with the observations of BENNETT, J., in Re Norbury (6)—though it is true, I think, that what he said went further than that case required—as to the probable ignorance of British testators of duties payable on death under foreign systems of taxation. The fiscal legislation of this country is a matter of which a testator can from time to time inform himself, and he can, accordingly, by codicil, remove or alleviate such burden as he may have imposed by his will on his residuary estate in favour of the pecuniary legatees if he considers that, by reason of changes in the law, that burden will prove too heavy at his death. I doubt, however, whether the average testator knows (nor can he easily ascertain) much about the death duty legislation in the foreign country or countries where some of his assets may be situate, or where the legatees reside, and much less will he know what changes may occur in such legislation between the dates of his will and of his death. Nor, indeed, can he know, when he makes his will, where the legatees will be living when his death brings it into operation. In these circumstances it would be difficult for him to keep the same balance as between the pecuniary and residuary legatees which changes in foreign fiscal legislation might render desirable as he could keep in relation to similar legislative changes at home. Accordingly, I cannot but think that in the absence of some clear direction to the contrary in the will, or of sufficiently compelling attendant circumstances, it is a safe and right assumption that British duties, and those alone, are within the ambit of words of exoneration such as those to which I have referred. In the present case, this assumption is, in my opinion, fortified by the express reference which the testatrix made to what was then a British duty ("free of legacy duty and all other duties"), and as I agree with JENKINS, L.J., that the surrounding or attendant circumstances are quite insufficient to show that the testatrix had Canadian succession duty also in mind the prima facie rule must, in my judgment, be applied.

I would add, in conclusion, that what I have said is quite without prejudice to any arguments that may be addressed to the court in any future case based on the change in death duties which was effected by the Finance Act, 1949. That statute was not discussed or even referred to by either side on the present appeal.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree with JENKINS, L.J., that this appeal should be allowed for the reasons which he gives on the assumption that the words of cl. 3 of the will do not apply to Canadian succession duty. I would, however, myself like to reserve this latter question, and, in particular, whether there is a rule as laid down by WYNN-PARRY, J., and accepted by my brethren. In the first decision relied on BENNETT, J., said he supposed not many English testators knew much about death duties imposed by the laws of foreign countries. I think such knowledge would be a good deal more widespread now. It may be that the express reference to a specific English duty in the present formula might limit the general words. If, however, one takes a bequest of £5,000 to "X" free of "all death duties" or "death duties", I would like to be free to construe those or similar words unassisted by any rule. Having regard to the fairly common incidence of "double" death duties I would myself have been inclined to construe the words as meaning all death duties which, but for this provision, would diminish the £5,000. To say that it would have been easy for a testator to make clear that he meant foreign duties, assumes that he knows the rule that, for example, "all" may mean "British". If he did not know the rule, he might well think that "death duties" meant any death duties that might otherwise diminish his legacies. The question may well depend on whether the testator is presumed to be calculating what will remain in residue or expressing sufficiently clearly an intention that the legatee shall get the sum stated. In the present case, it is not necessary to decide the question, but on the grounds suggested I would regard it as open for this court. I agree that the appeal should be allowed in the sense indicated by JENKINS, L.J.

Appeal allowed.

HOLE v. CUZEN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), December 17, 18, 1952.]

Bankruptcy—Tenancy—Premises subject to Rent Acts—Rent paid in excess of recoverable rent—Bankruptcy of landlord—Right of tenant to deduct amount of rent overpaid from rent payable to trustee—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 14 (1).

A Premises to which the Rent Acts applied were let to a tenant at a rent in excess of that lawfully recoverable under the Acts. A receiving order having been made against the landlord, a trustee in bankruptcy was appointed who claimed from the tenant arrears of rent. The tenant claimed the right under s. 14 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, to deduct the overpayments of rent from the rent payable to the trustee.

B HELD: the reversion expectant on the determination of the tenant's interest vested in the trustee subject to all the rights of the tenant, including his rights under s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1920, and, therefore, the tenant was entitled to deduct the rent overpaid from rent payable by him to the trustee after the bankruptcy.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE ARCHER made at Hastings County Court on Oct. 7, 1952, in an action for arrears of rent.

G The claim was made by the landlord's trustee in bankruptcy, and the tenant sought to deduct, under s. 14 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, rent previously paid to the landlord in excess of the rent recoverable under that Act. The trustee contended that he was not liable in respect of any overpayment of rent made to the landlord before the trustee's appointment. The county court judge, considering himself bound by a dictum of COHEN, L.J., in Kitchen's Trustee v. Madders (2) ([1949] 2 All E.R. 1087), gave judgment for the trustee for the full amount of recoverable rent accrued since the bankruptcy.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I will ask JENKINS, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

JENKINS, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE ARCHER concerning the right claimed by the tenant to deduct in respect of his tenancy of 27, Magdalen Road, St. Leonards, rent overpaid by him to the landlord in excess of the rent lawfully recoverable under the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts. It appears that, whereas the standard rent of the premises under the Acts was 15s. 6d. and there were permitted increases which brought the rent up to a maximum of 19s. 5½d., in fact a substantially larger weekly rent was reserved and paid. In the ordinary way there would be no difficulty in the matter as the provisions of s. 14 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, would enable the tenant, having made these overpayments, to recover them from the landlord to whom they were made, or, alternatively, to deduct them from subsequent rent payable, at all events, to that landlord. The difficulty in the present case is that on Aug. 23, 1951, a receiving order was made against the landlord, and on Sept. 21, 1951, the plaintiff was appointed the landlord's trustee in bankruptcy. The question thus arises whether the right of deduction given by s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1920 is exercisable against the trustee in bankruptcy of the landlord?

Section 14 (1) provides:

"Where any sum has, whether before or after the passing of this Act, been paid on account of any rent or mortgage interest, being a sum which is by virtue of this Act, or any Act repealed by this Act, irrecoverable by the landlord or mortgagee, the sum so paid shall be recoverable from the landlord or mortgagee who received the payment or his legal personal representative by the tenant or mortgagor by whom it was paid, and any such sum, and any other sum which under this Act is recoverable by a tenant from a landlord or payable or repayable by a landlord to a tenant, may, without prejudice to any other method of recovery, be deducted by the tenant or mortgagor from any rent or interest payable by him to the landlord or mortgagee."

In conjunction with those provisions it is necessary to look at s. 12 (1) (f) of the Act, which provides:

"The expressions 'landlord', 'tenant', 'mortgagee', and 'mortgagor' include any person from time to time deriving title under the original landlord, tenant, mortgagee, or mortgagor."

If the expressions "the landlord" where it occurs at the end of s. 14 (1) in the passage "may, without prejudice . . . be deducted by the tenant or mortgagor from any rent or interest payable by him to the landlord or mortgagee" means, in accordance with the definition, the landlord or any person from time to time deriving title under him, it would seem that the claim of the trustee in bankruptcy would be fraught with great difficulty for, on that construction, the statute would have provided a statutory right of deduction in terms exercisable against the landlord for the time being which would, so far as I can see, include the trustee in bankruptcy as one of the possible successors in title of a landlord. There is, however, some authority to the effect that the expression "the landlord" in that passage is limited by the context to the landlord who receives the excess payment. That authority is provided by the Irish case of Murray v. Webb (1) where it was held that on its true construction the expression "the landlord" in that passage was confined to the landlord who had been overpaid. Speaking for myself, I desire to keep that question of construction open for determination if and when it becomes necessary to decide it in some other case. For the purposes of the present case, I am prepared to assume that the construction placed on it by the Irish court was the right one so that the only right of deduction given by s. 14 (1) is a right of deduction against the overpaid landlord as distinct from a successor in title to the overpaid landlord. Counsel for the tenant invited us, in effect, to deal with the matter on that footing, and that is how I propose to deal with it.

The learned judge came to the conclusion that the right of deduction claimed to be exercisable by the tenant was not, as contended by the tenant, available against the trustee in respect of rent accrued to the trustee from the time of the bankruptcy. The note of his reasons is in these terms:

“Although there is no reference to or argument on s. 14, it appears that what COHEN, L.J., held in Kitchen's Trustee v. Madders (2) involves the point in his judgment at the end where he deals with the sum recoverable.”

A Accordingly, the learned judge rejected the tenant's contention and gave judgment in favour of the trustee for the full amount of recoverable rent accrued since the bankruptcy claimed by the tenant.

In Kitchen's Trustee v. Madders (2) there was a claim in respect of rent over-paid of a similar nature to the claim in the present case. The trustee in bankruptcy of a landlord sued the defendants for five quarters' rent due under a tenancy granted to them by the landlord. Two of those quarters' rent had accrued due before the bankruptcy, and three had accrued due after the bankruptcy. In the court below the case had been argued with reference to a set-off claimed in respect of an entirely different matter into which I need not now enter, but in this court the defendants were allowed to introduce by amendment a claim to the effect that the premises comprised in the tenancy were subject to the protection of the Rent Acts and that the rent claimed by the trustee was in excess of the recoverable rent, and, moreover, that the defendants had paid rent in excess of the recoverable rent, and were, therefore, entitled to deduct or set-off the excess payments they had made against the rent claimed by the trustee. The effect of the deduction or set-off they claimed to make, as I understand it, was to exhaust the two quarters' rent claimed in respect of periods prior to the bankruptcy and to leave a balance of overpaid rent amounting to £20 which they sought to set off against the rent accrued due after the bankruptcy. There seems to have been no argument addressed to the court on the point which has been debated before us. COHEN, L.J., after referring to the amendment raising the defence based on the Rent Acts, and discussing and deciding in favour of the defendants the question whether the premises were a dwelling-house to which the Act applied, continued ([1949] 2 All E.R. 1087):

“It seems to me that those facts reinforce the conclusion that SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., came to and that there is nothing in the terms of the lease which can prevent us holding that at the material time this house was a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939. The result is that the rent was payable only at the rate of £140 per annum instead of at the rate of £500 per annum. On that basis counsel for the defendants claims that the sum recoverable, instead of being £625, should be £85. In making that calculation, however, he went too far, because he tried to set off the £90 which his clients had overpaid for the quarter's rent which they had paid in advance, not only against the first two quarters' rent, as to which it was clearly a proper subject-matter of set off, but also to the extent of £20 against the rental accrued due after the commencement of this action.”

The words “after the commencement of this action” should, I think, have been “after the commencement of the bankruptcy”. The learned lord justice continued (ibid.):

“For the reasons I have already given I do not think the set off can be applied as regards the last three quarters' rent. In my view, therefore, the proper sum for which judgment should be entered for the plaintiff is £105.”

As I understand it, “the reasons already given”, as the learned lord justice called them, were, in effect, these. He said (ibid., 1084):

"As to the last three quarters' rent which accrued due after the commencement of the bankruptcy, there was, I think, no mutuality, and, therefore, there could be no set off."

The learned lord justice was referring there to a claim to set-off an amount entirely different from the excess rent, namely, a judgment debt which would, apart from the bankruptcy, have been recoverable against the debtor. The ground for refusing a set-off was that there was no mutuality because the judgment debt had become due from the debtor before the bankruptcy whereas the rent against which it was sought to set it off was rent accrued after the bankruptcy. Again (ibid., 1085), the learned lord justice said:

"Here we are considering instalments of rent which accrued due for the first time after the commencement of the bankruptcy. We are considering, therefore, debts which were never due to the bankrupt but which become due to the trustee. It seems to me in those circumstances impossible to say that there is such mutuality between the claim for rent due to the trustee and the claim for fraudulent misrepresentation against the bankrupt as to found a right to set off within s. 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. For these reasons I think HARMAN, J., was right when he rejected the defence based on set off."

Accordingly, if I am not mistaken, all that was decided in Kitchen's Trustee v. Madders (2), which has any bearing on the present case, was that where rent had been overpaid in respect of premises subject to the Rent Acts, the resulting claim was not a proper matter for set-off under s. 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, against rent accruing due to the trustee subsequent to the commencement of the bankruptcy. The argument which has been addressed to us, based on the language of s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1920 and the statutory right of deduction for which it provides, does not appear to have been raised at all, and, therefore, notwithstanding the decision in Kitchen's Trustee v. Madders (2), I conceive that the point is open in this court.

Counsel's argument for the tenant, which I summarise on the assumption that the narrow construction of the expression "the landlord" where it last appears in s. 14 (1), is the right one, is, in effect, of this nature. All the property of the bankrupt vested in the trustee. That included, among other things, the reversion expectant on the determination of the tenant's interest in 27, Magdalen Road, St. Leonards. The trustee thus became entitled to receive whatever rent was payable by the tenant in respect of the premises, but the reversion passed to the trustee, not only with that right, but also subject to the statutory obligation which the landlord was under to submit to the deduction from the rent currently payable of rent previously paid in excess of the lawfully recoverable rent.

In his submission, that argument was supported by the reasoning which underlies the decision of this court in Bendall v. McWhirter (3). In that case a deserted wife was living in the matrimonial home which was the property of the husband. The husband was adjudicated bankrupt, and the freehold of the house vested in his trustee in bankruptcy. The trustee brought an action to recover possession and mesne profits against the wife as a trespasser from the date of the adjudication in bankruptcy. The learned county court judge made an order for possession. On appeal it was held in this court, first, that a deserted wife in occupation of the matrimonial home had a personal licence, revocable by her husband only by obtaining an order of the court under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and, secondly, that where the matrimonial home was a freehold house which vested in the husband's trustee in bankruptcy under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, the trustee took the house subject to the wife's licence and could not obtain possession of it without an order of the court made on an application for possession under

s. 105 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. ROMER, L.J., with whom SOMERVELL, L.J., agreed, said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1317):

“ . . . a trustee takes no better title to property than the bankrupt had . . . [he] is no more entitled than was the debtor prior to his bankruptcy to revoke the wife's licence on his own authority and to sue her for possession of the property.”

- A That case deals with an entirely different set of circumstances, but, to my mind, it is of great assistance in the present case for this reason. The right of the wife and the obligation of the husband there under consideration were a personal right and a personal obligation depending on the relationship of husband and wife which subsisted between those two parties. Yet, it was held that the trustee in bankruptcy could not disregard the wife's interest.
- B That shows, I think, that, although it has been said in some cases that the trustee in bankruptcy is simply the assignee, like any other assignee, of all the property of a bankrupt divisible among the creditors, that unqualified statement does not provide a universally adequate definition of the trustee's position, for, if it was an exhaustive and accurate definition of his position, the decision in Bendall v. McWhirter (3) must, as it seems to me, have gone the other way. The wife there was in a position comparable with that of the tenant, and the husband was in a position comparable with that of the landlord, in the present case. The husband was under a personal obligation to his wife, based on their relationship, to permit her to remain in the matrimonial home. If the trustee was simply in the position of an ordinary assignee of the house, I should have thought there would be grave difficulty in seeing how there was any interest in the wife which could override his interest as assignee, for the husband's obligation to the wife was, as I have said, purely personal.
- D Accordingly, it matters not in the present case that, according to the construction of s. 14 (1) on which I am basing this judgment, the right of deduction claimed by the tenant here would not have been exercisable against an ordinary assignee of the landlord. As Bendall v. McWhirter (3) shows, the trustee in bankruptcy steps into the shoes of the debtor and takes the debtor's property subject to all clogs or fetters or liabilities affecting it in the hands of the debtor himself. The position is well stated in the passage from HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 2, p. 209, referred to by ROMER, L.J., in Bendall v. McWhirter (3):

- E “ The property of the bankrupt passes to the trustee in the same plight and condition in which it was in the bankrupt's hands, and is subject to all the equities and liabilities which affected it in the bankrupt's hands, and to all dispositions which have been validly made by the bankrupt, and to all rights which have been validly acquired by third persons at the commencement of the bankruptcy, unless the property which the trustee takes is released by some express provision of the bankruptcy law.”

- F “ The property of the bankrupt passes to the trustee in the same plight and condition in which it was in the bankrupt's hands, and is subject to all the equities and liabilities which affected it in the bankrupt's hands, and to all dispositions which have been validly made by the bankrupt, and to all rights which have been validly acquired by third persons at the commencement of the bankruptcy, unless the property which the trustee takes is released by some express provision of the bankruptcy law.”
- G Counsel for the trustee in his argument to the contrary, referred us to a number of well known cases on the question of the right of set-off, beginning with Titterton v. Cooper (4) which he cited to illustrate the position of the trustee in bankruptcy in regard to leasehold property of the debtor. He used it, in effect, to support the proposition that the trustee in bankruptcy comes in like any other assignee by a new title which, in the absence of disclaimer, may make him personally liable for the rent under the lease, but he is not liable for any breach of covenant happening before his appointment. It is suggested that, similarly, in the present case the trustee, coming in on his appointment as assignee of the reversion subject to the tenant's tenancy, was not liable for or concerned with any matter such as the overpayment of rent to the bankrupt landlord which had happened before his appointment. Nearer the actual question is Alloway v. Steere (5) where the tenant was a tenant from year to year of a farm on the terms that, at the expiration of the tenancy, he should be paid by the landlord allowances for tillages and cultivation according to the custom of the country. The tenant went bankrupt, and a trustee was appointed, who did not disclaim the tenancy, but carried on the business of the farm for the benefit of the creditors until the tenancy was determined by notice to quit. The tenant's estate was sufficient to indemnify the trustee against any personal liability in respect of the tenancy. In an action to recover the value of tillages and cultivation by the trustee during his tenancy, according to the custom, it was held that the landlord was not entitled to set off against the trustee's claim rent accrued due from the debtor before the liquidation proceedings. The matter was very fully argued on behalf of the landlord by Mr. Vaughan Williams and I should, perhaps, read some of the passages in the judgments which are relied on by counsel for the trustee in the present case. In his judgment DENMAN, J., referred to Re Sneezum. Ex p. Davis (6) and said (10 Q.B.D. 27):

"In that case the question was not as to the right of set-off, but as to the right of proof—a wholly different thing. There may be a right here on the part of the landlord to prove for his rent, but that fact creates no analogy between the cases. No case has gone the length of deciding that where the trustee takes to a lease or tenancy, and carries on the business of the farm, and becomes entitled to get from the landlord a return of monies which have been expended for the benefit of the farm, the landlord shall have, not only his right of proof against the debtor's estate, but shall also be entitled to set-off against monies actually expended by the trustee in tillage and cultivation, of which the landlord gains the benefit, sums due from the debtor for rent accruing before the commencement of the trustee's interest."

MANISTY, J., said (ibid., 29):

"The relative rights and liabilities of the landlord and the trustee appear clearly from the case of Titterton v. Cooper (4), where the whole question was fully considered, and the conclusion arrived at by the Court of Appeal was that a trustee in bankruptcy, not disclaiming, was in the position of an ordinary assignee of the lease, and as such liable for the rent, and for the performance of the covenants during the time the lease was vested in him . . . Supposing it had been the case of an ordinary assignment; the assignee of the tenancy is bound under his contract to go on spending money on the farm, of which the landlord obtains the benefit; on what principle could it be said that when the tenancy comes to an end the landlord has a right of equitable set-off in respect of rent accrued due before the assignment, or in respect of damages for breach of covenant or contract accruing before the assignment? The statute has made no provision that there should be any such right of set-off in the case of bankruptcy, and I cannot see upon any principle or authority how the defendant's claim to a set-off can be supported; the plaintiff being, as I have said, in the same position as any other assignee."

As I have already observed, I think that last statement—that the plaintiff is in the same position as any other assignee—as a general proposition is too widely expressed, and is not entirely accurate to describe the position of a trustee in bankruptcy in all circumstances.

We were also referred by counsel for the trustee to Re Wilson. Ex p. Lord Hastings (7). That was another case of an agricultural tenancy where the tenant went bankrupt, and the question again arose as to setting off rent against the outgoing valuation. The interesting point about that case was that the result was the opposite of Alloway v. Steere (5) on account of a custom in the county of Norfolk. I think the effect of the decision is sufficiently stated in the headnote (10 Morr. 219):

A “Held:—That under s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the landlord had no right to set off the one sum against the other. But that the court was of opinion on the evidence that as a matter of fact, according to the custom of the county of Norfolk, the amount payable by the landlord in respect of valuation to the outgoing tenant was not the absolute value put by the valuers on the subject-matter of the valuation, but was the balance of that sum after deducting any arrears of rent; and that that being so, the landlord in the present case was not liable to pay any part of the £271 to the trustee.”

So that there, by custom, the tenant's right was to receive only the balance represented by the amount of the valuation less the arrears of rent, and that custom was held binding on the trustee in bankruptcy.

B Counsel for the trustee claimed, in effect, that the present case does not differ from cases concerned with set-off such as those to which I have referred. He said that, on the principle of Alloway v. Steere (5), there can be no right of set-off in the present case, that the claim in respect of overpaid rent had been converted simply into a right of proof, and that any other method of recovering it was barred by s. 7 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. He claimed C that it would be contrary to the principles of the bankruptcy legislation to give the tenant the right of deduction claimed, which would, in effect, give him an undue preference over the general body of creditors.

In my view, the argument of counsel for the tenant should prevail in this case. I accept all that counsel for the trustee says so far as ordinary cases of set-off are concerned, but this is not an ordinary case of set-off. Here there is a statutory right given to the tenant to deduct the overpayment of rent from the rent D currently payable until overpayments are satisfied. The effect of that is that, as against the landlord who was overpaid, namely, the bankrupt landlord in the present case, the tenant was entitled, by virtue of s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1920, to remain in the premises rent free until such time as the amount of the lawfully recoverable rent accruing due under the tenancy should have sufficed to recoup to the tenant the amount of the overpaid rent. Applying the principle stated E in Bendall v. McWhirter (3), I see no reason why a right of that sort should not be binding on the trustee in bankruptcy of the landlord or why the trustee in bankruptcy should, in regard to such a right, be in any better position than the bankrupt personally would have been. In my view, the reversion expectant on the determination of the tenant's interest vested in the trustee in bankruptcy subject to all the rights of the tenant, including, in particular, the F tenant's right under s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1920 to be considered, in effect, as between himself and the bankrupt landlord as having paid rent in advance up to the amount of the rent in fact paid in excess of the rent lawfully recoverable under the Act. For these reasons, as, in my view, the point cannot be regarded as having been concluded in Kitchen's Trustee v. Madders (2) against the contention now advanced by counsel for the tenant, I would allow G this appeal.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree with the conclusion to which JENKINS, L.J., has come and with the reasons he has given for it. I only want to add that I can quite understand that the learned county court judge should feel he ought to follow the statement in Kitchen's Trustee v. Madders (2). But in this H court, for the reasons JENKINS, L.J., has given, the point is, in my opinion, open for us to consider.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Contract—Unenforceable contract—Uncertainty of term—Agreement “subject to force majeure conditions”—Variety of force majeure conditions in trade—No concluded agreement.

A

A purported oral agreement for the sale of goods was evidenced by a contract note signed by the defendants which contained the following clause: “Conditions, prime quality bars to B.S.S. 15 specification. Bundled in one ton lots and subject to force majeure conditions that the government restricts the export of the material at the time of delivery”. There were a variety of force majeure conditions in the trade. In an action for damages for repudiation of the alleged agreement,

HELD: the words “force majeure conditions” in the clause meant “clauses” or “stipulations”; the clause did not indicate to what force majeure conditions the words applied; and, therefore, they were so vague and uncertain as to be incapable of any precise meaning, and there was no enforceable agreement on which the plaintiff could rely.

Semhle: an agreement for sale, otherwise precise, which contains the phrase “subject to force majeure”, is a valid and enforceable contract.

ACTION for damages for repudiation of a contract and for a declaration.

The plaintiffs claimed damages against the defendants for repudiation of an agreement to sell to them two hundred tons of mild steel angles. They also claimed a declaration that they were entitled to be indemnified by the defendants against any claim which might be made against them by American sub-buyers by reason of their inability to deliver under a similar agreement to sell through the defendants' defaulting in their agreement. They alleged that the defendants had entered into the agreement for sale with knowledge that the plaintiffs intended to re-sell at a profit. The defendants brought in the third parties from whom they had purchased on similar, but not identical, terms, claiming a declaration of indemnity in respect of any damages which they might be held liable to pay to the plaintiffs and also damages in their own right. The third parties brought in the fourth parties from whom they had purchased on similar, but not identical, terms, also claiming an indemnity in respect of damages which they might be held liable to pay and damages.

H

The plaintiffs alleged that they and the defendants had entered into either (i) an oral agreement of Dec. 11, 1950, evidenced by a contract note of that date signed by the defendants and a letter of Dec. 12, 1950, from the plaintiffs to the defendants, of which the contract note constituted an admission by the defendants of the terms of the agreement; or (ii) a contract in writing constituted by the contract note and the letter. The contract note read:

"We confirm having sold you the following material:

- A Description, Mild steel angles [Then the specification was set out]
Quantity, two hundred tons; price, £32 15s. per ton, f.o.b. London/
 Liverpool; delivery, in mid-March;
Terms, net cash against wharfingers' receipt and weighbridge ticket; Conditions, prime quality bars to B.S.S. 15 specification. Bundled in one ton lots and subject to force majeure conditions that the government
B restricts the export of the material at the time of delivery."

The plaintiffs' letter was as follows:

"We received your contract No. 1634 A dated Dec. 11, according to which we have bought from you the following materials."

- C The terms following were substantially, though not identically, those contained in the contract note. The defendants contended that there was no enforceable contract, the meaning of the words

"subject to force majeure conditions that the government restricts the export of material at the time of delivery"

- D being too uncertain. One of the documents relied on by the defendants against the third parties was a contract note signed by the defendants which read:

"We confirm having bought from you the following material".

There followed the description, quantity, price, delivery and terms as in the plaintiffs' contract note, except for a difference in the price, and under the heading "Conditions" the same conditions except that the final paragraph read:

- E "Certified free for export and subject to force majeure conditions."

The contractual documents as between the third parties and the fourth parties, so far as material, were identical with those as between the defendants and the third parties.

Goodenday for the plaintiffs.

- F M. Waters for the defendants.

Lord Hailsham for the third parties.

J. F. Donaldson for the fourth parties.

- G McNAIR, J., stated the facts, found as a fact that the contract note and letter did not constitute a written agreement, but purported to confirm a verbal contract already made, and continued: Accepting for a moment that the contract note constitutes an admission, the first question which I have to determine is whether or not the words

"subject to force majeure conditions that the government restricts the export of material at the time of delivery"

- H prevent the court from holding that any enforceable contract was made. In my judgment, they do. In the first place I consider that, whether the word "conditions" means "stipulations" or "clauses", on the one hand, or "contingencies" or "circumstances", on the other, the whole sentence is so vague and uncertain as to be incapable of any precise meaning and so to bring the case within the principles stated in the House of Lords in G. Scammell & Nephew, Ltd. v. Ouston (1) where VISCOUNT MAUGHAM said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 16):

"In order to constitute a valid contract, the parties must so express themselves that their meaning can be determined with a reasonable degree of certainty."

LORD WRIGHT said (ibid., 25) that the first ground on which the court ought to hold on the facts of that case that there was no contract was " . . . that the language used was so obscure and so incapable of any definite or precise meaning that the court is unable to attribute to the parties any particular contractual intention."

In the second place, however, I consider that the word "conditions" in this context as a matter of construction clearly means "clauses" or "stipulations" and not "contingencies" or "circumstances". If "conditions" means "contingencies" or "circumstances", the word adds nothing to the phrase "force majeure". Furthermore, such a construction would involve giving a different meaning to the word "conditions" where it appears in the phrase under construction from that which it bears in the side heading to that paragraph of the note. If, accordingly, as I hold, the word "conditions" means "clauses" or "stipulations", then, there being evidence given in the action before me that there were in the trade a variety of force majeure conditions, this case plainly falls within the line of authority of which Love & Stewart, Ltd. v. S. Instone & Co., Ltd. (2), where the House of Lords had to consider the effect of a contract containing the words "subject to strike and lock-out clauses", is an example, and also within the principle stated in Scammell v. Ouston (1) to which I have already referred (where the phrase was "upon hire-purchase terms") and Bishop & Baxter, Ltd. v. Anglo-Eastern Trading & Industrial Co., Ltd. (3), where the Court of Appeal, in considering a purported agreement (which contained the phrase "subject to . . . war clause"), held that, as the war clause took many forms and as there was no evidence that the parties had any particular form of clause in mind, there was no consensus ad idem, and, therefore, no completed contract. Those cases seem to me to establish that, notwithstanding that the parties may have thought and acted on the basis that a contract existed between them, no consensus ad idem will be held to exist where there still remains to be negotiated and agreed the exact form of the clauses or conditions referred to by the parties.

So far, I have considered the matter solely upon the basis of this contract note alone, but the matter was made even clearer by the evidence given on behalf of the defendants by Mr. Trup, their director, which established to my satisfaction that in the negotiations the parties must be taken to have used the term "conditions" in the sense I have indicated. Accordingly, the plaintiffs' claim against the defendants breaks down in limine on their failure to prove any concluded contract.

[HIS LORDSHIP said that if he had been satisfied that the parties had reached contractual certainty in the terms pleaded and that there had been a sufficient memorandum of the agreement to satisfy s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, he would have held that the defendants knew that the plaintiffs required the goods to re-sell at a profit, that the defendants had repudiated their contractual obligations, and that the plaintiffs would have been entitled to damages which he assessed at £250. As at present advised he would have refused the declaration asked for, inter alia following the decision of the Court of Appeal in Trans Trust S.P.R.L. v. Danubian Trading Co., Ltd. (4) with regard to declarations for an indemnity. HIS LORDSHIP referred to the facts in the case between the defendants and the third parties and continued:] For the reasons which I stated earlier, I am of opinion that the words "subject to force majeure conditions" preclude me from holding that any completed consensus ad idem was reached on the ground that, in this phrase, "conditions" means "clauses" or "stipulations" and not "contingencies" or "circumstances". Had I been of the opinion that the words had either of the latter meanings (i.e., meant either "contingencies" or "circumstances") I should not have acceded to the submission of counsel for the third parties that, on that hypothesis, the phrase was too vague to have contractual effect. Though many cases have been cited to me in which obvious difficulty has been experienced in construing the phrase "force majeure": see, in particular, Lebeaupin v. R. Crispin & Co. (5); in none of those cases was it considered that the phrase was too vague for construction. Nor would I have accepted the further submission that the phrase was too vague in the sense that it did not satisfy the legal consequences which would follow on proof of force majeure, i.e., whether it should be cancellation or dissolution. I am satisfied that an agreement for sale which was otherwise precise and contained the phrase "subject to force majeure" would be a valid and enforceable contract.

A [His Lordship held that, apart from the decision as to the meaning of "force majeure conditions", there would have been valid contracts as between the defendants and the third parties and as between the third parties and the fourth parties respectively, which had been repudiated by the third parties and the fourth parties respectively, and he assessed the defendants' damages at £400 and the third parties' damages on the basis of a price per ton of not less than £39 5s. at the date of the breach.]

H ACTION for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants at their steel foundry at Letchworth for various periods from 1940 to 1948. From July, 1940, to Oct. 22, 1944, he was engaged in alternate spells of two hours each in mixing dried sand, fresh sand, and a mixture known as bentonite, in a hopper, and shovelling mainly dry sand which was tipped out of moulds through a two-inch grill or grating on to a conveyor belt several feet below. A considerable amount of dust rose through the grating when the sand fell on the conveyor belt, and in January, 1942, the defendants installed an extractor plant which drew away the dust. From Oct. 23, 1944, to Sept. 21, 1945, the plaintiff was a foundry "slinger", taking castings and moulds with castings in them to gratings or grids over which the castings were knocked out. This was also, intermittently, a dusty process. From Dec. 30, 1946, to Apr. 5, 1948, he was a labourer in the shot blasting department, wheeling castings on a trolley into sand blasting or shot blasting cabinets, and, after the door of the cabinet had been closed and the shot blaster had shot the sand off the castings and opened the door, wheeling the trolley out with the castings on it. From Apr. 5, 1948, to Oct. 21, 1948, he was a "slinger" for the shot-blaster, bringing, with the assistance of the crane driver, castings on to the trolleys outside the shot blasting cabinet. If there was a great deal of sand on a casting he would strike it, while it was on its slings, on the ground or against another casting, and would knock off the biggest blocks of sand with a hammer. Both these operations were alleged to have caused considerable dust. In August, 1949, he was certified by the pneumoconiosis board to be suffering from pneumoconiosis, and he was found as a fact to have contracted pneumoconiosis in the course of his employment with the defendants by November, 1943. A B

The plaintiff contended that the defendants had failed to comply with the requirement of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 47 (1) that C

"... all practicable measures shall be taken to protect the persons employed against inhalation of the dust . . . and . . . where the nature of the process makes it practicable, exhaust appliances shall be provided and maintained, as near as possible to the point of origin of the dust . . ."

He further contended that the defendants had committed a breach of reg. 13 of the Grinding of Metals (Miscellaneous Industries) Regulations, 1925, which, he submitted, imposed an absolute duty to prevent the escape of dust from the cabinets. The defendants denied that they had been guilty of negligence or any breach of statutory duty. D

PARKER, J., said that counsel for the plaintiff pointed out, as was undoubtedly true, that at least three different standards were laid down under the Factories Act, 1937, and probably more. There was the standard which amounted to an absolute duty. That appeared in a number of sections and by means of various words, including in one section the words "effective measures". At the other end of the scale there were obligations which were to be discharged where reasonably practicable. That at once invoked a number of considerations apart from possibility, such as questions of cost and, probably, of practice. As had been said by the Court of Appeal in McCarthy v. Coldair, Ltd. (1), that expression probably came close to, or was equivalent to, the ordinary common law obligation of master and servant. In the middle there was an obligation, as here, to do something if it was practicable, and presumably "practicable" was something stricter than "reasonably practicable". The real question was: What did "practicable" mean? In WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY "practicable" was defined as "possible to be accomplished with known means or resources", and, though dealing with a different point, LORD GODDARD, in Lee v. Nursery Furnishings, Ltd. (2) ([1945] 1 All E.R. 389), adopted a definition in the OXFORD DICTIONARY of "capable of being carried out in action" or "feasible". It seemed to HIS LORDSHIP that "practicable" must impose a stricter standard than "reasonably practicable". Questions of cost might be eliminated under "practicable", but the measures must be possible in the light of current knowledge and invention. On the evidence he (His Lordship) was not satisfied that the pneumoconiosis was contracted as a result of any breach of statutory duty or common law duty on the part of the defendants. F G H

That left one further complaint. By reg. 13 of the Grinding of Metals (Miscellaneous Industries) Regulations, 1925, it was provided that

“Sand blasting shall not be done in any room except in an enclosed chamber or cabinet in which no other work is ordinarily performed and at which efficient means are provided, arranged and maintained to prevent the escape of dust to the outside of such chamber or cabinet.”

A As a matter of construction, that clearly imposed an absolute duty on employers with regard to preventing an escape of dust from these cabinets. That had been held in the Court of Session in McCorkindale v. Lion Foundry Co., Ltd. (3), but he would have come to the conclusion to which he had come quite apart from that decision. He was satisfied that there were dusty conditions outside the doors, but although technically, he supposed, one grain of dust coming out could be said to be a breach of reg. 13, in this case the cabinets were so well sealed and maintained that any escape which occurred was negligible.

NEWTON AND ANOTHER v. BIGGS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Morris, L.JJ.), December 17, 18, 1952.]

D Rent Restriction—Possession—House required by landlord—Landlord becoming such by purchase after Sept. 1, 1939—Purchase of house and granting of tenancy to vendor who remained in occupation—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), sched. I, para. (h), as amended by Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), sched. I.

E In 1947 the landlords entered into a contract to purchase a house of which the tenant was then the owner, vacant possession to be given to them of the ground floor and “the vendor [the tenant] . . . to pay to the purchaser [the landlords] the sum of 23s. per week inclusive for the upper floor . . .” The purchase was completed and the vendor remained in possession of the upper floor of the premises as tenant of the landlords. In 1952 the landlords served a notice to quit on the tenant, and on its expiry claimed possession of the upper floor on the ground that they reasonably required it for occupation as a residence for themselves, within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (h). The tenant objected that the landlords were not entitled to possession on that ground since they had become landlords by purchasing the house after Sept. 1, 1939, within the meaning of para. (h) as amended by sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939.

G HELD: the object of para. (h) was to protect a sitting tenant from having the house bought over his head; in the present case no tenancy was in existence at the time of the purchase of the house by the landlords; and, therefore, the landlords became landlords for the purposes of para. (h), not by purchasing the house after the statutory date, but as a consequence of their agreement to grant the tenant a tenancy of the upper floor if the purchase of the house were completed, and they were not excepted from the provisions of para. (h) which enable a landlord to recover possession of a house if he reasonably requires it for occupation as a residence for himself.

APPEAL by the landlords from an order of His Honour JUDGE TUDOR REES, sitting at Uxbridge County Court on Sept. 23, 1952, refusing the landlords an order for possession under the Rent Restrictions Acts, on the ground that the landlords had become landlords by purchase after Sept. 1, 1939.

Lodge for the landlords.

A. P. Fletcher for the tenant.

SINGLETON, L.J.: The learned county court judge had before him a claim by the landlords, Mr. and Mrs. Newton, for possession of the upper part of a house, No. 34, Colbrook Avenue, Hayes. The landlords are the owners of that house, and the defendant, William Arthur Biggs, is tenant of the upper floor of the premises, for which he pays a rent of 23s. a week to the plaintiffs. The tenancy, it is said, has been determined by a notice to quit which expired on Aug. 9, 1952, but the tenant has remained in possession as a statutory tenant although the landlords say that they reasonably require the premises for occupation as a residence for themselves. That is not admitted by the tenant, who claims the benefit of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

The tenant was formerly the owner of the house. By an undated agreement he sold it to the landlords in the year 1947 for £1,800. At some time after that agreement, probably on Oct. 31, 1947, the house was conveyed to the landlords. In the agreement for sale there are general conditions called National Conditions of Sale, and there are certain special conditions. The special conditions provide for the deposit and the date of completion, and special condition No. 9 is in these terms:

"The purchaser shall be given vacant possession of the ground floor with the joint use of the bathroom upstairs and the vendor is to pay to the purchaser the sum of 23s. per week inclusive for the upper floor of the premises."

A question arises as to what is the proper way to look at that condition, bearing in mind that completion took place, as provided in the agreement, shortly after the date of the agreement.

Section 3 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, provides:

"No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom shall be made or given unless the court considers it reasonable to make such an order or give such a judgment, and either—(a) the court has power so to do under the provisions set out in sched. I to this Act; or (b) the court is satisfied that suitable alternative accommodation is available for the tenant or will be available for him when the order or judgment takes effect."

Thus, if the case is covered by sched. I to the Act, it is not necessary for the court to consider whether or not there is suitable alternative accommodation, though the question of such accommodation is something which the court has before it in considering para. (h) of sched. I. It is important to bear that in mind when one has to apply the provisions of that part of sched. I to which our attention has been directed. Schedule I to the Act of 1933 is headed:

"Possession or ejectment without proof of alternative accommodation".

The schedule provides:

A "A court shall, for the purposes of s. 3 of this Act, have power to make or give an order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply or for the ejection of a tenant therefrom without proof of suitable alternative accommodation (where the court considers it reasonable so to do) if— . . . (h) the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlord (not being a landlord who has become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house or any interest therein after July 11, 1931), for occupation as a residence for—(i) himself; or (ii) any son or daughter of his over eighteen years of age; or (iii) his father or mother: Provided that an order or judgment shall not be made or given on any ground specified in para. (h) of the foregoing provisions of this schedule if the court is satisfied that having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including the question whether other accommodation is available for the landlord or the tenant, greater hardship would be caused by granting the order or judgment than by refusing to grant it."

C By s. 3 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, and sched. I to that Act the date mentioned in para. (h) of sched. I to the Act of 1933 was altered to Sept. 1, 1939, in the case of dwelling-houses brought within the Rent Restrictions Acts by the Act of 1939.

D It is said on behalf of the landlords that this case falls under para. (h) of sched. I in that the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlords for occupation as a residence for themselves. If that is shown, it becomes the duty of the learned county court judge to consider the questions arising on para. (h), and, in particular, to consider the proviso to para. (h) which I have just read. On behalf of the tenant it is claimed that para. (h) of sched. I, as amended, does not apply to this case, that submission being based on the words in para. (h):

"(not being a landlord who has become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house or any interest therein after [Sept. 1, 1939])."

E The tenant says that the landlords became landlords by purchasing the dwelling-house after Sept. 1, 1939.

F The real question for consideration is whether the landlords became landlords by purchasing the dwelling-house after the relevant date. They became owners on completing the purchase of the house; before that they had an agreement for purchase. The vendor retained the upper floor, and he became tenant to the purchasers at some time, but, though the purchasers became owners by purchase, it does not seem to me that they became landlords by purchasing the dwelling-house. There was the condition in the agreement under which the vendor had to pay to the purchasers the sum of 23s. a week inclusive for the upper floor of the premises. On completion the purchasers were able to give the vendor a tenancy of the upper floor of the premises which they had undertaken to give him if they purchased. They did purchase, and after the date of the purchase he became their tenant either by reason of the carrying out of the agreement or by the handing to him of a rent book in pursuance of the agreement. They did not become landlords, I think, by purchasing the dwelling-house.

G In Epps v. Rothnie (1) SCOTT, L.J., said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 147):

H " . . . the county court judge held, and in my view held rightly, that the plaintiff did not ' become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house '. The judge took the view, with which I agree, that the object of the exception in sched. I (h) is to protect a sitting tenant from having his house bought over his head, and it has no application to a case where an unoccupied house is purchased after the statutory date, and the owner thereafter lets it. In my opinion, the decision of the judge was right on this point . . . "

That case was considered by the Court of Appeal in Fowle v. Bell (2).

In my view, the bracketed words in para. (h) were inserted to prevent someone buying a house and turning out the sitting tenant under the provisions of para. (h). In the circumstances of the present case I do not think the words in brackets apply, for I do not consider that the landlords became landlords by purchasing the dwelling-house. It seems to me that this appeal must be allowed, and the case must go back for consideration of the other points which arise.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. The agreed statement of facts makes it plain that in October, 1947, the tenant was the owner of the whole of the premises. A contract, which is undated, gives the date of completion as Oct. 31, 1947, and, in view of the additional information we have had as to the date of the rent book, it would appear that completion did take place on that date and the rent book came into existence almost immediately afterwards. Condition 9 of the special conditions of sale reads in this way:

"The purchaser shall be given vacant possession of the ground floor with the joint use of the bathroom upstairs and the vendor is to pay to the purchaser the sum of 23s. per week inclusive for the upper floor of the premises."

Clearly, therefore, the tenant being the owner of the whole of the premises, there was no tenancy in existence at the time of this contract for sale, and the only question that we have to decide is whether the landlords became landlords by purchase.

I think the answer to that question is that they did not become landlords by purchase within the meaning of the section as it has been interpreted by decisions of the Court of Appeal. What, I think, was done by condition 9 was to make a term that a tenancy would be created. Counsel for the tenant submitted that the plaintiffs became landlords by purchase because, by reason of condition 9, the tenancy and the purchase were one indivisible transaction, and, therefore, by the mere act of purchase the tenancy came into existence at the same moment of time. I do not think that the construction of condition 9 supports that view. It is quite true that the provision that the vendor is to pay to the purchaser the sum of 23s. a week inclusive for the upper floor of the premises is included in the document by which the premises were to be sold, but I do not think it by any means follows that that means that the matters are one and indivisible. I think the plain common sense of this matter was that by condition 9 it was being said: "I will become the owner of the premises, but I will grant you a tenancy of the upper floor at the inclusive rent of 23s. a week."

My Lord has referred to the passage which occurs in the judgment of SCOTT, L.J., in Epps v. Rothnie (1), and I must refer to the further consideration given to this matter by the same learned lord justice in Fowle v. Bell (2) where he said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 669):

"In considering the bracketed exception to para. (h), we must bear in mind that it is found in an enabling provision which confers jurisdiction on the judge to order possession to be given to the landlord, and, therefore, if there be ambiguity in the exception, it ought to be construed in favour of the landlord and not against him. The phraseology seems to me necessarily to mean this, 'not being a landlord who, in relation to the tenant before the court, has become that tenant's landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house or any interest therein after' the given date. The exception so read would achieve what I cannot help thinking was the object of enacting it, namely, to prevent an outsider buying a house occupied by a tenant, giving the tenant notice to quit, and coming to the court for an order to get rid of him."

Then the learned lord justice goes on to deal with that situation.

In the present case it is true that the landlords became owners by purchase, and that, had they not purchased the premises, they would not have been in a position to grant a tenancy of any kind, but there is a world of difference between becoming owner by purchase and becoming a landlord by purchase within the meaning of para. (h), as interpreted by the Court of Appeal. In my view, this appeal ought to be allowed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree. The effect of the contract made in October, 1947, was that the landlords agreed to purchase the property and also that the tenant should have a tenancy as from the date of completion. Though the agreement for sale and the agreement for a tenancy were in the same document—and, no doubt, were parts of one transaction—the result was that the landlords agreed that when they became owners the tenant should become tenant. In those circumstances, in my judgment, the landlords did not become landlords of the tenant by purchasing. They became landlords because of the agreement that they had made with the vendor that the latter should become tenant when the landlords became owners.

Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., and ROMER, L.J.:—(i) It is not an objection to the sanction by the court of any proposed scheme in regard to trust property that its object or effect is or may be to reduce liability for tax (including death duties).

(ii) The court has power under its inherent jurisdiction to confer on trustees, quoad items of property vested in them, administrative powers to be exercised by them where a situation has arisen in regard to the property creating what may fairly be called an emergency. The power does not extend to changes or re-arrangements of the beneficial interests inter se as distinct from re-arrangements or reconstructions of the trust property itself, with two exceptions: (a) where a testator or settlor has so provided, particularly by way of a trust for accumulations, that the immediate beneficiaries have no fund for their present maintenance, the court will assume that the intention to provide for the family is so paramount that it will order maintenance in disregard of the trusts for accumulation; and (b) it must be taken (at any rate, since Re Trenchard [1902] 1 Ch. 378) that the court has a further power and jurisdiction to approve on behalf of persons interested under the trust who are under a disability (particularly infants) and persons who may hereafter become interested compromises proposed by or between persons beneficially interested under the trust who are sui juris, and to direct and protect trustees accordingly, and the word "compromise" should not be narrowly construed so as to be confined to compromises of disputed rights.

(iii) The object of the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57, was to secure that trust property should be managed as advantageously as possible in the interests of the beneficiaries, and, with that object in view, to authorise specific dealings with the property which the court might have felt itself unable to sanction under the inherent jurisdiction, either because no actual "emergency" had arisen or because of inability to show that the position which called for intervention was one which the creator of the trust could not reasonably have foreseen, but it was no part of the legislative aim to disturb the rule that the court will not re-write a trust or to add to such exceptions to that rule as had already found their way into the inherent jurisdiction.

Observations of WYNN-PARRY, J., in Municipal & General Securities Co., Ltd. v. Lloyds Bank, Ltd. ([1949] 2 All E.R. 944), approved.

(iv) The jurisdiction conferred by the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 64, is in some respects more ample in regard to the subject-matter to which it relates than that under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57. It is not restricted to practical steps of an administrative character, but a transaction, in order to fall within the section, must be shown to the satisfaction of the court to be for the benefit either of the settled land (or some part thereof) or of the persons interested under the settlement, but not necessarily of both. The transaction should affect or concern the settled land or any land, whether settled or not, and whether within or without England, and this requirement is satisfied by transactions indirectly as well as directly operating on the settled or other land, provided that in the former case the effect is real and substantial by ordinary common-sense standards.

(v) In the case of a settlement the trustees of which are trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925, but which no longer comprehends any unsold land, neither the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57, nor the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 65, applies.

By a deed of re-settlement dated Sept. 23, 1915, the settled properties, consisting of land in England, Northern Ireland, and Eire and invested capital moneys, were re-settled (a) to the use of the trustees during the life of A. on trust that if at the time of the recited trust taking effect in possession no act or event other than the exercise of any power conferred on A. should have been done or happened whereby the life estate thereby given to him under the trust premises or some part thereof would, if belonging absolutely to him, have become vested in or charged in favour of some other person or persons or a corporation, the trustees should allow A. to enter into and remain in possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the said premises during his life "or until some act or event as aforesaid should be done or happen"; (b) during such part of the life of A. as he should not be entitled to possession or receipt of the rents and profits the trustees should hold the same on discretionary trusts for A., his wife and children and remoter issue; (c) from and after the death of A. to the use of the first and other sons of A. successively according to seniority in tail male with remainder to the use of B. (A.'s brother) during his life, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of B. successively according to seniority in tail male with remainders over. The re-settlement gave to the tenant for life in possession powers of charging for jointure and portions. By a deed dated May 30, 1952, C., B.'s only son, disentailed the entirety of the settled property. A. was a bachelor aged fifty-eight years. A scheme was proposed whereby A. would surrender his interest for life in £700,000 (being the bulk of the capital moneys) so as to accelerate the interests in remainder, and would release such moneys from his powers of charging for jointure and portions. At the same time, B. would similarly release his life interest in favour of the remainderman, and also his powers of charging. In order to surmount the protective trusts, the scheme provided (i) that A.'s surrender of his interest should not be treated as causing a forfeiture of his life interest in the settled land, and (ii) that the trustees should be required to release the £700,000 from the discretionary trusts affecting them during A.'s life. To provide for the contingency of A.'s marriage and his having issue (a) a single premium policy of assurance would be taken out to assure to the trustees in the event of a son being born to A. £49,000 (calculated to make good the amount which would remain after payment of estate duty on £200,000), and (b) £20,000 war stock would be retained by the trustees to the intent that if and so long as there should at any time during A.'s life be in existence a wife or any issue of A., the trustees should pay the income thereof at their discretion for the maintenance or support of A.'s wife or issue. Of the £700,000 it was proposed that (i) £100,000 would be paid to A., (ii) £100,000 would be paid to B., and (iii) £500,000 would be employed to pay the premium on the said policy, and to provide the fund of war stock, and subject thereto would be held on the trusts of the re-settlement to take effect after the deaths of A. and B. Approval of the scheme (the object of which was to save estate duty) by the court was sought under its inherent jurisdiction or under the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 64 (1).

HELD: the scheme constituted a compromise which it was within the power of the court to sanction under its inherent jurisdiction, and the scheme should be approved; and, further, the court was competent to approve it, and ought to approve it, under s. 64 (1).

Re Trenchard ([1902] 1 Ch. 378), applied.

Decision of ROXBURGH, J. ([1952] 2 All E.R. 603), reversed.

By a settlement dated Mar. 15, 1944, P. and his wife Q. declared that certain land or the proceeds of sale thereof and such further assets as might from time to time be brought into the settlement ("the trust premises") should be held by trustees, subject as thereafter by cl. 3 and cl. 4 provided, for all or any child of the settlors' son R. who should attain the age of twenty-one years or die under that age leaving issue and if more than one in equal shares. By cl. 3, it was provided: "... that until the youngest child of [R.] shall have attained the age of twenty-five years if that event shall happen within twenty-one years from the date hereof or until the expiration of twenty-one years from the death of the survivor of the settlors if the youngest surviving child of the said [R.] shall not then have attained the age of twenty-five years the trustees shall retain the trust premises and shall apply such part as they in their discretion shall think fit of the income thereof for or towards common maintenance education or other benefits of the children of the said [R.] for the time being living whether minors or adults or for or towards the maintenance education or other benefit of any one or more of them to the exclusion of the other or others and shall (subject as hereinafter mentioned) accumulate the surplus of such income until the time for distribution by investing the same and the resulting income thereof in any investments hereby authorised in augmentation of the capital of the trust premises to be held upon the same trust as the original trust premises but so that the trustees may apply the accumulations of any preceding year or years in or towards the maintenance education or benefit of all or any of the said children in the same manner as such accumulations might have been applied had they been income arising from the original trust funds in the then current year. Provided always that after each child of [R.] has attained his or her majority the surplus income of his share in the trust premises not expended by virtue of the foregoing powers of this clause shall not be accumulated but shall be paid to such child." By cl. 4 the trustees had a discretionary power to advance up to one half of the expectant or presumptive or vested share of any child, whether minor or adult, of R. In order to save estate duty on the deaths of the settlors it was proposed that the trustees should with the sanction of the court advance their funds to the trustees of a new settlement which was to contain similar trusts, but omitting the provision for common maintenance contained in cl. 3.

HELD: the court had no jurisdiction under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57 (1), to sanction the scheme because it involved the alteration or re-moulding of the trusts; the scheme did not constitute a provision for maintenance or (DENNING, L.J., dissentiente) a compromise; and, therefore, was not within the two exceptions to the rule limiting the court's inherent jurisdiction to emergencies.

By a settlement dated Nov. 17, 1933, the settlor settled personalty on protective trusts for himself during his life, and subject thereto on trust for the children or remoter issue of the settlor as he should by deed or will appoint and in default for his children. Power was given to the settlor to appoint income to his widow. The ultimate remainder was for the general testamentary appointees of the settlor. The settlor was married and had one child, born on Dec. 28, 1951. The settlor proposed to surrender his life interest in one-half of the trust funds so as to accelerate the interests in reversion in that half and to release that half from his powers of appointment, on terms that the discretionary trusts during any part of the settlor's life as regards that half of the fund were wholly released and his life interest in the other half was not forfeited.

HELD: the court had no jurisdiction to sanction the scheme under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57 (1), because it could not fairly be described as a disposition or transaction in the "management or administration of the property vested in the trustees", but the scheme constituted a compromise which under its inherent jurisdiction the court was competent to approve.

Decision of ROXBURGH, J. ([1952] 2 All E.R. 647), reversed.

APPEALS.

In Re DOWNSHIRE'S SETTLED ESTATES, the plaintiff and second and third defendants appealed against an order of ROXBURGH, J., made on July 30, 1952, and reported [1952] 2 All E.R. 603. ROXBURGH, J., held that the court had no jurisdiction either under its inherent jurisdiction or under the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 64 (1), to authorise transactions proposed in relation to a settlement of land which had as their object the saving of estate duty.

Raymond Jennings, Q.C., and J. A. Brightman for the plaintiff, the tenant for life, and the second and third defendants, the tenant for life in remainder and a remainderman interested in capital.

Jopling for the first defendant, the trustee of the settlement.

Denys B. Buckley appeared as amicus curiae.

In Re CHAPMAN'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS, the plaintiffs appealed against an order of HARMAN, J., made on July 28, 1952. HARMAN, J., held that the court had no power, either under its inherent jurisdiction or under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57 (1), to sanction a scheme whereunder, with a view to saving estate duty, it was proposed that trustees should transfer the settled funds to the trustees of a new settlement, the trusts of which were similar to those of the existing settlement save that in the new settlement discretionary powers of maintenance had been excluded.

Gray, Q.C., and J. A. Armstrong for the plaintiffs, the settlors who were also two of the trustees, and the third trustee, and the first and second defendants, trustees.

J. F. Bowyer for the third, fourth and fifth defendants, infants.

Denys B. Buckley appeared as amicus curiae.

In Re BLACKWELL'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS, the plaintiff appealed from an order of ROXBURGH, J., made on July 31, 1952, and reported [1952] 2 All E.R. 647. ROXBURGH, J., held that a scheme which he was asked to sanction involving the variation of the trusts of a settlement could not be authorised under the general jurisdiction of the court or under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57 (1), which did not authorise a transaction not of an administrative character.

J. A. Brightman for the plaintiff, the tenant for life.

Rink for the third and fourth defendants, the trustees.

Denys B. Buckley appeared as amicus curiae.

The first and second defendants were not represented by counsel.

Dec. 17. The following judgments were read.

Cûr. adv. vult.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The judgment which I am about to read, which is the judgment in all three cases, is the judgment of ROMER, L.J., and myself.

These three appeals are concerned with the exercise by Her Majesty's judges sitting in chambers in the Chancery Division of their useful and characteristic jurisdiction in relation to trusts. In each case the question raised has been of the extent of the jurisdiction, not of the discretion which in every case undoubtedly regulates the exercise of the court's powers where the jurisdiction exists. The Court of Appeal has been required to review (for the first time for half a century) the extent of the court's inherent jurisdiction which was invoked in cases of this kind until the creation in 1925 of the statutory jurisdictions conferred by the Trustee Act and the Settled Land Act of that year. We have also been called on to examine those statutory jurisdictions, contained respectively in s. 57 of the former Act and s. 64 of the latter. In each of the three cases, the learned judges from whom the appeals have come, ROXBURGH, J., in the first and third, HARMAN, J., in the second, held that the orders sought were beyond their jurisdiction, whether inherent or statutory, to make. The

A distinction is, no doubt, a fine one between saying: "I have no jurisdiction to make the order sought", and: "Though jurisdiction exists, this is not a case or a case of a kind in which the jurisdiction should be exercised". But the distinction is there, and is a real distinction, and, as we have said, in each of the present three cases the decision of the learned judge took the form of the first of the two alternatives. In none of the cases was there any purported
B exercise of discretion, nor did either of the judges intimate (as we understand the judgments) that had he jurisdiction he would nevertheless in his discretion have refused to make the order asked.

The appeals raise, then, matters of considerable general importance affecting, as we have been told and do not doubt, many other cases now, or likely to come, before the judges in the Chancery Division, and it is necessary that we should
C express our views on the extent of the jurisdiction, inherent and statutory, at least so far as requisite for the decision of the three appeals. On these matters we have had the advantage of very full and careful arguments, and since in none of the cases was there any person or class of persons concerned to argue against the appellants' contentions, we thought it proper to suggest that counsel should be instructed on behalf of the Attorney-General to assist
D us as amicus curiae with such arguments as seemed to him proper. We are greatly indebted to Mr. Buckley, who appeared in each case in response to this suggestion.

We think it useful to preface our judgment with two general observations. The first is this. The Court of Chancery has over many centuries evolved in relation to its peculiar or "extraordinary" jurisdiction many salutary powers
E including the "inherent jurisdiction" invoked in the present cases. It has not in general been the practice of the court to attempt precise definitions of such powers and thereby to run the risk of imposing undue fetters on their future application: see, for example, per LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C., in Tate v. Williamson (1) (2 Ch. App. 60), in reference to the court's jurisdiction to give relief in cases of undue influence. In the present case we do not propose to F depart from the well-established practice.

Our second general observation is of a different character. In each of the present cases a principal object of the scheme presented to the court has been to achieve (so far as foresight can achieve it) a limitation of the future liability of the corpus of the trust property to serious diminution from estate duty. The high rates of taxation, in the form both of income tax and of death duties,
G is a phenomenon of the present generation. It must be taken as notorious that many persons, having families and free estates, so dispose of their estates as to reduce, within the law, liability for income tax during their lives and for death duties on their deaths, and in the recent case before this court of
H Re C.W.M. (2) a scheme for the settlement and disposition of the property of a person of unsound mind having for one of its main objects limitation of liability for death duties was approved by this court in the exercise of its statutory jurisdiction in regard to the property of persons under such disability. It follows, in our judgment, that it is not an objection to the sanction by the court of any proposed scheme in regard to trust property that its object or effect is or may be to reduce liability for tax (including death duties).

We turn now to the inherent jurisdiction of the court to authorise or direct trustees to participate in schemes such as the present. It was the argument of the learned counsel for all the appellants (founded on Earl of Winchelsea v. Norcliffe (3), before SIR GEORGE JEFFREYS, L.C., and other early cases, including Pierson v. Shore (4), before LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., and Inwood v. Twyne (5), before LORD NORTHINGTON, L.C.), that the jurisdiction of the court to modify or vary trusts and to direct the trustees accordingly was unlimited, provided (i) that all persons interested who were sui juris assented and (ii) that it was clearly shown to be for the advantage or convenience of all persons interested who were not sui juris including persons unborn or not presently ascertainable. In other words, that the court has unlimited jurisdiction in relation to the property of infants, including the beneficial interests of infants and unborn cestuis que trust under a settlement, and will exercise that jurisdiction so as to secure any benefit or advantage for the infants or unborn persons which they could have themselves secured had they been in esse and sui juris, even to the extent of sanctioning a departure from the beneficial trusts of the trust instrument from which the interests in question are derived.

In our judgment, such a broad and general jurisdiction is inconsistent with the two decisions of this court in 1901 and 1903, never so far as we are aware subsequently qualified or criticised, viz., Re New, Re Leavers, Re Morley (6) and Re Tollemache (7). On the contrary, one thing is, we think, clear. Just as the court has always insisted on the due and proper observance by trustees of the terms of their trusts, so also will it in its own orders depart as little as possible from the strict letter of the trust instrument. An example of this is to be found in the cases in which the court has empowered trustees to invest trust funds in unauthorised securities. In such cases it is (as we believe) the invariable rule to insert in the order a time limit for retention, which will only be extended by the court itself on further application. The general rule, as we have said, is that the court will give effect, as it requires the trustees themselves to do, to the intentions of a settlor as expressed in the trust instrument, and has not arrogated to itself any overriding power to disregard or re-write the trusts: see, e.g., D'Eyncourt v. Gregory (8); Johnstone v. Baber (9). There have been cases in which the court has made orders which did, undoubtedly, result in a departure from the trusts declared by the settlor. In our opinion, however, these cases did not establish new rules, but only exceptions to the general rule. Thus, the earlier cases already mentioned establish that in regard to property belonging beneficially to an infant, including "property" of all kinds, the court has power to direct persons in whom such property is vested (as trustees) or persons having the management of such property (as guardians) on the infant's behalf respectively, so to deal with the property as will be in the infant's best interests. But it is not, in our judgment, legitimate (in the light of Re New (6) and Re Tollemache (7)) to proceed thence to the conclusion that the court has an unlimited jurisdiction where property is subject to trusts under which classes, for example, consisting of infants or unborn or unascertainable persons, are interested, to authorise and direct trustees to participate in or give effect to schemes modifying or "re-moulding" the trusts because it is shown that the trusts so modified or "re-moulded" will be or are likely to be for the better advantage of such classes.

In our judgment (but without departing from the principle stated in our first general observation above), the inherent jurisdiction or the aspect of the jurisdiction invoked in Re New (6) and sought to be invoked in these appeals is of a more limited character. It is a power or jurisdiction to confer on trustees, quoad items of trust property vested in them, administrative powers to be exercised by them as the persons in whom the property is vested (notwithstanding that such powers were not conferred by the trust instrument) where a situation has arisen in regard to the property (particularly a situation not originally foreseen) creating what may be fairly called an "emergency", that is, a state of affairs that has to be presently dealt with—by which we do not imply that immediate action then and there is necessarily required—and such that it is for the benefit of everyone interested under the trusts that the situation should be dealt with by the exercise of the administrative powers proposed to be conferred for the purpose. The power or jurisdiction does not, in our view, extend to changes or re-arrangements of the beneficial interests inter se under the trust as distinct from re-arrangements or reconstructions of the trust property itself.

A In Re New (6) the power desired for the trustees was a power to enable them, as holders of certain shares, to concur in a proposed reconstruction of a mercantile company—a thing shown to be advantageous to those beneficially interested under the trusts and liable to be incapable of achievement without concurrence on the trustees' part. We cite two passages from the report of the case and of the judgment of the court delivered by ROMER, L.J. The first is taken from B the argument, where ROMER, L.J., interjects to observe ([1901] 2 Ch. 543):

“The principle seems to be this—that the court may, on an emergency, do something not authorised by the trust. It has no general power to interfere with or disregard the trust; but there are cases where the court has gone beyond the express provisions of the trust instrument—cases of C emergency, cases not foreseen or provided for by the author of the trust, where the circumstances require that something should be done.”

The second is a passage from the judgment of the court (ibid., 544):

D “As a rule, the court has no jurisdiction to give, and will not give, its sanction to the performance by trustees of acts with reference to the trust estate which are not, on the face of the instrument creating the trust, authorised by its terms. The cases of Re Crawshay (10), decided by NORTH, J., and Re Morrison (11), decided by BUCKLEY, J., are E instances where the court was asked to sanction steps to be taken by trustees which it thought unjustifiable, and which it declared it had no jurisdiction to authorise. But in the management of a trust estate, and especially where that estate consists of a business or shares in a mercantile company, it not infrequently happens that some peculiar state of circum- F stances arises for which provision is not expressly made by the trust instrument, and which renders it most desirable, and it may be even essential, for the benefit of the estate and in the interest of all the cestuis G que trust, that certain acts should be done by the trustees which in ordinary circumstances they would have no power to do. In a case of this kind, H which may reasonably be supposed to be one not foreseen or anticipated by the author of the trust, where the trustees are embarrassed by the emergency that has arisen and the duty cast upon them to do what is best for the estate, and the consent of all the beneficiaries cannot be obtained by reason of some of them not being sui juris or in existence, then it may be right for the court, and the court in a proper case would have jurisdiction, to sanction on behalf of all concerned such acts on behalf of the trustees as we have above referred to. By way merely of illustration, we may take the case where a testator has declared that some property of his shall be sold at a particular time after his death, and then, owing to unforeseen change of circumstances since the testator's death, when the time for sale arrives it is found that to sell at that precise time would be ruinous to the estate, and that it is necessary or right to postpone the sale for a short time in order to effect a proper sale: in such a case the court would have jurisdiction to authorise, and would authorise, the trustees to postpone the sale for a reasonable time. It is a matter of common knowledge that the jurisdiction we have been referring to, which is only part of the general administrative jurisdiction of the court, has been constantly exercised, chiefly at chambers. Of course, the jurisdiction is one to be exercised with great caution, and the court will take care not to strain its powers. It is impossible, and no attempt ought to be made, to state or define all the circumstances under which, or the extent to which, the court will exercise the jurisdiction; but it need scarcely be said that the court will not be justified in sanctioning every act desired by trustees and beneficiaries merely because it may appear beneficial to the estate; and certainly the court will not be disposed to sanction transactions of a speculative or risky character."

It was contended before us that the judgment of this court in Re New (6) and the passages which we have quoted do not qualify, but are merely illustrative of, the broad generality already formulated and sought to be derived from the earlier cases. We have been unable to accept this argument. It is true that the jurisdiction invoked and exercised in Re New (6) was stated by ROMER, L.J., to be a part of the general administrative jurisdiction of the court, but that is not the same thing. The argument is for a general power, not to administer trusts, but (where it is shown to be advantageous so to do) to override them, and the argument is, in our judgment, inconsistent with the later case of Re Tollemache (7). In that case what was sought was (in effect) power to enable the tenant for life to enjoy a larger income by empowering the trustees to acquire—as the relevant trusts did not permit them to do—a mortgage of the tenant for life's interests, a transaction which (it was claimed) could not prejudice the remaindermen. The application was refused by KEKEWICH, J. His judgment contained an elaborate analysis of the jurisdiction based on previous authority, including Re New (6). One citation will, for present purposes, suffice. After referring to certain instances, he says ([1903] 1 Ch. 462):

"The above are illustrations of the exercise by the court, justified by the practical necessity of the case, of jurisdiction going beyond the mere administration of trusts according to the terms of the instruments creating them. Others might be given, the applications or rather the circumstances inducing them exhibiting large varieties, but those mentioned suffice to explain the scope of the practice of the court. There might be added illustrations of the refusal of the court to exercise this extraordinary jurisdiction, but there is no occasion. All the cases of refusal may be grouped under one of two classes. Either, notwithstanding the advantage actual and prospective of what is proposed to be done, there is no urgency for it, and the existing state of things may without great mischief be allowed to remain, or the terms on which the advantage can be gained are such that the court would by accepting them create a new trust in lieu of that which it is administering."

The brief judgments of this court dismissing the appeal are an affirmation of the reasoning of KEKEWICH, J., and they should be cited in full (ibid., 956):

"VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.: It is admitted that the applicant cannot succeed unless she can bring herself within Re New (6). Putting that case shortly, it is this—that a case may arise in which, in the course of the administration of an estate, such an emergency may occur that it must be dealt with at once; but it cannot be said that there is any such emergency here. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, and with costs."

"ROMER, L.J.: I agree. Re New (6) shows how far the court will go, and beyond what point it will not go."

"COZENS-HARDY, L.J.: I agree. I will only add that, in my opinion, Re New (6) constitutes the high-water mark of the exercise by the court of its extraordinary jurisdiction in relation to trusts."

These judgments are, in our view, consistent and only consistent with the conclusion we have expressed above, and are irreconcilable with the broad general proposition for which counsel for the appellants have contended. It is to be noted that ROMER, L.J., who had delivered the judgment in Re New (6), was a member of the court in Re Tollemache (7), and if, in view of the arguments now put forward, the present members of the Court of Appeal wish that he had more precisely stated the limits of the jurisdiction which he plainly had in mind, he indicated no dissent from or qualification of the other judgments of the court or the judgment of KEKEWICH, J. We may add that if the scope of the "inherent jurisdiction" was as wide as the appellants would have it, the statutory provisions of the Trustee Act, 1925, and the Settled Land Act, 1925 (to which we come later) must have been otiose or (at best) declaratory.

But to the principle that the court's inherent jurisdiction does not extend to sanctioning, generally, modification or re-moulding of the beneficial trusts there are, in our judgment, two exceptions. They are:

(i) Where a testator or settlor has so provided, particularly by way of a trust for accumulation, that the immediate beneficiaries have no fund for their present maintenance, the court—which has shown dislike for trusts for accumulation—will assume that the intention to provide, sensibly, for the family is so paramount that it will order maintenance in disregard of the trusts for accumulation. This must (we think) be taken as well established—see Havelock v. Havelock (12), and earlier cases—the principle being stated by PEARSON, J., in Re Collins (13) (32 Ch.D. 232):

"The ground of the decision [in Havelock v. Havelock (12)] I take to be, that where a testator has made a provision for a family, using that word in the ordinary sense in which we take the word, that is the children of a particular stirps in succession or otherwise, but has postponed the enjoyment, either for a particular purpose or generally for the increase of the estate, it is assumed that he did not intend that these children should be left unprovided for or in a state of such moderate means that they should not be educated properly for the position and fortune which he designs them to have, and the court has accordingly found from the earliest time that where an heir-at-law is unprovided for, maintenance ought to be provided for him."

The jurisdiction did not depend on the infancy of the life tenant: see Revel v. Watkinson (14); and was thought by FARWELL, J. (Re Walker (15)) to be rested on construction, but by LORD LOUGHBOROUGH, L.C. (Greenwell v. Greenwell (16)) to be inherent. Whatever may be the true view, it is impossible, in our opinion, to spell out of the orders made in those cases a general power vested in the court to disregard directions in a trust instrument merely because the beneficiaries wish it so to do. FARWELL, J., in Re Walker (15) said ([1901] 1 Ch. 885):

"I decline to accept any suggestion that the court has an inherent jurisdiction to alter a man's will because it thinks it beneficial. It seems to me that is quite impossible."

This exception has, therefore, no bearing on the present cases, and need not be further elaborated.

(ii) It must also now be taken, in our judgment (at any rate since the decision of Re Trenchard (17)), fifty years ago, that the court has a further power and jurisdiction (again without prejudice to the general observation first above stated) to approve, on behalf of persons interested under the trust who are under a disability (particularly infants) and persons who may hereafter become interested, compromises proposed by or between persons beneficially interested under the trust who are sui juris, and to direct and protect trustees accordingly, and the word "compromise" should not be narrowly construed so as to be confined to "compromises" of disputed rights.

In Re Trenchard (17) the tenant for life had been given the right or privilege of residing free of rent, etc., in certain premises, a right or privilege which was stated to be worth to her £350 per annum. Although, therefore, if she merely ceased so to reside, she would (according to the language of the will) lose all benefits in respect of the house, it had been decided that she would none the less be entitled as tenant for life by virtue of her statutory powers under the Settled Land Act, 1882, to sell the premises and thereafter enjoy the income of the proceeds of sale. It was contended on her behalf before BUCKLEY, J., that the requirement as to residence was void, i.e., so that she could enjoy any rents or other income from the property remaining unsold but not used by her as her residence. This argument was in terms rejected by BUCKLEY, J. ([1902] 1 Ch. 381). The learned judge's conclusion cannot, therefore, be founded on the compromise of a doubtful question of the validity of the condition as to residence. On the other hand, the tenant for life and the other persons interested under the trusts (including the class of infants and unborn persons ultimately entitled) had what may fairly be called conflicting "nuisance values". It was shown to be plainly to the advantage of everyone interested other than the tenant for life that the house and property on which it stood should be developed. Such a scheme required the retention of the property unsold and the departure therefrom of the tenant for life, and she was not prepared to depart—and thereby lose the equivalent of £350 per annum—unless some compensating payment were made to her. She was willing to take the less sum of £275 per annum and this arrangement, mutually satisfactory and beneficial, was approved by the court. The basis of the jurisdiction exercised—i.e., as a compromise in the broad sense in which we have used it—plainly appears, in our judgment, from the last lines of the judgment (ibid., 385):

"In fact, the beneficiaries are receiving something; they are not paying anything. They pay something less than before, and to that extent get a benefit. The widow gives up something; but she obtains this benefit—that she is no longer obliged to reside in a certain house. The trustees get this benefit—that they are relieved from the difficulty in which they have been placed from the circumstance that the widow might have continued to reside, and thus have interfered with the building scheme; or she might have sold the house under her statutory powers, and yet retained her interest in the proceeds of sale. It seems to me that this is a fair compromise for all parties, and I declare that it is within the power of the trustees to enter into it, and I sanction it accordingly."

Re Wells (18) in the following year before FARWELL, J., creates at first sight a greater difficulty. It was particularly relied on by Mr. Neville Gray and Mr. Bowyer to support their contention for a broad and general jurisdiction to depart from the terms of a trust instrument. We cannot so regard it. If FARWELL, J., thought that he was exercising such a jurisdiction he would have been departing entirely from the principle he had stated two years earlier in Re Walker (15) in the passage from his judgment already cited. The facts of the case were most unusual. The relevant will provided that life annuities should be paid to the testator's two daughters and to certain other persons of whom one survived at the date of the proceedings. Subject to these annuities, the estate was divisible equally among the children of the two daughters who survived the last annuitant and attained majority or (in the case of daughters) married. At the date of the proceedings there were living seven children of the two daughters, and all had attained the age of twenty-one. The two daughters were the testator's heiresses and next of kin. They were aged fifty-eight and fifty-seven respectively and were deemed past child-bearing. On this footing, the annuitants and the daughters and their children between them were capable of putting an end to the trusts of the will, as they desired to do. Settlements had, however, been made by the children of the two daughters and under two of these sub-settlements (but not the rest) children or possible children of the daughters' children were interested. There was, however, in existence at the time of the proceedings only one such grandchild of the daughters—a son of a son of one of them. This child was represented by counsel, and the trustees of each of the sub-settlements were also (according to the report of the case in the LAW TIMES and the LAW JOURNAL, but not according to the LAW REPORTS) similarly represented. The proposal was that, subject

- A to certain payments being made to the daughters and the other annuitants (or their assignees) in satisfaction of their respective life interests, the corpus of the estate should be immediately divided among the seven children of the daughters or their assignees. Thus, each child or the trustees of his or her sub-settlement, would receive at once a substantial sum instead of the chance of getting, when the last annuitant died, the same or a larger sum—if, but
- B only if, the child in question survived that date. On this ground (supported by other circumstances not material for present purposes) FARWELL, J., had no difficulty in holding that what was proposed was for the benefit of the grandchild represented before him and other unborn interests. He relied on the old cases, Pierson v. Shore (4) and Inwood v. Twyne (5), as authority enabling him to approve, on behalf of the grandchild and unborn issue, the substitution
- C for the contingent subject-matter of the sub-settlement made by the grandchild's father of the more certain amount to be paid over under the proposed scheme. As regards the other sub-settlements where possible grandchildren were interested, viz., a sub-settlement made by an unmarried child, Edith Newman, he regarded the circumstance that this child had insured her life for a sum sufficient on her death to recoup to the trustees one-seventh of the
- D sum paid out to the annuitants or their assignees as removing any special difficulty as her share. The learned judge seems, according to the report in the LAW REPORTS, to have regarded himself as concerned only, if “any difficulty” as regards Edith Newman's share was removed, to protect the interest of the one living grandchild. Thus, at the beginning of his judgment, he says ([1903] 1 Ch. 851):

- E “The only question which causes me any difficulty is the question of jurisdiction. The arrangement, so far as Andrew's share is concerned, appears to me to be obviously for the infant's benefit, for he gets the certainty of £2,000 and upwards instead of the contingent reversionary chance of a sum which in all probability would amount to nothing at all.
- F As regards Edith there is more difficulty, because the interests of the annuitants and the testator's co-heiresses and the statutory next of kin, who would take in the event of none of the seven children surviving, are being bought up out of corpus; but inasmuch as Edith is willing to insure her life for an amount sufficient to replace the sum so paid so far as attributable to her share, and to have the premiums payable made a first charge on the income of the money which is coming to her, that
- G difficulty, I think, is obviated. Have I then jurisdiction?”

Later in the judgment, FARWELL, J., expressly disclaimed jurisdiction on the basis that what was proposed was a compromise. He said (ibid., 854):

“It is true that the case before the court is not a compromise, and that, no doubt, makes some difficulty . . .”

- H True, there was no element of compromise in the narrow sense of a settlement of some disputed claim or question, but in the broader sense of the word, in the sense in which it may be applied to Re Trenchard (17), we venture to think there was. But, in any case, there was no re-arrangement or altering of any trusts. All persons interested under the trusts of the testator's will, according to its terms, were sui juris and capable of determining the trusts. The difficulty arose solely from the fact that derivative settlements had been made by the persons contingently entitled to the corpus of the estate. No alteration was required of any of the trusts of these settlements. What was proposed was that the trustees of the settlements should receive a present and certain subject-matter instead of their previously existing contingent rights. Re Wells (18), then, cannot, in our opinion, support the propositions for which the appellants' counsel relied on it. In any case too, Re Tollemache (7) in the Court of Appeal, where the limits of Re New (6) were emphasised, followed Re Wells (18), though the latter case does not appear to have been then mentioned.

It is to be noted that Re New (6) was cited in Re Trenchard (17), and whether in strictness the principle underlying the latter case is consistent with the reasoning in Re New (6) it seems to us too late now usefully to debate. The correctness of Re Trenchard (17) has never, so far as we are aware, been questioned. We are, indeed, satisfied—and we were referred to one or two modern instances of orders made in chambers—that the same principle has since been frequently applied. We think it would be most undesirable to throw doubt on the validity of those decisions through want of jurisdiction unless at least there was shown to be no authority to support them. Although, therefore, we do not disagree with the view of ROXBURGH, J., as regards the effect of Re New (6), we do not think that the jurisdiction of the court to sanction schemes of the character presented in these three appeals is limited to the kind of transaction illustrated by the facts of Re New (6).

We now turn to s. 57 of the Trustee Act, 1925. It was presumably the intention of Parliament, in enacting this section, to confer new powers on the court rather than to codify or define existing powers, though it may well be that the new extended jurisdiction does in some degree overlap the old. We have already examined the inherent jurisdiction of the court, and we have found that the common characteristic of the orders which were made by virtue of that jurisdiction was the determination of the court never to depart from the strict letter of the trust further than the exigencies of any particular case demanded. The question now to be considered is whether, and to what extent, s. 57 has empowered the court to depart from that principle.

It was argued before us that, whatever may have been the position before the passing of the Trustee Act, 1925, the court now has jurisdiction, by virtue of s. 57, to sanction the alteration or re-arrangement of the dispositions declared by a trust instrument, if it is satisfied that it is to the substantial advantage of infants and unborn issue who are beneficially interested thereunder so to do. If this proposition be well founded, it is at least clear that a jurisdiction has been created of a quality which has never been assumed or recognised by our courts before, viz., a jurisdiction to eliminate, vary or re-mould dispositions and trusts which the settlor himself has thought proper to establish, provided only that the beneficiaries who are sui juris desire it and the court is satisfied that the order which it is being asked to make is materially advantageous to the infants and unborn issue concerned. Whether it is said that the court would possess this jurisdiction notwithstanding that the settlor was himself alive and objected to the order proposed, or that one or more of the adult beneficiaries similarly objected, we are not sure. The suggestion is, we think, that the jurisdiction would exist but that the court would or might, in such circumstances, decline to exercise it; and the same suggestion was made as to cases where the advantage to infants or unborn issue which might reasonably be expected from a scheme would be no more than moderate or even small.

The question whether this far-reaching jurisdiction has in fact been conferred by s. 57 can only be answered by a consideration of the language of the section itself:

“(1) Where in the management or administration of any property vested in trustees, any sale, lease, mortgage, surrender, release, or other disposition, or any purchase, investment, acquisition, expenditure, or other transaction, is in the opinion of the court expedient, but the same cannot be effected by reason of the absence of any power for that purpose vested in the trustees by the trust instrument, if any, or by law, the court may by order confer upon the trustees, either generally or in any particular instance, the necessary power for the purpose, on such terms, and subject to such provisions and conditions, if any, as the court may think fit and may direct in what manner any money authorised to be expended, and the costs of any transaction, are to be paid or borne as between capital and income. (2) The court may, from time to time, rescind or vary any order made under this section, or may make any new or further order. (3) An application to the court under this section may be made by the trustees, or by any of them, or by any person beneficially interested under the trust. (4) This section does not apply to trustees of a settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925."

It seems to us that the section envisages, on analysis, (i) an act unauthorised by a trust instrument (ii) to be effected by the trustees thereof (iii) in the management or administration of the trust property (iv) which the court will empower them to perform (v) if in its opinion the act is expedient. It is, we think, mainly on the proper interpretation of the phrase "management or administration", in the context in which it appears, that the question at issue primarily depends.

ROXBURGH, J., in his judgment in Re Blackwell's Settlement Trusts, after observing that the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 64, and the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57, ought, in his view, to be considered together said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 648):

"Looking at s. 57 (1), I notice that it does not begin with a reference to a 'settlement' or the 'trusts of a settlement', but to a transaction 'in the management or administration of any property vested in trustees.' This suggests a practical step of an administrative character. Further, this step must be capable of being effected by the trustees. The section does not authorise the court to do anything beyond conferring such a power on the trustees (either generally or in any particular instance, and either conditionally or unconditionally) and directing how any expenditure so authorised is to be borne as between capital and income."

After making some observations with regard to the Settled Land Act, 1925; s. 64, the learned judge referred to the argument which had been addressed to him to the effect that the legislature could not have intended by s. 57 to leave the rule in Re New (6) unchanged and said (ibid., 649):

"It certainly has not done that. The jurisdiction is no longer 'extraordinary'. It extends to transactions which are neither urgent nor of an emergency character, but does it extend to a re-writing of the trusts of the settlement, to a re-arrangement of the beneficial interests thereunder for the advantage of the beneficiaries generally where there is no administrative problem? As I look at these two sub-sections together, it seems to me that they have been carefully framed so as to imply a negative answer. If it be asked why, in that case, the Act does not in its express terms supply the negative answer, I would reply that it could not do so without defining the boundary between administrative action and re-writing the trusts, and that is a boundary which is incapable of precise definition. It seems to me that neither section authorises a transaction which is not of an administrative character, and that the court cannot confer on tenant for life or trustees the power to execute a re-settlement or deal with the trust estate on the footing that a re-settlement has been executed. No language could be less apt than this for conferring such a novel and extensive power on the court. If I am wrong in this view, I would hold in the alternative that the legislature has by its language given clear indication that the court ought not to exercise its discretion in favour of a transaction or series of transactions which, in its opinion, are not of an administrative character, but involve a substantial re-writing of the trusts in order to re-arrange beneficial interests to greater advantage."

It was argued before us that the learned judge attributed too limited an effect to the words "management or administration" in s. 57 and that in indicating that the phrase, in its context, suggested a practical step of an administrative character, he failed to give sufficient weight to the fact that the words "management" and "administration" are divided by the disjunctive "or", which shows, it is said, that the words were intended to bear separate and individual meanings. Counsel for the appellants submitted that, although certain acts of trustees might equally well be described as either managerial or administrative, a broad distinction ought properly to be drawn between the management of trust property, on the one hand, and its administration by the trustees, on the other. Under the head of management would come, it was argued, the general care and control by trustees over the property of which, so far as legal title goes, they are the absolute owners, and an act of management would be one referable to that ownership, for example, the sale or purchase of trust investments. Administration, on the other hand, it was contended, covers all the activities of a trustee which derive from the fiduciary character of the position which he holds, e.g., the payment of income to beneficiaries or the execution of a discretionary trust. Reference was made in this connection to the managerial and administrative powers which were conferred on the court by the Lunacy Act, 1890, and especially to s. 116 (4) of the Act, under which such powers could be exercised both for the maintenance of a patient and the management of his property, and it was suggested that these provisions for management and administration throw some light on the powers which appear in s. 57 under a similar description, and may have been the source of their inspiration. Although we do not think that the Lunacy Act, 1890, affords any very useful analogy (for in matters of lunacy the court is dealing in general with property of which the patient is the legal and absolute owner), it is very possible that the words "management" and "administration" in s. 57 are each capable of some shade of meaning which could not properly be attributed to the other, and, indeed, if they were intended by the legislature to be precisely synonymous it is difficult to see why they were both introduced into the section. To enable the appellants, however, to succeed in the two appeals in which the section is relied on, it is necessary for them to show that one of the two words is fairly applicable to beneficial interests, and as "administration" is, at first sight, more readily adapted to this purpose than "management" they naturally founded their argument on the former word in preference to the latter.

In our opinion, the word "administration" is not capable, in the context in which it appears, of bearing the meaning which the appellants seek to attach to it. It is clear, in our judgment, that the subject-matter both of "management" and of "administration" in s. 57 is trust property which is vested in trustees, and, in our opinion, "trust property" cannot by any legitimate stretch of the language include the equitable interests which a settlor has created in that property. We think that the reason for the appearance of the word "administration" as an alternative to "management" in the section is that, although the words do largely overlap, it was thought possible that an unduly narrow interpretation might be adopted if only one word were to be used without the other. Be that as it may, we are satisfied that the application of both words is confined to the managerial supervision and control of trust property on behalf of beneficiaries. Such is the natural scope of both expressions, and to attribute to them, or either of them, an additional association with the beneficial interests themselves, would be to superimpose on their ordinary significance an interpretation that is both unnatural and unwarranted. Nor are further objections wanting, as the following observations (some of which at least are applicable also to the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 64) will show. We have already pointed out that neither trustees nor the court itself at any time, prior to 1925, had any general power to depart from the precise directions (provided that they were within the law) that a settlor thought proper to declare. If Parliament, in enacting s. 57, had intended to confer this power on the court it is, in our view, inconceivable that it would not have done so in express terms, having regard not only to the novelty but also to the width of the jurisdiction that it was creating, and it is equally incredible that it should have done so without imposing any kind of limit, other than expediency, on the extent to which, or the manner in which, the court was to exercise its powers. Not only did the legislature do neither of these things, but it did not even mention beneficial interests from the beginning of the section to the end, or give the slightest indication that it was intending to give power to vary or interfere with such interests or intermeddle with them in any way—except to the extent that they might incidentally be affected by the exercise of the powers which the section does in terms confer. Further, the examples which are given in the section of the kind of “transaction” which the legislature had in mind are all instances of management of property in the ordinary sense, e.g., sales, leases, exchanges, etc. Again, the authorised transactions are those proper to be undertaken by the persons in whom the control of the property is vested, viz., the trustees, and not the beneficiaries. And, finally, the word “trustees” in the section includes legal personal representatives as well, and one can scarcely suppose that Parliament was intending, by a side-wind, as it were, to enable an executor, even with the authority of the court, to depart from the dispositions of his testator’s will.

In our judgment, the object of s. 57 was to secure that trust property should be managed as advantageously as possible in the interests of the beneficiaries, and, with that object in view, to authorise specific dealings with the property which the court might have felt itself unable to sanction under the inherent jurisdiction, either because no actual “emergency” had arisen or because of inability to show that the position which called for intervention was one which the creator of the trust could not reasonably have foreseen, but it was no part of the legislative aim to disturb the rule that the court will not re-write a trust or to add to such exceptions to that rule as had already found their way into the inherent jurisdiction.

Of the very many orders which have been made under the section by the judges of the Chancery Division since the Trustee Act, 1925, passed into law, only a few have been reported, for the applications which come before them are almost invariably, and rightly, heard and disposed of in chambers. A few, however, were brought to our attention which were wholly or partially dealt with in open court and it will be convenient to consider them shortly. In only two of them were orders made which support a wider interpretation of s. 57 than that which we ourselves have attributed to it. Re Salting (19) was reported on a point which is not material for present purposes, viz., whether an order which had been made in the same proceedings in chambers had brought about a forfeiture of the interest of the tenant for life in the trust fund. It is that earlier order which is relevant. Under the will of the testatrix, a sum of £150,000 was held in trust to pay the income thereof to the plaintiff until he should assign, charge or otherwise execute, do or suffer some deed, act or thing (except as therein mentioned) whereby the income or some part thereof would, if belonging absolutely to him, become payable to some other person or corporation and, on failure of such trust in his lifetime, then on discretionary trusts for the benefit of the plaintiff, his wife and children or, if there should be no wife or children of the plaintiff in existence, for the benefit of the plaintiff and his brothers, sisters, nephews and nieces for the time being in existence in such manner as the trustees should in their discretion think fit. The plaintiff, who was married but had no children, was in debt, and he applied to the court under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57, for authority to the trustees of the will to raise £15,000 out of the capital of the trust legacy and to apply the same in discharge of his debts and otherwise for his benefit on his effecting a policy of assurance for £15,000 on his own life and assigning it to the trustees to secure repayment of the advance. An order was made sanctioning (subject to certain qualifications) the above proposal. The result of the order was to secure the repayment of the £15,000 to the trust capital on the death of the life tenant and the interests of the remaindermen were, accordingly, safeguarded. It will, however, be observed that if at any time subsequent to the order the plaintiff should forfeit his life interest, the income from the £15,000 which had been withdrawn for payment of his debts would not be available for the objects of the discretionary trust. We have referred to the original order (which EVE, J., made on Mar. 7, 1932) and it would appear that there were four objects of the trust before the court of whom two (viz., the plaintiff's wife and Mrs. O'Brien, who was probably a sister of the plaintiff) consented to the order, whilst the other two were infants and, therefore, could not consent. The order also shows that no provision of a compensatory character was made for the benefit of the objects of the discretionary trust as a whole who would be disappointed, in the way that we have indicated, in the event of the plaintiff forfeiting his interest. It was held by EVE, J., in the case as reported that the order made in chambers did not itself work a forfeiture. It may well be that the loss of income on the £15,000 between the date of any forfeiture that the plaintiff might subsequently incur and the date of his death was not present to the minds of anyone when the proposed scheme for payment of his debts was discussed and sanctioned in chambers. Had it been considered we think that, at the least, some provision for compensating the objects of the discretionary trust would have been insisted on, for, in our opinion, the court had no power, whether under s. 57 or otherwise, to override the interests of the plaintiff's nephews and nieces, however "expedient" the transaction might be from the point of view of the plaintiff himself and his immediate family.

In Re Mair (20) it could again be said that an order was made which might defeat, without compensation, the claims of the objects of a discretionary trust which had not, but might thereafter, come into operation. At the date when the order was made, the income of the fund which was there in question was held on determinable trusts for the benefit of two ladies who were aged respectively sixty-nine and seventy. In the event of either of the ladies forfeiting her interest her share of income would be held on a discretionary trust for the two ladies and their husbands, and subject thereto the ladies together were absolutely entitled to the fund. The court was asked to sanction, under s. 57, a proposal for the payment to each of the ladies of a portion of the capital of the trust fund. Both the ladies were married and their husbands supported the proposal. Accordingly, the only beneficial interests which were not before the court (except in so far as they were represented by the trustees) and which could possibly be affected by the order were the future husbands of these two elderly ladies who (if they should ever come into existence) would be objects of the discretionary trusts if a forfeiture were incurred. It is true that the interests of these hypothetical persons were disregarded by the court when it sanctioned the proposal, but it was so unlikely that their claim would ever arise that the omission to provide for it is not, perhaps, very surprising. In the course of his judgment in Re Mair (20) FARWELL, J., said ([1935] Ch. 565):

"If and when the court sanctions an arrangement or transaction under s. 57, it must be taken to have done it as though the power which is being put into operation had been inserted in the trust instrument as an over-riding power."

This view has been repeatedly followed and adopted in later cases, and it is not without importance in connection with the opinion which we have already expressed as to the limited scope of the section, for it would be difficult to regard as inserted in a trust instrument a general power to override the trusts which were declared by the very instrument itself.

A In Municipal & General Securities Co., Ltd. v. Lloyds Bank, Ltd. (21), WYNN-PARRY, J., was asked (inter alia) to sanction, under s. 57, the sale by trustees of certain stock. This the learned judge declined to do, and, in the course of his judgment on the point, he expressed himself as follows ([1949] 2 All E.R. 944):

B "The first point which I have to decide is whether there is jurisdiction in the court under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57, . . . to make any such order, either as regards authority to sell or . . . authority to re-invest. The section is couched in wide language, and there is little guidance in the reported cases, a circumstance which is explained by the fact that most applications under this section are dealt with in chambers. It appears to me that there must be some limit to the scope of this section. It cannot be construed as a section having such wide import as would C allow a complete re-writing of a trust deed or a substitution of a completely different object for that to achieve which the trust was brought into being. I find support in the view that there must be some limit to the scope of s. 57 (1) in the opening words, which are: 'Where in the management or administration of any property vested in trustees . . .'
D If those words 'management or administration' are to have no significance, it would have been the easiest thing in the world for the section to have opened with the words: 'Where any property is vested in trustees . . .'
E I do not intend to attempt to state what, in my view, is the exact scope of the section. I cannot see that I should be doing any service by embarking on any such attempt, for it is much better that each case as it comes up should be considered separately. I do feel, however, that I have to consider whether this application is one which I have jurisdiction to entertain, on the view, which I take, that the words 'management or administration' at the beginning of the section have a limiting effect on the jurisdiction conferred on the court."

F It follows from what we have already said that we are in agreement with those observations of the learned judge, and that, in our judgment, unless any proposed transaction is one which is specifically related to the management or administration by trustees of trust property, quoad property, it does not fall within the scope of s. 57.

There remains the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 64, which is relevant to and invoked in the first of the appeals before us:

G "(1) Any transaction affecting or concerning the settled land, or any part thereof, or any other land (not being a transaction otherwise authorised by this Act, or by the settlement) which in the opinion of the court would be for the benefit of the settled land, or any part thereof, or the persons interested under the settlement, may, under an order of the court, be effected by a tenant for life, if it is one which could have H been validly effected by an absolute owner. (2) In this section 'transaction' includes any sale, extinguishment of manorial incidents, exchange, assurance, grant, lease, surrender, re-conveyance, release, reservation, or other disposition, and any purchase or other acquisition, and any covenant, contract, or option, and any application of capital money . . . and any compromise or other dealing, or arrangement . . ."

I think I need not read further, except to say that "the references to land include references to restrictions and burdens affecting land".

ROXBURGH, J., said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 648):

"Looking at s. 64 (1) of the Settled Land Act, 1925, I observe that it also does not begin with a reference to a 'settlement' or the 'trusts of a settlement', but to a 'transaction'. This suggests a practical step of some sort. A reference to the definition in s. 64 (2) suggests that the practical steps under consideration are of an administrative character, and a reference back to s. 64 (1) shows that they must be such as are capable of being effected by the tenant for life. The section does not empower the court to do anything beyond authorising the tenant for life to effect the transaction."

With all respect to the learned judge, we are unable to agree that the word "transaction" in this section should be given a restricted meaning such as he suggests. The word is one of the widest import, as is emphasised, in our judgment, by the terms of sub-s. (2) which make the meaning of the word comprehend (inter alia) any application of capital money "and any compromise or other dealing, or arrangement". A further objection to the suggested view that the only transactions envisaged by s. 64 are "practical steps of an administrative character" seems to us to be afforded by the fact that acts of that description are at least to a considerable extent provided for by s. 71 of the Act. It is, of course, by no means impossible to think of managerial or administrative acts involving capital expenditure in addition to those enumerated in s. 71 and, in the course of argument, Mr. Buckley suggested as an example expenditure for opposing a proposed hydro-electric scheme on other land which might affect the settled land or its amenities. It is, however, very improbable, in our opinion, that the object of s. 64 was to act merely as a supplement, as it were, to s. 71. If such had been the intention it would have been easier and more natural to amend s. 71 itself. It is true (as was pointed out in argument) that the transaction is one that must be effected, as the judge observed, by the tenant for life. But having regard to the general scheme of the Act, whereunder the settled land is vested in the tenant for life with wide powers of ownership, and to s. 75 (2) which contemplates the giving of discretions to the trustees as to capital moneys by the tenant for life, this qualification does not appear to us (at least for present purposes) to present difficulty. It is also necessary that the court should be satisfied that the transaction proposed should be for the benefit of either the settled land or some part thereof or of the persons interested under the settlement; but not necessarily of both. Of more significance is the qualification that the transaction should affect or concern (and the disjunctive "or" is to be noted) the settled land "or any other land" (which we construe as meaning any land whether settled or not and whether within or without England). In our judgment, the test imported by this last qualification is satisfied by transactions indirectly as well as directly operating on the settled land (or other land) provided that in the former case the effect is real and substantial by ordinary common-sense standards as distinct from that which is oblique or remote and merely incidental. This view is, in our judgment, supported by the circumstance that the transaction is within the jurisdiction of the court to approve, though it is, in the opinion of the court, for the benefit of the persons interested under the settlement and not of the settled land. There is, we think, nothing inconsistent with the view which we have expressed in the judgment of COHEN, J., in Re Scarisbrick (22), and of HARMAN, J., in Re Mount Edgcumbe (23). On the other hand, our conclusion on the scope of the section is in accordance with the decision of this court in Re White-Popham Settled Estates (24).

The learned judge, as we understand him, thought that the two sections, s. 57 of the Trustee Act, 1925, and s. 64 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, were closely analogous, conferring parallel jurisdictions, the one in regard to settlements not comprising land, the other in regard to settled land. It follows from what we have said that we have not altogether shared this view. The jurisdiction under s. 64 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, is, in our judgment, in some respects more ample in regard to the subject-matter to which it relates than is s. 57 of the Trustee Act, 1925. If this result is regarded as unexpected, we point out that the language of the two sections is to a material degree dissimilar, and the conclusions which we have formed are based on what we regard, in each case, as the natural meaning of the words used. It is, perhaps, worth observing that in the case of a settlement the trustees of which are trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925, but which no longer comprehends any unsold land, neither section has any application.

We now proceed to apply the principles we have stated to the three cases before us.

Re DOWNSHIRE

The relevant facts in this case are that by a deed of re-settlement made Sept. 23, 1915, between the sixth marquess, of the first part, the plaintiff in the present proceedings, now the seventh marquess, of the second part, and the trustees of the settled estate, of the third part, the settled properties consisting of lands in England, Northern Ireland and Eire, and invested capital moneys (particulars of which are hereafter stated) were re-settled (subject to a prior power of joint appointment, which was never exercised on the part of the sixth Marquess and the plaintiff) to the following uses so far as material, to take effect after the death which occurred on May 29, 1918, of the sixth marquess:—first, to the use of the trustees during the life of the plaintiff on trust that if at the time of the recited trust taking effect in possession

“no act or event other than the exercise of any power conferred on the plaintiff should have been done or happened whereby the life estate thereby given to him under the trust premises or some part thereof would, if belonging absolutely to him, have become vested in or charged in favour of some other person or persons or a corporation”, the trustees should allow the plaintiff to enter into and remain in possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the said premises during his life “or until some act or event as aforesaid should be done or happen”; secondly, during such part or parts of the life of the plaintiff as he should not be entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the settled property by virtue of the preceding trust, the trustees should pay all or any part of the net rents and profits or apply the same for the maintenance or personal support or benefit of all or any one or more to the exclusion of the others or other of the following persons, viz., the plaintiff and his wife, if any, and his children or remoter issue for the time being in existence in such manner as the trustees should in their absolute discretion think proper, and should accumulate any surplus of such rents or profits and hold the accumulations as capital moneys.

From and after the death of the plaintiff the uses of the re-settlement were (a) to the use of the first and other sons of the plaintiff successively according to seniority in tail male with remainder (b) to the use of the second defendant (the plaintiff's brother) during his life with remainder (c) to the use of the first and other sons of the second defendant successively according to seniority in tail male with remainders over. The re-settlement contained powers for the plaintiff and for every person thereby made tenant for life of the settled property at any time or times and either before or after becoming entitled to the possession of the settled property by deed or will to appoint to any wife in the event of her surviving him during the residue of her life or any less period a jointure rentcharge of £4,000 per annum without any deduction except for death duties, and also to charge the settled property with sums for the portions of younger children of the appointor, the maximum amount capable of being so appointed by any appointor being £50,000. At the present time the second defendant has two daughters, but one son only, viz., the third defendant, who has attained the age of twenty-one years. Further, by a disentailing deed dated May 30, 1952, the third defendant has disentailed the entirety of the settled property. The plaintiff, who is now fifty-eight years of age, has never been married. The present effect, therefore, of the re-settlement is that, subject to the uses and trusts declared to take effect during the plaintiff's life and to the possibility of the plaintiff having issue, the settled property will devolve on the second defendant for life and thereafter belongs absolutely to the third defendant. As above stated, the settled property consists both of land and investments of capital moneys. Its total value is upwards of £1,100,000, of which approximately £400,000 is represented by land, the greater part being in Northern Ireland. The land in England includes a house at Bracknell occupied by the plaintiff, and there is also a house in Northern Ireland, known as Murlough House, which constitutes the plaintiff's home.

The scheme proposed and submitted to the court for its sanction on behalf of the trustees is to the effect that the plaintiff will surrender all his interest for his life in £700,000, being the bulk of the capital moneys subject to the settlement, so as to accelerate the interests in remainder to come into effect after his death, and will also release such capital moneys from his powers of charging for jointure or portions. At the same time the second defendant similarly releases his own life interest in these capital moneys in favour of the remainderman, and similarly releases his own powers of charging the £700,000 for jointure and portions. If it were not for the trusts affecting the plaintiff's life estate (commonly known as "protective trusts"), there would so far be no difficulty: the result would be that the capital of the £700,000 would be absolutely vested in the third defendant subject to its being divested in favour of a son hereafter born of the plaintiff. In order, therefore, to surmount the difficulty created by the "protective trusts" during the plaintiff's life, the scheme provides (i) that the plaintiff's surrender of his interest in the £700,000 capital moneys shall not be treated as involving a forfeiture of his life estate in the English and Irish lands; (ii) the trustees are required to release the same capital moneys from the discretionary trusts affecting the income of such funds during any part of the plaintiff's life.

But, although the plaintiff is now unmarried, he may hereafter marry and have children. In that event, notwithstanding the disentailing assurance, the absolute interest of the third defendant would be divested in favour of the plaintiff's sons. Further, there would then come into existence objects other than the plaintiff of the discretionary trusts, viz., the plaintiff's wife and issue. In order to provide for these contingencies, (a) it is part of the scheme that a single premium policy should be taken out assuring payment to the trustees in the event of a son being hereafter born to the plaintiff of the sum of £49,000, this amount being calculated to make good the premium on the policy (£9,000) and the sum that would remain on the death of the plaintiff, after payment of estate duty at the appropriate rate now ruling of eighty per cent. of £200,000 (part of the sum of £700,000), which it is proposed to distribute as hereafter appears; (b) it is also provided that a sum of £20,000 war stock should be retained by the trustees to the intent that if and so long as there should at any time during the plaintiff's life be in existence a wife or any child or remoter issue of the plaintiff, the trustees should pay and apply the income of this stock, or the investments representing the same, for the maintenance or personal support of all or any one or more of the plaintiff's wife, children, or remoter issue, as they should in their discretion think fit, and that subject thereto such sum of stock should fall into that part of the corpus of the funds which is not to be distributed as hereafter appears.

In order to give effect to this scheme it is proposed that the capital moneys should be divided into three funds: first, a sum of £100,000 which would be paid absolutely to the plaintiff in consideration of his giving up all interest for his life in the capital moneys, which sum, according to the evidence, represents something less than half the present value of the plaintiff's life interest, on the footing that no forfeiture is incurred, and having due regard to his age and state of health; second, a further sum of £100,000 which will be paid to the second defendant in consideration of his surrender of his life interest in the £700,000 capital moneys; and third, a sum of £500,000 (referred to in the scheme as the third defendant's fund) which will, subject to payment thereout of the costs of the scheme, of the premium on the policy above mentioned, and to retention thereout of the sum of £20,000 war stock also above referred to, be held by the trustees on the uses and trusts of the settlement to take effect after the deaths of the plaintiff and the second defendant, i.e., on trust for the third defendant absolutely subject to being divested in favour of a son of the plaintiff hereafter to be born.

We have already stated that it is part of the scheme that the powers of the plaintiff and the second defendant to charge the settled property with jointures and portions should be restricted to the settled lands, so as to release the £700,000 capital moneys entirely therefrom. Other provisions are contained in the scheme to provide for payment of estate duty on the plaintiff's death in respect of the fund payable to the second defendant and otherwise, but it is not necessary for present purposes to refer to these matters in any further detail. It will be seen that the scheme is so devised that if the plaintiff lives the requisite length of time after the scheme, if approved, becomes effective, the third defendant's fund would not appear, under the law as it at present stands (though we are not of course so deciding), to pass or be deemed to pass, on the plaintiff's death.

The scheme proposed being of the character which we have indicated, ROXBURGH, J., took the view that, whatever its merits, he had no jurisdiction either under the inherent jurisdiction of the court or under the Settled Land Act, 1925, to give his approval to it. He said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 608):

"I hold that the transactions involved in this scheme amount in substance to a re-writing of the trusts or a substantial part thereof, or to directions to administer the trust property on the footing that new trusts have been declared and old trusts have been struck out or varied, and the admitted purpose of the scheme is not to solve any administrative problem but to re-arrange beneficial interests to greater advantage. Such proposals fall, in my judgment, outside the scope of the court's 'extraordinary' jurisdiction (if, indeed, it has not been superseded by s. 64 (1) and s. 57 (1)). They also fall outside the ambit of s. 64 (1)."

We agree with the learned judge that the case cannot fairly be brought within the scope of that aspect of the court's jurisdiction expounded in Re New (6). We have already stated what we conceive to be the effect of that decision and the later case of Re Tollemache (7), and what, accordingly, are the nature, and, broadly, the limits, of that aspect of the court's jurisdiction which was in those cases invoked. It is sufficient to say that the scheme now proposed, in our view, plainly falls outside those limits, but, as we have explained, the jurisdiction exercised in Re New (6) is not exhaustive. In our judgment, the present scheme does fall fairly within the ambit of the court's jurisdiction to approve compromises (used in the broad sense of the word) which is illustrated in the decision of BUCKLEY, J., in Re Trenchard (17).

Forfeiture clauses are always strictly construed by the court. It was, therefore, suggested during the argument that the particular terms of the so-called "protective trusts" during the life of the plaintiff were not such as to disable the plaintiff from surrendering his limited interest in the capital moneys so as to accelerate the interests to take effect after his death and exclude the coming into operation of the discretionary trusts during his life on the ground that the effect of a surrender may fairly be said not to "vest the life estate" as such in the remaindermen, and that he was capable of making the surrender without incurring any forfeiture of his interest in the unsold land. This argument, unless rejected by the court, would, no doubt, give the court power to consider and sanction the scheme as constituting a compromise in the strict sense of the word, but it is, in our judgment, unnecessary to go so far, for we think that, apart from that argument, the proposals may fairly and properly be regarded as constituting a compromise in the broader sense of the word in which it was used in Re Trenchard (17). The plaintiff has a real and present interest in the £700,000 of capital moneys, viz., the right to enjoy the income thereof during his life until the happening of an event which it is (except in very special circumstances) in his power to avoid. The plaintiff offers to give up this right and interest for the benefit of the persons next entitled after his death—but on terms. The persons presently so entitled (being sui juris) are prepared to accept the offer. The only question, therefore, is whether adequate provision is made for persons now unborn or unascertainable who might be affected. The court is asked to answer the question affirmatively and authorise the trustees to act accordingly, at the same time relieving (if the plaintiff so long lives) those who would have to bear the burden from liability to suffer a very large payment of death duties. In our judgment, accordingly, the scheme is one which it was within the court's jurisdiction to sanction, and having also considered the details of the scheme to which we have already referred, we are of opinion that (subject to one or two matters on which we should wish to have the further assistance of counsel) it is one which in the exercise of the court's discretion should now be approved.

In the circumstances, it is in strictness unnecessary for us to express a view whether the scheme also properly falls within the ambit of the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 64. It is, however, to be noted that the land, that is, all the land both in England and in Ireland, is "affected" or "concerned" in that (a) all jointure and portions charges are under the scheme thrown exclusively on it, and (b) the plaintiff remains tenant for life in possession of all the land, notwithstanding that on a true construction of the settlement he might cease so to be. Whether or no these features alone would suffice to satisfy the test inherent in the first two lines of the section, that test would, as we think, be satisfied if in addition it were shown (as we were informed that it could be shown) to be a real object of the scheme that the land should be substantially preserved so as to provide a home or homes for the future holders of the plaintiff's title by relieving the estate from claims for death duties which would otherwise be likely to cause the properties to be wholly or largely broken up. We further think that the scheme may fairly be described as, or as involving, a "transaction" to be effected by the tenant for life since, apart from his own surrender of his limited interest, the payments and appropriations of the £700,000 of capital moneys by the trustees will be effected by them (having regard to s. 75 (2) of the Act) at the plaintiff's direction. We do not think this conclusion is altered by the circumstance that the second defendant also surrenders his reversionary life interest and his powers in and over the capital sum, since he is in any case free so to do. The court being, therefore (as already indicated), of opinion that the transaction is for the benefit (at any rate) of the persons interested under the settlement, we think that the scheme is also one which the court is competent to approve and ought to approve (subject to the discussion on certain matters already mentioned) under its statutory jurisdiction conferred by the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 64.

Re CHAPMAN

Three settlements are concerned in this application. By the first of such settlements dated Mar. 15, 1944 (hereinafter sometimes referred to as "the 1944 settlement"), after reciting that Col. Robert Chapman and his wife, Helene Paris Chapman (hereinafter referred to respectively as Sir Robert and Lady Chapman), as settlors had (in effect) purchased a certain piece of land therein mentioned to be held on the trusts of the settlement and to be conveyed to the trustees thereof and that certain further assets might from time to time be brought into the settlement by the settlors it was declared by cl. 1 that the said land or the proceeds of sale thereof and such further assets as aforesaid were thereafter referred to as "the trust premises". Clause 2, cl. 3 and cl. 4 of the 1944 settlement are as follows:

"2. The trustees shall stand possessed of the trust premises (subject to cl. 3 and cl. 4 following) for all or any the child or children of the settlors' son Robert Macgowan Chapman who shall attain the age of twenty-one years or die under that age leaving issue and if more than one in equal shares as tenants in common. 3. Provided always that until the youngest child of the said Robert Macgowan Chapman shall have attained the age of twenty-five years if that event shall happen within twenty-one years from the date hereof or until the expiration of twenty-one years from the death of the survivor of the settlors if the youngest surviving child of the said Robert Macgowan Chapman shall not then have attained the age of twenty-five years the trustees shall retain the trust premises and shall apply such part as they in their discretion shall think fit of the income thereof for or towards common maintenance education or other benefits of the children of the said Robert Macgowan Chapman for the time being living whether minors or adults or for or towards the maintenance education or other benefit of any one or more of them to the exclusion of the other or others and shall (subject as hereinafter mentioned) accumulate the surplus of such income until the time for distribution by investing the same and the resulting income thereof in any investments hereby authorised in augmentation of the capital of the trust premises to be held upon the same trust as the original trust premises but so that the trustees may apply the accumulations of any preceding year or years in or towards the maintenance education or benefit of all or any of the said children in the same manner as such accumulations might have been applied had they been income arising from the original trust funds in the then current year. Provided always that after each child of the said Robert Macgowan Chapman has attained his or her majority the surplus income of his share in the trust premises not expended by virtue of the foregoing powers of this clause shall not be accumulated but shall be paid to such child. 4. Provided also that the trustees may at any time raise any part or parts not exceeding in the whole one half of the then expectant or presumptive or vested share of any child whether minor or adult of the said Robert Macgowan Chapman in the trust premises under the trust hereinbefore contained and pay or apply the same to him or her for his or her advancement or otherwise for his or her exclusive benefit in such manner as the trustees shall think fit and as to the part or parts so raised the maintenance and other trusts of the last preceding clause shall cease to be applicable and no interest on any such advance shall be charged to any child so advanced in the accounts of the trust."

H The remaining clauses of the settlement were administrative and are not relevant for the purposes of this appeal.

By the second of the said settlements dated Feb. 8, 1950 (hereinafter sometimes referred to as "the 1950 settlement"), Lady Chapman settled certain further funds on substantially the same trusts for the benefit of Mr. Robert Chapman's children as those declared by the 1944 settlement. In particular, the provisions for common maintenance and accumulation contained in cl. 3 of the 1944 settlement were repeated by cl. 4 of the 1950 settlement, save that the reference in the former clause to the expiration of twenty-one years from the death of the survivor of the settlors was altered in the latter clause to the expiration of twenty-one years from the death of Lady Chapman.

By the thirdly above-mentioned settlement, dated Feb. 10, 1950 (hereinafter sometimes referred to as "the Nicholas settlement") which was made on the occasion of the marriage of Henry James Nicholas Chapman with Anne Barbara Croft, Lady Chapman settled certain funds on trusts for the benefit of the children of that marriage and of the husband and the wife, or (if none of such children attained a vested interest) then on similar trusts for the benefit of the children of Nicholas by any subsequent marriage and of Nicholas and any subsequent wife, and it was provided (cl. 4) that in the event of the determination or failure of such trusts the trustees should pay over the trust funds (subject as therein mentioned) to the trustees of the 1950 settlement to be held by them on the trusts of that settlement.

Mr. Robert Chapman (who is the son of Sir Robert and Lady Chapman) has been married once, viz., to his present wife, Barbara May Chapman, and there have been three children of the marriage, viz., the defendants David Robert Macgowan Chapman, who was born on Dec. 16, 1941, Peter Stuart Chapman, who was born on Aug. 24, 1944, and Elizabeth Mary Chapman, who was born on May 11, 1946. There has been no issue as yet of the marriage between Henry James Nicholas Chapman and his wife, Anne Barbara. As at Mar. 24, 1952, the estimated values of the funds comprised in the three settlements were respectively as follows: the 1944 settlement £43,300, of which £27,700 was settled by Sir Robert, and £15,600 by Lady Chapman; the 1950 settlement £14,700; and the Nicholas settlement £19,600. By reason of the discretionary trusts for the common maintenance of Mr. Robert Chapman's children contained respectively in cl. 3 of the 1944 settlement and cl. 4 of the 1950 settlement the trustees of those settlements were advised that except in certain unlikely events a claim for estate duty would arise in respect of the funds comprised in the former settlement on the death of the survivor of Sir Robert (now aged seventy-two) and Lady Chapman (now aged sixty-five) and in respect of the funds comprised in the latter settlement on the death of Lady Chapman. Further, the trustees of the Nicholas settlement were advised that if the substitutive limitation contained in that settlement, and before referred to, is valid and should become effective, a claim for estate duty will arise in respect of their fund by reason of that limitation. If the present rates of estate duty remain unchanged it is estimated that nearly £30,000 will be exigible for duty in respect of the three trust funds whether Sir Robert survives or predeceases Lady Chapman.

In these circumstances a scheme of arrangement was prepared the object of which was to avoid the expected claims for duty on the deaths of Sir Robert and Lady Chapman. This object could only be achieved by freeing the 1944 and 1950 settlement funds from the provisions for common maintenance contained in cl. 3 and cl. 4 of those settlements respectively. It was, accordingly, proposed that the trustees of those settlements should, with the sanction of the court, advance their respective funds to the trustees of a new settlement which was to be entered into containing similar trusts but omitting those provisions, and that the trustees of the Nicholas settlement should, on the failure of the trusts therein contained for the benefit of Nicholas Chapman and his present and any future wife and issue, similarly transfer their fund to the trustees of the proposed new settlement to be held on the trusts thereof. On June 16, 1952, the originating summons in these proceedings was issued by the trustees of the 1944 and 1950 settlements. The defendants are Mr. Robert Chapman and Nicholas Chapman (as trustees with the plaintiffs, Sir Robert and Lady Chapman, of the Nicholas settlement) and the three infant children of Mr. Robert Chapman. The summons asks for an order authorising the trustees of the 1944 and 1950 settlements and of the Nicholas settlement respectively to do respectively all such acts and things and to execute respectively all such documents as may be necessary on their part to give full and proper effect to the provisions of the scheme of arrangement hereinbefore referred to, and, alternatively, for an order authorising the trustees of the 1944 and 1950 settlements to release all property which is now or may hereafter become subject to the said settlements respectively from the trusts declared, in the case of the 1944 settlement, by cl. 3 thereof, and, in the case of the 1950 settlement, by cl. 4 thereof, to the intent that the trust premises shall from and after such release be held, in the case of the 1944 settlement, on the trusts declared by cl. 2 thereof, and, in the case of the 1950 settlement, on the trusts declared by cl. 3 thereof. The summons further asks for an order that, from and after the bringing into effect of the said scheme or, as the case may be, the execution of such release as aforesaid, the same shall be binding on all persons interested in the property affected thereby. The summons came on for hearing before HARMAN, J., in chambers on July 28, 1952. The learned judge, without going into the merits of the scheme, dismissed the summons on the ground that he had no jurisdiction, either under the inherent jurisdiction of the court or under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57, to make the order asked for, and from that dismissal the plaintiffs have appealed to this court.

The case as presented before us on behalf of the appellants was mainly founded on the inherent jurisdiction of the court, but, in the alternative, it was submitted that the scheme was a "transaction" within the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57, which the court, accordingly, has statutory power to authorise. In our opinion, if the court has no power under its general jurisdiction to make the order for which the appellants ask, then the order cannot be made at all. The reason for this view is that, as we have already pointed out, the alteration or re-moulding as such of trusts declared by a settlement is not within the scope of s. 57, which only empowers the court to make orders, if it thinks it expedient so to do, with reference to the management or administration by trustees of the trust property which is vested in them. The scheme which is proposed in the present case does not in any sense arise out of any administrative or managerial difficulty affecting the trust assets. Its origin and aim are solely referable to the desire of the parties concerned to avoid a charge which will or may become leviable for death duties in consequence of the trusts as framed by eliminating from the 1944 and 1950 settlements the particular provisions which it is feared may give rise to the claims for duty. Such a scheme is, accordingly, in our view, clearly outside the purview of s. 57 having regard to the interpretation and effect which we have attributed to the section.

As to the inherent powers of the court it was sought, in the first place, to argue that the court has unlimited jurisdiction in relation to the property (including equitable interests) of infants and, indeed, of unborn beneficiaries, and will exercise that jurisdiction whenever it is satisfied that a position has arisen (and it is said that such a position has now arisen) which requires its intervention. That contention has been dealt with in the observations which we have made on the inherent jurisdiction of the court, from which it appears that the argument, as so formulated, is far wider than reported authority warrants. The position is, as we have said, that the court will not in general assume power to vary the trusts of a settlement even though it might be of advantage to infant or unborn interests so to do. We have pointed out, however, that the general rule is subject to two exceptions and the only question to be considered in connection with this appeal is whether the appellants have succeeded in bringing themselves within either of them. The proposal in this case, as already indicated, is in effect to strike out of the 1944 and 1950 settlements the provisions for unequal or selective maintenance during the lives of the settlors and for the accumulation of any surplus income, and to leave the settlements unaffected in other respects. It is clear, we think, that this scheme is not within the exception to the general rule under which the court has sanctioned the maintenance of immediate beneficiaries out of income notwithstanding that its order pro tanto overrides a direction for accumulation contained in the settlement.

The only possible way, therefore, as it seems to us, that the scheme could be brought within the inherent jurisdiction of the court is by showing that it involves a compromise or composition of beneficial interests to which the principle exemplified in Re Trenchard (17) can properly be applied. We are unable, however, to see how any such compromise or composition arises. Certainly there is no question of compromise in the strict sense, for none of the relevant beneficial interests gives rise to any question of construction or is otherwise in dispute. It is suggested, however, that something in the nature of a composition of the rights of Mr. Macgowan's children is to be found in the elimination, during the lifetime of the settlors, of the expectation that each may have of receiving more, or less, than the others and in substituting equal rights among the class, as between themselves, in its place. We think that there are two objections to the acceptance of this view. First, although it is true that the scheme, if sanctioned, would have the result described, we cannot regard that result as constituting a composition of rights in any real sense at all. It is nothing more than a re-arrangement of beneficial interests which, to the extent that it might prove to be of advantage to some members of the class, would correspondingly operate to the prejudice of others. It cannot, therefore, be compared to a proposal under which, for example, the contingent interests of all of the members of a class in a fund are converted into vested interests in a smaller fund, for in such a case the proposal, if beneficial to one member of the class, would of necessity be beneficial to them all. Secondly, it is impossible to say, on the facts of the case, that the rights and interests of the children under the existing discretionary trusts are prejudicial to them, and should, therefore, be eliminated. Both of the settlements were executed within the last ten years, and the trusts in question were presumably inserted therein because the settlors thought that their introduction would be of advantage to the children. They may well have thought, for example, that some of the children might need more for maintenance than others, and, accordingly, they empowered the trustees to provide for this if occasion should require. Nothing has since transpired to show that their views on this matter were wrong. All that has transpired is that the manner in which the discretionary trusts were framed may attract an unexpected claim for death duties. The object of the scheme, accordingly, is not to compound the interests which the children have under the discretionary trust but to avoid the claim for duties, and such avoidance does not, and cannot, be regarded as a composition of rights for the purpose of the second exception to the rule. Moreover, although, as we have previously said, the fact that a scheme will result in the saving of death duties or income tax is, in itself, no ground for its rejection, the acceptance of the scheme now under consideration might well be followed by the presentation of further proposals of a similar character whenever it should be considered desirable in the future to avoid or mitigate the effect of such changes as may occur hereafter in the existing fiscal legislation. We would point out, therefore, that it is no part of the functions of Her Majesty's courts to re-cast settlements from time to time merely with a view to tax avoidance even if they had the power to do so which, in our opinion, they have not.

It follows from what we have said that the scheme proposed is, in truth, what it appears on its face to be, namely, the destruction of trusts expressly declared, and that inasmuch as it cannot be brought within the first exception to the general rule and cannot, under the guise of a composition, invoke the second exception, the rule applies, and the court, accordingly, has no jurisdiction to authorise the trustees to carry it into effect. This appeal, in our judgment, must, therefore, fail. We would add in conclusion that if, by reason of mistake, a settlement fails to give effect to the real intention of the parties, recourse may in certain circumstances be made to the special jurisdiction of the court to reform or rectify written instruments. It was conceded that the circumstances of the present case were not such as to justify such a recourse. Nevertheless, this application is in substance an attempt to obtain rectification, although it purports, in point of form, to invoke the inherent jurisdiction exemplified in Re New (6) as supplemented by the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57. Attempts of this kind should not, in our view, be encouraged.

Re BLACKWELL

This is a case of a voluntary settlement of personalty made by the plaintiff himself on Nov. 17, 1933, shortly after attaining his majority. Under that settlement, the trust fund is held on protective trusts for the plaintiff during his life in the following terms:

"Upon trust to pay the income thereof to the settlor during his life or until he does or attempts to do or suffers any act or thing or until any event happens (other than an advance under the statutory power of advancement) whereby if the same income were payable to him absolutely for his life he would be deprived of the right to receive the same or any part thereof in any of which cases the trust hereinbefore declared for payment to him of the said income shall determine and the trustees during the residue of his life shall apply the income of the trust estate for the maintenance and support or otherwise for the benefit of the settlor and of any wife or issue which he may have as the trustees in their absolute discretion without being liable to account for the exercise of their discretion think fit."

Subject thereto the corpus of the settled property is held on trust for the children or remoter issue of the plaintiff as he should by deed or will appoint and in default of appointment for the children of the plaintiff in unequal shares, sons taking twice the shares of daughters. Power is given to the plaintiff to appoint income to the extent therein provided to his widow. The ultimate remainder under the settlement is for the general testamentary appointees of the plaintiff. The present capital value of the trust premises is approximately £83,000, and the gross income amounts to about £4,000 per annum. The plaintiff has married the second defendant, and there is one child of the marriage, the first defendant, who was born on Dec. 28, 1951.

The plaintiff has, since the date of the settlement, succeeded, on his father's death, to a substantial fortune, so that he pays income tax (including surtax) on the settlement income at the maximum rate of 19s. 6d. in the pound and should he die tomorrow estate duty would be leviable on the corpus of his settled property at the rate of sixty-five per cent. Having regard to the view which we have formed on it and the course which, we think, should now be taken, it is unnecessary to refer in detail to the scheme proposed. Its broad effect is that the plaintiff proposes to surrender his life interest in one half of the trust funds so as to accelerate the interests in reversion expectant on his death in that half of the fund (whether in accordance with an exercise of his power of appointment by deed or otherwise) and also to release that half of the trust funds from the power of appointment in favour of a widow and other powers of appointment mentioned in the scheme, but upon terms that the discretionary trusts during any part of the plaintiff's life as regards that half of the fund are wholly released or overridden and that the plaintiff's life interest in the other half of the trust fund is not thereby forfeited. It will be seen that the general purpose and character of the scheme are similar to those in Re Downshire. In this case the settlement was, in fact, made by the plaintiff himself. Mr. Buckley did not, however, contend (in our view, rightly) that this was for present purposes a material circumstance. It is also to be observed that the terms of the protective trusts are in this case such as to exclude any argument that the proposed surrender would not determine the plaintiff's right to enjoy any part of the income of the trust fund.

The scheme has been framed, as learned counsel frankly admitted, with an eye, as it were, on s. 57 of the Trustee Act, 1925. Its form was intended to bring it within the scope of that section as it was sought to be construed. We are satisfied that the scheme is not within the competence of the jurisdiction which the section confers. In our judgment, what is proposed to be done in this case can no more fairly be described as a disposition or transaction in the "management or administration of the property vested in the trustees" than could the proposals put forward in the case of Re Chapman. On the other hand, the present scheme is, in our view, of the same essential character as that in Re Downshire. Here (as in the other case) the tenant for life desires and offers to give up his interest for his life in part of the settled property for the benefit of the class of persons to take after his death and so as to accelerate the interests of that class. The existence of the protective trusts stands in the way of his so doing, and the offer of the tenant for life is conditional on his life interest in the rest of the settled property not being thereby destroyed. In our judgment, therefore, the scheme is of a nature which it is competent for the court to sanction in exercise of its jurisdiction to approve compromises in the wide sense of that word which we have already indicated. It seems, however, to us that the form of the scheme may require re-consideration so as to make it more appropriate for the court's consideration under its non-statutory jurisdiction, and it seemed that in other respects the tenant for life was not finally decided on all aspects of the matter. We think it better, therefore, in this case to say no more about the scheme, but to refer it back to the learned judge with liberty to the parties to amend the scheme in the meantime if and as they may be advised.

DENNING, L.J.: These three cases raise questions of great importance as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. It is said that the Court of Chancery has no jurisdiction to sanction acts which are not authorised by the trust instrument except in cases of emergency. That proposition is said to have been established by the decision of this court in Re New (6). In my opinion, the jurisdiction of the court is not so limited. It was certainly not so limited in the days of LORD HARDWICKE. He proceeded on the broad principle that the court had power to deal with the property and interests of infants or other persons under disability in a manner not authorised by the trust whenever the court was satisfied that what was proposed was most advantageous for them provided, of course, that everyone of full age agreed to it. I hope to show that that is the true principle today, and for this purpose I will trace the history of the matter, for it is supported by the greatest names of English equity.

The first group of cases arose out of the differences that used to exist between real and personal property both in regard to succession on intestacy (realty going to the heirs-at-law and personalty to the next of kin) and also to the power of testamentary disposition (personalty could be disposed of by will at the age of seventeen, but realty not till twenty-one). The general rule in those days was that the trustees for an infant could not change the nature of an estate from personalty to realty, or vice versa, because that would prejudice the succession and also the power of disposition: see Witter v. Witter (25) per LORD KING, L.C. (3 P. Wms. 99). Nevertheless, it was held from the earliest days of equity that the court itself could sanction a change in the nature of an estate even though it did alter the succession. Thus, in 1686, three years after the death of the father of equity, LORD NOTTINGHAM, we find SIR JOHN TREVOR, M.R., declaring that if it was "for the benefit of the infant" to have money laid out in the purchase of land, the court could sanction the change of estate, and his opinion on this point was accepted by SIR GEORGE JEFFREYS, L.C., who is said in equity matters to have been quite a good judge: see Winchelsea v. Norcliffe (3) (1 Vern. 435, 436). Fifty years later, in the days of LORD HARDWICKE, we find the court regularly exercising this jurisdiction. In 1739, when a guardian for an infant surrendered an old lease and took a new one which altered the descent, LORD HARDWICKE sanctioned it because it "was the most beneficial purchase for the infant that could be": Pierson v. Shore (4). In 1752, still in LORD HARDWICKE's time, the court sanctioned a purchase of land by trustees for an infant out of his personal estate, thus changing the nature of it, but inserted a proviso that the land was to be treated as personalty until the infant became twenty-one: see Bridges v. Bridges (26) (July 30, 1752).

The best account, however, of what LORD HARDWICKE did was given by his successor, LORD NORTHINGTON, who, as Robert Henley, had one of the biggest practices in LORD HARDWICKE's court, and succeeded him in 1756. He was himself a great lawyer and was so described by LORD ELDON. In 1762 he gave this account of the practice of the court in Inwood v. Tuwne (5) (Amb. 419):

"It was said, that the nature of an infant's estate cannot be changed. This is a matter of consequence, and if there was any such rule laid down by the court, I would acquiesce in it; but in my opinion it is otherwise: the court has often changed it for the convenience of the infant . . . where it is manifestly for the advantage or convenience of the infant. The court has done it in many cases, in making compositions, and often contrary to the direction of the donor or testator: as where money is directed to be laid out in freehold land, the court has, for conveniency, ordered part to be laid out in leasehold."

Forty years later, in 1801, we find LORD ELDON himself following the same practice in the important case of Ashburton v. Ashburton (27). In that case, the late Lord Ashburton gave his personal estate to his executors in trust to invest in mortgages of land or government securities as they should judge best during his son's minority. When the son was eighteen, an opportunity arose of buying lands in Devon near the rest of the Ashburton landed property, and the trustees for the infant asked the court for liberty to use the personal estate in buying lands. When Mr. Romilly made the application LORD ELDON asked (6 Ves. 7)

"whether there was any instance in which the court took upon itself to change the nature of the property in such a case, when there was no clause in the will authorising it."

Counsel, appearing as amicus curiae, said that orders on the subject had been made, and thereupon LORD ELDON sanctioned the purchase, but with the usual proviso that until the son was twenty-one the land should be treated as personal estate. Thereafter, LORD ELDON adopted that form whenever the occasion required it, and he explained the jurisdiction on the ground that it was "for the benefit of the infant"; see Ex p. Phillips (28) (19 Ves. 123). Seventy-five years later LORD SELBORNE and LORD MACNAGHTEN treated those cases as settling the law on the subject: see A.-G. v. Ailesbury (29) (12 App. Cas. 682, 694). The important thing to notice in all these cases is that the court did not proceed on the grounds of emergency or necessity, but only for the benefit of the infant, and it sanctioned the transaction, even though it was not authorised by the trust instrument, so long as it was for his benefit. A similar principle was applied in the case of lunatics. It was laid down in 1749 by LORD HARDWICKE in Ex p. Annandale (30) (Amb. 81), in 1772 by LORD BATHURST in Ex p.

Grimstone (31) (Amb. 708), and in 1887 in A.-G. v. Ailesbury (29) when LORD MACNAGHTEN said (12 App. Cas. 688): "The leading principle, the paramount consideration, is the interest of the lunatic".

The second group of cases arose when money was needed for the maintenance and education of a child. LORD HARDWICKE started this also. In 1748 a testator left property on trust for his wife for life and afterwards for his daughter, but said that the debts and incumbrances were to be paid out of income before his daughter received anything. Despite the words of the will, LORD HARDWICKE declared that "the daughter must be allowed a maintenance out of this trust estate during the mother's life": see Revel v. Watkinson (14) (1 Ves. Sen. 95). This was followed by many cases where the court ignored an express provision for accumulation and ordered maintenance for children. It was done by LORD BATHURST, L.C., in 1776 in Cavendish v. Mercer (32), and by LORD THURLOW, L.C., in 1779 in Fendall v. Nash, reported as a note to Greenwell v. Greenwell (16). In the last named case, LORD LOUGHBOROUGH, who had a considerable reputation as an equity judge, was quite aware of the significance of overriding the direction to accumulate. When the application for maintenance was made to him, he said (5 Ves. 195): "I fear, if I should make the decree, it would be my will, and not the testator's". But he did it. Seven years later, LORD ELDON followed these precedents. He observed that "where there is an express direction for accumulation, it is strong to say that the direction shall not have effect", but SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., under his direction, did that strong thing: see Errat v. Barlow (33). Since his time it has been done repeatedly. It is obvious, of course, that the grant of maintenance to the father for the benefit of one or more of his children will reduce the amount coming to the others under the trust for accumulation, but, nevertheless, the court does it for the benefit of the children as a whole: see Havelock v. Havelock (12). The jurisdiction does not rest on the presumed intention of the testator, as PEARSON, J., thought it did: see Re Collins (13) (32 Ch.D. 232), nor on the construction of the will, as FARWELL, J., said on one occasion: see Re Walker (15) ([1901] 1 Ch. 879). Nor is it confined to cases of emergency or necessity, for maintenance has been allowed to a father when the mother had ample means of her own to bring up the children: see Haley v. Bannister (34) per SIR JOHN LEACH, V.-C. (4 Madd. 275). The jurisdiction rests on the benefit of the children.

The third group of cases arises out of the power of the court to sanction compromises or compositions, i.e., agreements between beneficiaries about their beneficial interests whereby those interests are changed and distributed between them differently from the directions of the testator or settlor. When all the beneficiaries are sui juris there is, of course, no difficulty. They can by agreement between themselves put an end to the trust, or, with the consent of the trustees, they may alter or vary the trusts as they please. When they are not all sui juris, but some are infants or under disability and others are unborn or unascertained, the bargain cannot be implemented without the consent of the court, for the simple reason that they cannot consent themselves, and the court, as parens patriae, must consent on their behalf. In giving or withholding its consent the function of the court is to protect the interests of those who cannot protect themselves, and so long as they are adequately protected, the court will as a rule give its consent. This was common practice in LORD HARDWICKE's time. That appears from the passage I have already quoted from LORD NORTHINGTON's judgment in Inwood v. Twyne (5) when he said (Amb. 417) that the court had "done it in many cases, in making compositions, and often contrary to the direction of the donor or testator". It has been common practice ever since. It was explicitly stated in 1864 by TURNER, L.J., in Brooke v. Mostyn (35) in these words (2 De G. J. & Sm. 415):

"That this court has power to compromise the rights and claims of infants and persons under disabilities, where those rights and claims are merely equitable, has not been and cannot be disputed. It is a power which has been continually exercised by the court, and results almost necessarily from the jurisdiction which the court exercises over trustees. In the exercise of that jurisdiction the court may in general order the trustees to deal with the trust property in whatever mode it may consider to be for the benefit of cestuis que trust who are infants or under disabilities.

A I have thought it right to make these observations, because I consider it of great importance that no doubt should be cast upon this power of the court . . . The rights of infants and incapacitated persons must in many cases be sacrificed if the power be not maintained."

This jurisdiction is not confined to cases where there is a dispute about the extent of the beneficial interests, nor to cases of emergency or necessity, but extends wherever there is a bargain about the beneficial interests which is for the benefit of the infants or unborn persons. It was exercised in striking fashion in 1902 in Re Trenchard (17), where it was argued that "the court cannot sanction a compromise (that is, a bargain) which is directly opposed to the testator's wishes", but BUCKLEY, J., did sanction it.

Finally, I come to a case which formulates the one general principle which emerges from the cases. It is the case in 1903 of Re Wells (18) ([1903] 1 Ch. 848, but better reported in 72 L.J. 513, and 88 L.T. 355) where there was a trust for such members of a class as should survive a certain event and they desired to exchange these contingent rights for vested indefeasible interests. This was nothing more nor less than putting an end to the trust contrary to the directions of the testator, but FARWELL, J., sanctioned it on behalf of the infants and unborn sons interested. He refused to put this decision on the ground that the scheme was a compromise. He said it was not a compromise. He referred to the old cases and came to the conclusion that "they went on the footing that what was done was for the benefit of the infants". That simple principle is the basis of the decision. It should be noted that FARWELL, J., quoted another group of cases, viz., those in which the court has allowed policies comprised in a settlement to be surrendered when there has been difficulty in keeping up the premiums. He added that "it may be said that it is ex necessitate rei; but still the principle is the same, namely, the benefit of the infants".

To conclude this review of equitable jurisdiction, I should like to call to witness one whose knowledge of equity has never been surpassed. I refer to LORD PARKER, who as junior counsel in Re New (6) put an argument which seems to me to sum up both principle and practice in a way which is very appropriate to each of these cases we have to decide today. He said ([1901] 2 Ch. 543):

"We all agree that it is to the advantage of everyone that this scheme should be carried out, and the only difficulty is that some of the beneficiaries are not sui juris and, therefore, cannot consent. If the broad principle were adopted that where trustees cannot do a particular thing the court cannot do it, the advantages arising out of the equitable jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery would disappear. But, as a matter of practice, the court has been in the habit of acting on the principle that it has power to deal with the property of cestuis que trust who are under disability, that is, in a proper case—on a special case being made, although not provided for in the trust—when the court is satisfied that what is proposed is most advantageous to those cestuis que trust."
H

There can be no doubt that that argument of Mr. Parker helped greatly to persuade the court to give its consent, as it did there, to a change of investment not authorised by the trust. ROMER, L.J., expressed the judgment of the court in very guarded language which was sufficient for the decision of that case. He treated it as an emergency case, but not in such a way as to exclude other cases. The Chancery judges of that time did not understand that Re New (6) confined their jurisdiction to emergency cases, for otherwise BUCKLEY, J., would not have consented to the scheme in Re Trenchard (17), nor FARWELL, J., to the scheme in Re Wells (18). The case of Re Tollemache (7) creates no difficulty because the scheme there was for the benefit of the adults, not for the benefit of the infants.

It is noteworthy that, whenever the court has, of its own motive, placed limitations on its own jurisdiction—as it did on a few occasions in the second half of the nineteenth century—the legislature has intervened to remove those limitations. Thus, when it was held that a court of equity could not discharge a restraint on anticipation (Robinson v. Wheelwright (36)) the legislature intervened to permit it whenever it appeared to the court to be for the benefit of the married woman: see the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 39, and the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 169. Again, when it was held that a court of equity could not order a sale of heirlooms (D'Eyncourt v. Gregory (8)) the legislature intervened to permit it by order of the court: see the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 37, and the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 67. So, also, when it was held that a court of equity could not authorise a change of investment merely on account of benefit to the estate (Re New (6); Re Tollemache (7)) the legislature intervened to permit it whenever it was, in the opinion of the court, expedient: see the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 64, and the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57. These statutory provisions should not be read as delimiting the jurisdiction of the court, but rather as removing limitations which the court had imposed on itself. They show that the judges of the late nineteenth century made a mistake in tying their own hands in these matters. We ought not to make the same mistake today.

In applying this jurisdiction to the three cases here in hand, the first question is whether the court can give its consent to a scheme when the avowed object of it is to avoid death duties. To that question the answer is "Yes". Just as people of full age and understanding are entitled so to arrange their affairs as to reduce the incidence of death duties on their successors, so also the court will permit the receiver of a lunatic to do it: Re C.W.M. (2). If the court goes thus far, there is no reason why it should not give its consent to a scheme on behalf of infants for the like purpose. After all, the very object of the scheme is to benefit the infants, and the court, as their protector, ought to consent on their behalf unless it owes some overriding duty to protect the revenue, which I do not think it does. Once that question is out of the way there is no reason why the court should not consent to the proposed scheme for the DOWNSHIRE estates. It is a composition where the persons sui juris have agreed on a re-arrangement of their beneficial interests so as to save death duties, and all that is needed is the consent of the court on behalf of unborn or unascertained persons. Their interests arise only under a protective trust and have been amply covered by insurance. It means, no doubt, a departure from the trusts declared by the settlor because the protective trusts are struck out, but that is no reason for not sanctioning the composition. It is only because the trusts are being altered that the consent of the court is required. I think the court should give its consent.

The proposed scheme for the CHAPMAN settlement is more troublesome. We are told that the lawyer who drew up the deed made a mistake. He did not have in mind the statutory definition about property passing "on the death" for the purpose of death duties, and he included a discretionary trust for common maintenance when he ought to have omitted it. He ought to have left the children to receive maintenance equally instead of giving the trustees a discretion to grant more to one than the others. It is a small mistake, but it means a difference of £30,000 in death duties. The mistake

A cannot be remedied under the strict doctrine of rectification because it is not a mistake in expressing the settlor's intentions, but only a mistake as to the legal consequences. Nevertheless, I do not myself see why the mistake should not be corrected by the settlors themselves. This is not like a will which the testator, being dead, has no power to alter. In the case of a will it has been held that the court cannot correct a solicitor's mistake, even though it is quite obvious that he has made one: Re Horrocks (37); and even though it means defeating the testator's intentions altogether: Re Diplock (38). I see no reason why the treatment thus meted out to the dead should be extended to the living also. This is a voluntary settlement where the settlors are still alive and able to speak for themselves. If their lawyer has made a mistake and drawn up the settlement so as to produce consequences which were never intended, why should not the settlors be at liberty to correct the mistake?

B They have provided all the money for the settlement, and all they desire to do is to see that it benefits their grandchildren in the best possible way. Why should they not do it? In the case of an agreement between two parties of full age the two can correct the error themselves by making a new agreement to cover the future. The court will not, of course, rectify the agreement so as to cover the past: see Van der Linde v. Van der Linde (39), Whiteside v. Whiteside (40), but the two parties together can do it by agreement so as to cover the future. Indeed, it was done by the parties themselves in those very two cases, and they did it expressly to avoid tax. Why should not the same apply to a voluntary settlement? The only difficulty is that some of the persons interested are under age or unborn and cannot give their consent.

C But that is just where the Court of Chancery is able to exercise its most beneficent jurisdiction. It can give its consent on their behalf to cover the future when it is satisfied that the proposal is most advantageous to them. The correction does not speak from the date of the original deed as it would in the case of rectification, but only from the date of the correction. The grandparents will have to live yet another five years for the children to get the benefit of it, but they should at least be able to correct it to that extent.

E I find that the judges in the past have interpreted in a liberal fashion the power of equity to relieve against mistakes. For instance, in James v. Couchman (41), NORTH, J., allowed a settlor to alter a voluntary settlement so as to correct his lawyer's mistake. I think we should interpret its power liberally today. I do not suggest, of course, that the court would sanction a scheme to alter trusts so as to overcome the intentions of the legislature as disclosed in subsequent legislation. It would, no doubt, refuse it, but it would do so in the exercise of its discretion, not for want of jurisdiction. Even if the settlement cannot be corrected on the ground of mistake, I think that the scheme can be brought within Re Wells (18). Each of the infants gives up the chance of a contingent greater allowance in return for the certainty of a proportionate share. The only difference between Re Wells (18) and the present case is that the benefit to the infants in Re Wells (18) was a direct result of the composition, whereas in this case it is an indirect result by the elimination of death duties. Such a distinction cannot go to jurisdiction, but at most to discretion, and as matter of discretion this scheme deserves the discretion of the court as much as Re Wells (18), unless the elimination of death duties is a bar, which we have decided in Re Downshire it is not.

H If the Court of Chancery should refuse its consent to this scheme the paradoxical situation will be reached that the court, whose function it is to protect the interests of the grandchildren, shows itself to be their own worst enemy. The grandparents are ready and anxious to correct the mistake. So is everyone else. If the grandchildren and unborn persons were at liberty to consent, any prudent adviser would tell them that they ought to consent because the scheme is so greatly advantageous to them. Is the court to stand in the way and not give its consent? Not so long as it is inspired by the principles laid down by LORD HARDWICKE. I think that consent should be given in the Chapman case.

The proposed scheme for the BLACKWELL estates is less troublesome. The settlor, who is also tenant for life under a protective trust, desires to release his interest in one-half of the trust funds and to accelerate the interests of his children. That is clearly for their benefit and everyone else agrees to it. The only difficulty is that it squeezes out the remoter issue and a possible second wife who might take under the protective trust, but provision can be made to cover those contingent interests. The scheme falls within the same principle as the Downshire scheme and should be sanctioned when it has been put in proper form.

I would, therefore, myself allow the appeal in all three cases, and I am the more ready to do so because I am told that the Chancery judges in chambers have in the past exercised their jurisdiction in similar cases in a very beneficent manner, and this is confirmed by the approval given to the schemes in Re Salting (19) by EVE, J., in Re Mair (20) by FARWELL, J., and by SIMONDS, J., in a case in chambers in 1938 under the inherent jurisdiction which was drawn to our attention. The jurisdiction has been so freely exercised that the rejection of the schemes in the present cases has taken Lincoln's Inn by surprise, so much so that many proposed schemes have been held up pending our decision. The practice of the profession in these cases is the best evidence of what the law is—indeed, it makes law. It would be most disturbing if we were to say that the Chancery judges for many years have been acting without jurisdiction. What would be the result? I suppose that the schemes could be ignored by the Revenue and by all persons not sui juris, which would be a very unsatisfactory state of affairs. It is not right to unsettle the jurisdiction of the court on these matters unless some high principle demands it, and I see none. I whole-heartedly agree with my Lords in allowing the appeals in Re Downshire and Re Blackwell, and for myself I would allow the appeal in Re Chapman also.

ETABLISSEMENT BAUDELLOT v. R. S. GRAHAM AND CO., LTD.

Practice—Parties—Misnomer—Amendment—Plaintiffs a French trading firm—Wrongly described as corporate body—Addition of names of members of firm—R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 2; Ord. 72, r. 2.

A The plaintiffs, the heirs under the will of a deceased Frenchman who were carrying on his business, issued a writ against the defendants for the price of goods sold and delivered. In intended compliance with R.S.C., Ord. 4, r. 1, there was indorsed on the writ a statement that the plaintiffs were a company incorporated according to the laws of France, the plaintiffs' solicitors having been so advised by French lawyers. In fact, that was not correct, as there had been no formal act of incorporation. The defendants applied to strike out the name of the plaintiffs and all subsequent proceedings, whereupon the plaintiffs applied to amend the writ by adding as plaintiffs the names of the individuals who were actually carrying on the business.

C HELD: the case was not one in which the writ had been issued in the name of a non-existent person as plaintiff, but one of misnomer of the plaintiffs, and, accordingly, the court had power to make the amendment, either (per SINGLETON and MORRIS, L.JJ.) under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 2, or (per BIRKETT and MORRIS, L.JJ.) in pursuance of its earlier procedure and practice which was preserved by R.S.C., Ord. 72, r. 2.

F INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the defendants from an order of SELLERS, J., made on Oct. 21, 1952, whereby he allowed the plaintiffs to amend the writ which they had issued by adding the names of the individuals comprising the plaintiffs' house of business as co-plaintiffs in the action.

G Monsieur Baudelot, a Frenchman, was formerly the proprietor of a business in France. On his death in 1937 the business continued to be carried on by his wife and two children as his testamentary heirs under the name of "Etablissement Baudelot". When the firm issued a writ against the defendants claiming the price of goods sold and delivered, the plaintiffs' solicitors, being informed by French lawyers that the plaintiffs were an incorporated body under French law, indorsed the writ, in pursuance of R.S.C., Ord. 4, r. 1, with a statement that the plaintiffs were a company H incorporated according to the laws of France. Correspondence passed between the defendants' solicitors and the plaintiffs' solicitors as to who the plaintiffs were, and shortly before the action came on for hearing the defendants issued a summons for an order that the name of the plaintiffs and all subsequent proceedings be struck out on the ground that the plaintiffs were a non-existent person. On the following day the plaintiffs issued a summons for an order that the names of the individuals who were carrying on the business should be added to the name of the plaintiffs. On the two summonses coming on for hearing before the master, they were referred to SELLERS, J., who, after hearing evidence of French law, held that Etablissement Baudelot was not a corporate body, but allowed the writ to be amended by adding the names of the individuals as plaintiffs. The judge then heard the action, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £4,759. The defendants appealed against the order of the judge on the summonses allowing the addition of the individuals as plaintiffs.

SINGLETON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The defendants appeal to this court not on the amount—there is no doubt that they have had the goods; there is no doubt that they owed to someone the sum of £4,759—but on that which was treated by SELLERS, J., as a preliminary point. The submission which was made to the judge on the two summonses was that in the circumstances leave to amend could not be given to the plaintiffs and that the action, as it stood, was dead, and, therefore, judgment ought to have been entered for the defendants. The submission of counsel for the defendants in this court was, in effect, that the writ is issued in the name of Etablissement Baudelot, and at the foot of it, after the words “address for service”, there are inserted the words: “A company incorporated according to the laws of France”. There is no such company, said counsel and, as no such company exists, the writ was bad and cannot be amended.

His submissions were based on two cases which state the principle. The first of those is Clay v. Oxford (1), where it was decided that where an action is commenced in the name of a dead man his representatives cannot be substituted as plaintiffs. I take six lines from the judgment of BRAMWELL, B. (L.R. 2 Exch. 55):

“It cannot be said that this is an amendment ‘necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing suit the real question in controversy between the parties’, nor is this an application made between the parties to the suit; for there is no plaintiff, and, therefore, no existing suit, and no question in controversy between the parties.”

The same principle is stated in the judgment of RUSSELL, J., in Tellow v. Orela, Ltd. (2), which was decided after R.S.C., Ord. 16, rr. 2 and 11, came into force. R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 2, is in these terms:

“Where an action has been commenced in the name of the wrong person as plaintiff, or where it is doubtful whether it has been commenced in the name of the right plaintiff, the court or a judge may, if satisfied that it has been so commenced through a bona fide mistake, and that it is necessary for the determination of the real matter in dispute so to do, order any other person to be substituted or added as plaintiff upon such terms as may be just.”

RUSSELL, J., in dealing with r. 2 of Ord. 16, on which counsel for the plaintiffs relies in part, said ([1920] 2 Ch. 26):

“In my opinion that rule means that, where an action has been commenced between two living parties by a living plaintiff, and the living plaintiff afterwards turns out to be the wrong person, an application may be made to the court, and the court can substitute another person for the living plaintiff or may add another person as co-plaintiff as the case may be. But it does not justify the court in creating a plaintiff in an action for the first time.”

The question thus arises: Was there a plaintiff? Counsel for the plaintiffs submitted that the writ was good, the plaintiff on the writ being Etablissement Baudelot. He agrees that there might be an amendment necessary according to the practice, an amendment which would name the three people who constituted Etablissement Baudelot or traded as such. He submitted that the fact that on the foot of the writ there appeared the words: "A company incorporated according to the laws of France" was merely something to comply with the requirements of R.S.C., Ord. 4, r. 1, on indorsement of address, and that it did not go to the merits of the question. He submitted, further, that the point taken by counsel for the defendants that there was no plaintiff was wrong, for, said he, the defendants had traded with Etablissement Baudelot and knew what it was. The judge allowed the plaintiffs to amend by putting in the names of three partners (if that is the right description of them). The defendants knew all about them. It was not a case of a dead plaintiff. It was not a case of a bad writ. Etablissement Baudelot existed, traded, and corresponded with the defendants. It existed and traded as a body, occupied premises, and paid taxes. It was a body consisting of three persons who were the successors in title of the late Monsieur Baudelot, and, if that be right, counsel submitted, the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 2, applied. Application having been made to the judge, he allowed the amendment asked for. It is said that he might have acted under r. 11 of Ord. 16, too. I do not think it is necessary to read that rule.

Both the learned counsel referred us to other useful authorities. Counsel for the plaintiffs drew our attention to Ord. 72, r. 2, which provides:

"Where no other provision is made by the Act or these rules, the present procedure and practice remain in force."

He was not able to state very clearly what the practice and procedure on which he relied was at the time of the making of the rules. He put it generally that there is inherent power in the court to do that which is right and just. Counsel for the defendants replied: At least the authorities show that you cannot make an amendment if a party is dead or if that party never existed in law. Obviously there must be some limit.

The question was discussed in Alexander Mountain & Co. v. Rumere, Ltd. (3), which was before this court in 1948, and it was decided that in the case of the mere misnomer of a plaintiff on a writ, the defendant, by a summons supported by an affidavit, can compel the plaintiff to amend. If the defendant does not exercise this power, and the matter proceeds to trial, the misnomer can then be amended, and in no circumstances can it affect the substantive judgment which the court is called on to pronounce. That was a judgment of the Court of Appeal consisting of SCOTT and COHEN, L.JJ. The first judgment was given by COHEN, L.J., and he, having dealt with the facts, reached the conclusion that in that case there was merely a misnomer. The learned lord justice read from an article in the LAW JOURNAL of May 9, 1942, and said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 485) that he agreed with that statement of the law. The concluding part of the article (which is also referred to in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1951, at p. 11) is this:

"This was the position up to the passing of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 11 of which abolished pleas in abatement for misnomer altogether. It gave the defendant the right, instead of pleading in abatement, 'to cause the declaration to be amended, at the cost of the plaintiff, by inserting the right name, upon a judge's summons founded on an affidavit of the right name'. This Act is now itself repealed, and all pleas in abatement are finally abolished by R.S.C., Ord. 21, r. 20. A plaintiff, whether an individual or a corporation, is, of course, still required to bring his action in his proper name. There does not appear to be any specific rule of court dealing with the matter, nor do the rules of court deal with misnomer in any way. It, therefore, appears that R.S.C., Ord. 72, r. 2, applies; i.e., 'the present procedure and practice' (i.e., the practice in force when the rules of 1883 were framed) remains in force, and the defendant by summons, supported by affidavit, could compel the plaintiff to amend.

If he does not do so, and the matter proceeds to trial, it is submitted that the misnomer can then be amended; and that in no circumstances could the misnomer affect the substantive judgment which the court is called upon to pronounce."

Amendment to correct a misnomer is something which the court could do prior to the rules. It is not expressly dealt with in the rules unless it can be said to be covered by the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 16. I am inclined to think that counsel for the plaintiffs is right in regarding the two powers as quite separate. That would appear to be the view of the writer of the article in the LAW JOURNAL, which is adopted by COHEN, L.J., as a correct statement of the law, and with COHEN, L.J.'s judgment SCOTT, L.J., agreed. Thus counsel for the plaintiffs submitted: (a) The amendment is right under Ord. 16, r. 2; alternatively (b) the power to allow amendment of that which is no more than a misnomer is inherent in the court. I should add that in Belgian Economic Mission v. A. P. & E. Singer, Ltd. (4) DEVLIN, J., had made an order for the amendment of the writ by substituting as plaintiffs, instead of the Belgian Economic Mission, "Paul Van Zeeland in his capacity as Ministre des Affaires Etrangères et du Commerce Extérieur suing on behalf of the kingdom of Belgium." On an appeal the Court of Appeal held the amendment was right.

I have formed the view that SELLERS, J., was right in allowing the amendment. I think it could be allowed under the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 2, and that, therefore, it is unnecessary to go further into the powers under the inherent jurisdiction of the court. I need hardly say that it is satisfactory to me to find that there was power to make such an order. The money is due and owing from a company trading in this country to Etablissement Baudelot who carry on business in France. The defendants have had the goods from France, and the money is due. I think the defendants' solicitors were quite right in 1951 to inquire who really was the plaintiff or who were the plaintiffs, if there was any doubt about it. It may be they were right to raise the question before SELLERS, J., though I think they ought to have raised it earlier if they were going to raise it. SELLERS, J., decided that there was power to amend, so that under this judgment the French traders were able to obtain judgment against those in this country who had contracted to buy their goods and had had those goods supplied to them. The French plaintiffs, under the advice of their solicitors, thought it right to bring their action in this country. They need not have done so. I wonder what they think of it now, and I wonder what they would have thought if the decision of this court had been the other way. These considerations are not of importance to us. We merely have to administer the law, but there is another side to this, and I could wish that there had not been an appeal after SELLERS, J., gave leave to amend. It adds to everyone's costs. It keeps the plaintiffs out of their money, and they must wonder what is happening to the courts in England of which they used to hear good reports. There is another consideration. People in this country are anxious to do trade with other countries; we depend on trade to live. This sort of conduct by, or on behalf of, a trading company in this country which knows that it owes the money—it does not dispute that (and by "this sort of conduct" I mean appealing on a technical matter of this kind)—will not help trade. In my view, the judgment of SELLERS, J., was right, and this appeal ought to be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J., stated the facts, expressed his regret that an English firm of standing, repute, and substance should have taken a technical point that had no merit, and continued: Counsel for the defendants asserted and re-asserted, affirmed and re-affirmed, that a writ had been issued in the name of a non-existent person or body, and, that being so, the authorities which deal with the case of a dead man—he referred to Clay v. Oxford (1) and Tellow v. Orela, Ltd. (2)—supported him and the plaintiffs could do nothing about it. "This writ", said he, "was issued in the name of a corporate body. There was no such corporate body. There never had been such a corporate body, and, therefore, the corporate body never existed, the writ was in the name of a non-existent person, and all the consequences follow." SELLERS, J., when dealing with that matter, said:

A " . . . I unhesitatingly accept the view that the rule is not wide enough to permit me to accede to the plaintiffs' application to join these three named partners in this action if in fact the action was from the outset brought by a party in circumstances comparable to those two cases of a dead man."

B It is, I think, important to notice that the way the corporate body creeps into this case is because, in view of the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 4, r. 1, it was stated:

" This writ was issued by Messrs. Keene, Marsland & Co. whose address for service is 52, Mark Lane, London, E.C.3, solicitors for the said plaintiffs, a company incorporated according to the laws of France, whose place of business is situate at Montereau, France."

C Counsel for the defendants says that that addition to the address, to comply, as it was thought, with R.S.C., Ord. 4, r. 1, vitiates the whole matter and there is no redress of any kind. It was, therefore, clear, that counsel must establish, first, that the circumstances were truly comparable with those of the cases dealing with a dead man. He further submitted (and I think the importance of this can scarcely be exaggerated) that, had those words attached to the address for service—" a company incorporated according to the laws of France "—been omitted, all would have been well inasmuch as, by powers of amendment, if amendment were necessary, everything could have been made right. It was the addition of those words which he said made this comparable with the other cases.

E The first question to be determined is whether the plaintiffs' description in the writ, " Etablissement Baudelot ", represented something which existed. I assume for the purpose of this case that it was not a corporate body. The answer to the question I have posed can only be that, of course, it did. It existed, certainly, so far as this case is concerned, from March, 1949, down to the day of the hearing, as a trading concern, to use a neutral expression. It has, in fact, traded with the defendants, delivering to them goods and receiving payment from them, and when difficulties arose it made a compromise on various points of difference as appears from the statement of claim. F It was perfectly plain from the headed notepaper and from the transactions between the parties, that this trading concern existed. The second question is: Does it make any difference, so far as the remedy is concerned, that there was added to the writ the words that the defendants were a corporate body to comply with R.S.C., Ord. 4, r. 1? I think that the proper way to regard that is that it is a case of misnomer. It is said: Here is the name of the plaintiffs. They have existed, and are existing, to your knowledge, and merely because they are described in that way it does not alter the fundamental question whether they exist or not. It is idle to say the question is: Do they exist as a corporate body?, because it has been conceded that this description G as a corporate body was a mistake. I think that the provisions of Ord. 72, r. 2, H are quite sufficient to enable this court to deal with the situation which has arisen here, and I think it would be a great pity if this court were not able so to do. I think that the judgment of SELLERS, J., was right and this appeal ought to be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree. It seems to me that the solicitors for the plaintiffs made their position entirely clear. When asked for information they said in the letter of Mar. 27, 1951:

" . . . with regard to the constitution of our clients we would inform you that we are instructed that they are an incorporated body under French law, which provides for the incorporation of the heirs of an individual who carry on his business, the instrument of incorporation being a testamentary document of the late Monsieur Baudelot."

Therefore, they made it quite clear that they had been advised that those for whom they acted were the heirs of the individual, Monsieur Baudelot, who carried on his business, and who, as a result, by French law, were incorporated. The solicitors thereupon issued the writ in the name "Etablissement Baudelot". The learned judge, having heard the whole of the evidence, including the evidence of French law, decided, though not without some hesitation, that "Etablissement Baudelot" were not an incorporated body. It does not follow from that that this writ was issued in the name of a non-existent company. It was not. It was issued in the name, or the trading name, used in their continuing trading activities by three living trading active persons. I agree with the way in which the matter was summarised by the learned judge, when he said:

" . . . I think this application on behalf of the defendants to strike out the proceedings as being in the name of a non-existent plaintiff is misconceived and that the only error that exists is one of mistake in suing in this name, or misnomer, which is an erroneous name, because in fact this partnership of these three individuals is not in a position to sue under that name but must sue certainly in this court, and possibly in France as well, in the name of the individual partners."

I, therefore, concur fully with all that my Lords have said.

Appeal dismissed.

KENT v. CONNIFF AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Morris, L.JJ.), November 24, 25, 26, December 17, 1952.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Claim by landlord for damages for breach of covenant—Claim made during currency of tenancy—Claim not displaced by statutory provisions for compensation on termination of tenancy—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 57 (3) (a).

During the currency of the lease of an agricultural holding the landlord issued a writ claiming forfeiture and damages for breaches of covenant involving dilapidation or deterioration of or damage to the holding. On the issue of damages for breach of covenant, the tenants contended that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the landlord's claim, as the right of the landlord to claim compensation under s. 57 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (which claim could only be made on the tenants' quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy) displaced the common law remedy.

HELD: section 57 (3) (a) of the Act gave a landlord a remedy for the dilapidation, etc., of an agricultural holding on the termination of the tenancy only; there was nothing in the sub-section to displace his common law right to claim damages for breach of covenant during the currency of the tenancy; and, therefore, the landlord was entitled to recover.

APPEAL by the tenants from an order of SLADE, J., dated May 22, 1952.

On the ground that the tenants of an agricultural holding had been guilty of breaches of covenant relating to the condition of the holding, the landlord, during the currency of the lease, claimed forfeiture under a proviso for re-entry and damages for breach of covenant. SLADE, J., declined to order a forfeiture as he was of opinion that the tenants had been given insufficient time to remedy the breaches. As regarded the claim for damages, the tenants contended that, in view of the provisions of s. 57 (3) (a) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, read with s. 65 (1) and s. 101, no claim lay until the termination of the tenancy. SLADE, J., held that the claim was maintainable, and awarded the landlord £386 damages.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 17. The following judgments were read.

SINGLETON, L.J.: The landlord is the owner of, and the tenants are lessees of, an agricultural holding of some five acres at Woodmansterne. The holding was the subject of a lease of Apr. 8, 1938, by which the land was demised to the tenants' predecessors for a term of seven years from Mar. 25, 1938, at a yearly rent of £40. The lease contained an option to renew for seven years, and it is common ground that the lessees exercised this option. By virtue of s. 3 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, the tenancy continued as a tenancy from year to year until the tenants gave notice to terminate, which notice expires on Mar. 25, 1953. On May 11, 1951, the landlord commenced this action against the tenants in which he alleged that the tenants had committed breaches of covenants contained in the lease, that he had served on them notice in accordance with the requirements of s. 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and that the tenants had not remedied the breaches. He claimed possession (or forfeiture) and damages. SLADE, J., decided against the landlord on the forfeiture claim, but he held that the landlord was entitled to damages, which he assessed at the sum of £386, and he gave judgment for the landlord accordingly with seven-eighths of the costs of the action. The tenants appeal against the judgment, and the only question raised on the appeal is on the decision of the judge on a preliminary point whether the action was maintainable at the time at which it was brought. A

The nature of the covenants in respect of which the landlord claimed that there were breaches is shown by para. 2 of the statement of claim, and particulars of the breaches were given in a schedule of dilapidations. It is clear that some of them were in respect of matters of husbandry. The appeal of the tenants is based on the plea in para. 9 of the defence: B

“The premises are an agricultural holding within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. If (which is denied) there is any dilapidation or deterioration of or damage to any part of the said holding or anything in or on the holding, the defendants will rely on the provisions of s. 57 of the said Act.” C

It was submitted to SLADE, J., and to this court that the effect of s. 57 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, read with s. 65, was to postpone any claim of this nature until the termination of the lease. SLADE, J., was of opinion that there was nothing in the two sections, read together, which ousted the right of the landlord to pursue his ordinary common law remedy or which postponed his claim until the quitting of the holding by the tenant on the termination of the tenancy. D

The claim put forward by counsel for the tenants was a bold one. It was that the landlord of this agricultural holding cannot recover damages during the tenancy for breach of any of the covenants embraced in his claim, that he must wait until the termination of the tenancy, and that his compensation must then be determined in accordance with the provisions of the Act of 1948. The landlord had, he said, other remedies open to him, such as an injunction or forfeiture, but he could not recover damages. True, the landlord might be given damages under s. 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, but that was not strictly awarding damages to him but granting relief to the tenants at the tenants' request. One would have thought that, if the rights of one party to a contract were to be so seriously affected as counsel claims, the Act of 1948 would have said so in plain terms. It would have been easy to say that from the date on which the Act came into force no landlord of an agricultural holding should have any right of action for damages for breach of any covenant contained in the lease or tenancy agreement, and that any claim, whenever it arose, should be postponed until the termination of the tenancy. There is no such provision in the Act, either generally or in relation to covenants which cover questions of husbandry. In the absence of clear words a party ought not to be deprived of his rights: see the words of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Re Arden & Rutter (1) ([1923] 2 K.B. 878). E F G

Section 101 of the Act preserves the rights and remedies of landlord and tenant subject to the provisions of s. 11 (2) and s. 70 (1) and “to any other provision of this Act which otherwise expressly provides”. Now, under s. 11 (2) the landlord may obtain an injunction and has a right to recover damages on the tenants quitting the holding, “but no other”, from which it would appear that in cases within that sub-section the right to recover damages is preserved, but is postponed. Section 70 deals only with settlement of claims on termination of the tenancy. It was not suggested that it covered this case. H

It was claimed by counsel for the tenants that s. 57 was brought in by the words in s. 101, "any other provision of this Act which otherwise expressly provides". Section 57 (1) deals with compensation recoverable by a landlord. The time at which the right (if any) arises is on the tenant's quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy. Sub-section (2) deals with the amount of compensation, which is to be the cost at the date of the tenant's quitting the holding of making good the dilapidation, deterioration or damage. Sub-section (3) provides that the landlord may claim compensation in respect of what might be described as damage for breach of agreement instead of claiming compensation under sub-s. (1), but he cannot claim both. It is para. (a) of this sub-section which gives rise to some difficulty

" . . . so however that—(a) compensation shall be so claimed only on the tenant's quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy."

It was submitted on behalf of the tenants that s. 57 (3) is a provision of the Act which provides for compensation within the meaning of s. 65, and that, consequently, the landlord has no longer any right to damages, but can only claim compensation, and that his claim is postponed to the time at which the tenants quit the holding on the termination of the tenancy.

Section 57 is framed so as to deal with the landlord's claim to compensation "on termination of tenancy", and the measure of compensation is based on the position as at the date of the tenant's quitting the holding. A wholly different position arises if there are breaches of covenants in the early stages of a long lease. Even if it can be said that the landlord may await the end of the lease and then claim compensation under s. 57 (3), there is no reason why he should do so. Section 65 only bars an action for damages in a case for which the provisions of the Act provide compensation. If the landlord adopted the procedure under s. 57 (3) in respect of damage for breaches of covenants, compensation (if any) would arise by reason of the landlord exercising the option so to frame his claim. Unless he does so, there is no provision for compensation. The view which I take is that sub-s. (3) gives the landlord an option. He may be content with compensation under sub-s. (1) or he may claim (in respect of matters specified) under a written contract of tenancy. If he is content with sub-s. (1), his right to recover arises on the tenant's quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy. If he wishes to claim under sub-s. (3), it might be said that there is no certainty as to when the claim arises, or can be made, apart from para. (a). In other words, he might put forward his claim under the agreement before the termination of the tenancy in lieu of the claim he might have made under sub-s. (1) on the termination of the tenancy. The introduction of para. (a) makes it clear that under either sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (3) the claim is postponed. There is nothing in s. 57 which compels a landlord who has a right of action for damages for breaches of covenant in a lease or in a tenancy agreement to resort to arbitration if the breaches of covenant and the right of action arise during the tenancy. Prima facie, he has a right of action in the courts when the breach takes place. It is common ground that he might have a right to an injunction, but it is said on behalf of the tenant that by reason of s. 57 he cannot recover damages in an action in which he is granted an injunction. I do not agree. I draw attention to the fact that this action, in which forfeiture and damages were claimed, was commenced on May 11, 1951, whereas the tenancy continues until March, 1953.

The effect of s. 65 is to provide that neither tenant nor landlord can have any other remedy than compensation under the Act in any case for which the provisions of the Act provide for compensation, and it avoids any agreement to the contrary. It does not appear to me to have any bearing on this appeal unless it can be said that s. 57 provides compensation for the breaches of which the landlord complains, breaches which, on the findings of the judge, arose long before the termination of the tenancy. And I have expressed my opinion that the landlord's claim did not arise under s. 57, and certainly he has not exercised the option given to him by sub-s. (3) of that section. If the legislature had thought fit, it would have been simple to say that there should be no right to recover damages for breach of covenant in any tenancy agreement in relation to an agricultural holding, but that any such claim should be treated as a claim to compensation (and should be postponed until the termination of the tenancy).

Counsel for the tenants referred to the decision of this court in Gulliver v. Catt (2), and he drew attention to the fact that in the course of my judgment in that case ([1952] 1 All E.R. 931) I described the words in s. 57 "on the tenant quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy" as a different proposition from "on . . . the termination of the tenancy" in s. 70 (1) (b). In that case I was endeavouring to show the absurdity of the position taken up by the tenant who was still in occupation and who sought to say that he could defeat the landlord's claim to bring an action in the courts by reason of s. 57. In fact, the tenant remained in possession until two days before the hearing in the Court of Appeal in March, 1952, though the notice to quit had expired at Michaelmas, 1949, and BARRY, J., had held that the notice to quit was a good notice. At the same time I should say that I see the force of the submission of counsel for the tenants, and it may well be that the words "on the tenant's quitting the holding" in s. 57 (1) are inserted to cover a case in which there have been several tenancies by the same tenant of the same holding and to show that the right to compensation does not arise when one tenancy ends and another begins, but only when the tenant quits the holding on the last of them. As counsel pointed out, it is only by so reading them that compensation recoverable under s. 57 would fall to be dealt with by arbitration under s. 70. In my opinion, the judgment of SLADE, J., on the preliminary point was right, and this appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: This appeal raises a point of some importance to landlords and tenants in view of the submissions made on behalf of the tenants in this case. The claim made before SLADE, J., was for a forfeiture of the lease and damages for breaches of specified covenants. The tenants, by their counterclaim, asked for relief from the forfeiture under s. 146 (2) of the Law of Property Act, 1925. All the requirements of that Act had been fulfilled by the landlord in these proceedings. SLADE, J., refused to grant the claim for forfeiture, but awarded a sum for damages for breaches of the covenants in the lease between the parties. The substantial point raised before SLADE, J., on behalf of the tenants, and the only point raised in this appeal, was that since the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, it was no longer possible to claim damages for breach of covenant, such as were claimed in this action, during the continuance of the tenancy, but any such claim must be brought on the quitting of the holding at the termination of the tenancy, and not otherwise, because of the provisions of s. 57 of the Act of 1948.

Counsel for the tenants argued that, revolutionary as his submission might sound, it was none the less the design and the premeditated policy of the Act of 1948 that the jurisdiction of the Queen's courts should give way to the scheme which he said was embodied in the Act, that claims for damages must be deferred until the quitting of the holding on the termination of the tenancy, and that compensation should then be awarded under the Act. He discussed various sections of the Act with some fullness to support the submission he made. It was, of course, a considerable weakness in the argument that he was not able to quote any clear and direct language in the Act itself to support his submission, but had perforce to rely on the inferences which he said might be drawn from certain of the sections, and he was thus confronted by the difficulty that, if well-established rights of access to the courts were being taken away, it has always been held that the language authorising this deprivation must necessarily be clear and direct in its terms. The sections of the Act of 1948 which were relied on have already been subjected to close analysis in the judgment of my Lord, and it is not necessary to repeat the process.

A The real point in this appeal is: What is the construction to be put on s. 57 of the Act of 1948? I am not insensible to the attraction of the argument of counsel for the tenants, and to certain difficulties of construction which arise on an examination of the language used in s. 57. The Act of 1948 was, no doubt, designed to make an effective working code for landlords and tenants, and to simplify much of the procedure. It was because of this purpose that counsel was able to argue, for example, that the combined effect of ss. 65, 101 and 57, was to take away from the landlord the right he formerly enjoyed of proceeding by way of an action for damages, and to substitute the award of compensation referred to in s. 57. These sections have already been discussed, but it is clear that s. 65 only limits the rights of the landlord or tenant where other provisions of the Act provide a specific remedy, and the general effect of s. 101 is the same. It, therefore, becomes essential to counsel's argument that he should be able to show that s. 57 does provide a specific remedy, so that ss. 65 and 101 apply. In my opinion, this is where the argument breaks down. It is perfectly true that s. 57 does make elaborate provision for compensation, but, in my view, it only does so in well-defined circumstances. Sub-section (3) permits the landlord to claim compensation in respect of matters specified in sub-s. (1) under and in accordance with a written contract of tenancy, instead of claiming compensation under sub-s. (1) itself. I interpret this to mean that when the tenant quits the holding on the termination of the tenancy the landlord may elect to proceed under sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (3), but not both, and the compensation is to be for such matters as arise on the quitting of the holding at the termination of the tenancy. But neither expressly nor by implication is it said that the procedure laid down in s. 57 is to prohibit the landlord from proceeding against the tenant at any other time for breaches of covenant committed during the continuance of the term. Indeed, I am not sure that the very action which was heard by SLADE J., does not supply in some measure the answer to counsel's submission. If the learned judge had thought it right to decree a forfeiture, counsel does not dispute that he might also have granted relief to the tenants under s. 146 (2) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, on terms. These terms include the word "damages".

F I think the whole difficulty has arisen because of the wording in s. 57 (3) of the Act of 1948—

" . . . so however that—(a) compensation shall be so claimed only on the tenant's quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy; "

G but I do not think that the use of the word "only" in that context means that a landlord may not bring an action for damages during the continuance of the tenancy. It means that for claims arising on the quitting of the holding at the termination of the tenancy the landlord, proceeding under either of the sub-sections in respect of that claim, must make his claim at that time and no other. In my opinion, SLADE, J., decided the preliminary point correctly, and this appeal ought to be dismissed.

H MORRIS, L.J.: A lease was granted on Apr. 8, 1938, of premises which constitute an agricultural holding. It was granted by the predecessor of the landlord to the predecessors of the tenants. The term was one of seven years from Lady Day, 1938, at a rent of £40 per annum. There was an option in the tenants enabling them to have a lease for a second term of seven years. That option was exercised by the tenants. The landlord became the landlord on Feb. 24, 1949. He considered that there had been breaches of certain repairing covenants in the lease. Accordingly, he prepared a schedule of dilapidations, and on or about Dec. 14, 1950, he served a notice on the tenants under s. 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and called on the tenants to remedy within two months the breaches of which he complained. As they were not remedied he issued a writ dated May 11, 1951, claiming a forfeiture of the lease (which contained a proviso for re-entry on breach of covenant) and also claiming damages for breaches of covenant. The action did not come on for hearing until after Mar. 25, 1952, when the second term of seven years expired, but it was common ground that, subject to the determination of the court of the claim for forfeiture, s. 3 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, operated to give the tenants a tenancy from year to year as from Mar. 25, 1952. In fact, the tenants themselves, as tenants, gave a notice on Mar. 19, 1952, that they would quit the premises on Lady Day, 1953. When the landlord issued his writ he did not know that the tenants would give such a notice to quit.

After a lengthy hearing the learned judge was satisfied that there had been breaches of covenant. He considered that insufficient time had been given to the tenants to remedy the breaches, and he declined to order forfeiture, but he awarded damages for the breaches (at the amount that he assessed) notwithstanding the submission of the tenants that he was precluded from awarding damages by reason of the provisions of s. 57 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. It is solely with this submission that the court is concerned in this appeal. The submission thus raised calls for an examination of the provisions of s. 57 of the Act. In considering their effect regard must be had to their setting within the scheme of the Act. The tenants contend that damages may not be awarded for any breaches of covenant which can be related to certain wording in s. 57 (1), that is, the wording, save on the tenant's quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy. It might seem strange if such an important statutory modification of contracts should be introduced into the law merely by way of an ancillary stipulation to a provision giving compensation to landlords where particular parts of an agricultural holding have deteriorated through bad husbandry. If, however, the words used lead to this result, they must be given their full and due significance. It is, however, not suggested that other remedies for breaches of contract are to have a similar quiescence enforced on them. Thus, it is said that there is nothing to prevent a claim for a forfeiture. It is said that, if there is a claim for a forfeiture and damages and if the court decides not to order forfeiture, then the claim for damages cannot be pursued. Yet it is said that s. 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, is unaffected. It is not said that in a forfeiture action the right of the court to give relief is in any way affected by s. 57 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. Indeed, in the present case the tenants counterclaimed for relief from forfeiture on such terms as the court should think fit. The powers of the court under s. 146 (2) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, are to give relief

“... on such terms, if any, as to costs, expenses, damages, compensation, penalty, or otherwise, including the granting of an injunction to restrain any like breach in the future, as the court, in the circumstances of each case, thinks fit.”

Further, it is not said that the powers of the court in regard to the granting of injunctions are in any way affected.

The position is, therefore, that the tenants submit that, though in the present claim, if the claim for forfeiture had been established, the court might have required the tenants to pay compensation as a condition of having relief, and though, if forfeiture had been decreed, damages could have been awarded, yet, though breaches of covenant were proved, inasmuch as a "reasonable time" had not elapsed between the notice under s. 146 and the issue of the writ, with the result that the claim for forfeiture was not established, no damages for the proved breaches of covenant could be awarded. It is to be noted that no question arises in this appeal as to the measure of the damages awarded or as to the method or basis adopted in assessing them. In my judgment, s. 57 (3) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, does not have the effect which the tenants suggest, that is, of taking away from the landlord all his rights to claim damages during the tenancy for breaches of covenant. The sub-section has a more limited application. If the construction of the sub-section admits of doubt, regard must be had to the principle that a statute is not to be so construed as to take away legal rights unless it is clear that such was its intention. This principle is referred to by LORD STERNDALÉ, M.R., in his judgment in Re Arden & Rutter (1) ([1923] 2 K.B. 872).

It is important to have in mind the general framework of the Act and of the part of it where s. 57 is found. Section 34 provides for compensation to a tenant for disturbance. Sections 35 to 55 relate to compensation to a tenant, on the termination of a tenancy, for improvements. Section 56 gives a right to compensation to a tenant on the termination of a tenancy where there has been continuous adoption of a special system of farming. Section 57 provides for compensation to a landlord on the termination of a tenancy for deterioration of particular parts of a holding. Section 58 provides for compensation to a landlord on the termination of a tenancy for general deterioration of the holding. Before dealing more specifically with the provisions of s. 57 it is helpful, for the purposes of the present case, to have in mind the relevant covenants in the lease. They are as follows:

"(3) To keep the erections and buildings on the land and the boundary wall and fences thereof and all future erections in good and in tenable repair except that the repairs to the said three green-houses shall be limited to keeping the same wind and water-tight . . . (5) to use the said demised land as a nursery and for no other purpose . . . (7) to keep the boiler repaired and working during the months of October to April, both months inclusive . . . (8) to keep in good order, topped, lopped, pruned and trained all fruit trees bushes and shrubs . . . (9) to allow the landlord his agents or others at any time to enter the buildings or erections standing on the land to inspect the condition of the same and to comply with any notice to repair within two months of the service of such notice."

The complaints made in the action relate to breaches of some only of these covenants. Paragraph 2 of the amended statement of claim is as follows:

"By the terms of the said lease the said lessees jointly and severally covenanted with the said landlord to keep the erection and buildings on the land and the boundary wall and fences thereof and all future erections in good and tenable repair (damage by accidental fire excepted) except that the repairs to the said three green-houses should be limited to keeping the same wind and water-tight, to use the said demised land as a nursery, to keep the boiler repaired and working during the months of October to April both months inclusive, to keep in good order topped lopped pruned and trained all fruit trees bushes and shrubs and not without the previous consent of the landlord to cut down any fruit trees or other trees provided that such consent should not be withheld if the lessees should plant a new fruit or other tree for each one cut down or removed, and to comply with any notice to repair within two months of the service of such notice."

Section 57 (3) enables a landlord "in lieu of claiming compensation under sub-s. (1)" to claim compensation "in respect of matters specified therein" under, and in accordance with, a written contract of tenancy. The "matters specified therein" are, in my judgment, "the dilapidation or deterioration of, or damage to, any part of the holding or anything in or on the holding". Such matters must be viewed and assessed in relation to the time when a tenant quits a holding on the termination of a tenancy. It is important to note the words "in lieu of". The claim which may be made under sub-s. (3) is in lieu of the claim which may be made under sub-s. (1). The claim which may be made under sub-s. (1) relates to the time when the tenant quits on the termination of a tenancy, and relates also to the condition of parts of the holding at such time. The reasonable interpretation is that both sub-sections are dealing with the same matters and the same time. When the tenant quits a holding on the termination of his tenancy the landlord may either claim the compensation given to him by statute, that is, under sub-s. (1) for deterioration, or dilapidation, or damage to parts of the holding resulting from bad husbandry, or the landlord may elect (if the written contract of tenancy avails him) to claim compensation for deterioration, or dilapidation, or damage to parts of the holding resulting from breaches of contract. But the right of the landlord to sue for damages for breaches of covenant at any other time is not affected. If there were a long lease containing covenants to keep in repair and covenants at the end of the period to yield up in repair, a claim for damages during the early period of the lease for a failure to keep in repair, assuming that damages on a recoverable basis could be proved, would not be directly related to any possible claim at a much later date which might, or might not, arise according to whether or not the premises were, or were not, yielded up in repair. So, also, when considering s. 57, it would be unnatural to regard some claim during a tenancy for some breach of covenant as being "in lieu of" some claim which could only be considered or decided on when the date of quitting on termination was known and when the state of the premises at such time could be ascertained. A B C D

Section 65 (1) of the Act is in the following terms:

"Save as expressly provided in this Act, in any case for which apart from this section the provisions of this Act provide for compensation, a tenant or landlord shall be entitled to compensation in accordance with those provisions and not otherwise, and shall be so entitled notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary: Provided that where the landlord and tenant of an agricultural holding enter into an agreement in writing for any such variation of the terms of the contract of tenancy as could be made by direction or order under s. 10 of this Act, the agreement may provide for the exclusion of compensation in like manner as under s. 63 (1) of this Act." E F

If s. 57 (3) had not been enacted, it might have been considered that on a tenant's quitting a holding on the termination of a tenancy only the statutory compensation could be claimed. In my judgment, the effect of sub-s. (3) is to give to a landlord at such time the right to rely on his contractual rights if he so chooses. But the landlord cannot have both the statutory compensation and compensation according to the terms of his contract. That is made clear by para. (b). The purpose of para. (a) is less clear. The words are: G

"compensation shall be so claimed only on the tenant's quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy."

The meaning of this is, in my judgment, that a claim under a contract referable to the state of any part of the holding at the time when the tenant quits on termination must only be brought at such time, that is, at the time when a claim for statutory compensation could be made. But this leaves unaffected any claims under contract referable to the state of any part of the building at any other time. It might be said that para. (a) was not on this basis a provision that need have been inserted, for a claim referable to the condition H at the time of quitting on termination would not normally be presented until after such time. There is force in this, but, nevertheless, in my judgment, the effect of para. (a) is to make it plain that the alternatives (that is, either to claim statutory compensation in regard to the state of parts of the holding at the time of quitting due to bad husbandry, or to claim compensation under the terms of a contract in regard to the state of the holding at the time of quitting) must arise at the same time; that time would be when the tenant

A quitted on termination. The words of para. (a) are not apt to effect a fundamental variation of contract. It would be singular if a somewhat far-reaching change in the law were enacted in so indirect a manner. If the interpretation of the provision is not clear, then the intention to take away legal rights is not established.

In considering the problem which arises in this case I do not find any direct

B assistance in s. 65 of the Act. That section opens with the words "Save as expressly provided in this Act". Nor do I derive assistance from s. 101 of the Act which is made subject to other provisions in the Act. Nor can any clear conclusion result from bearing in mind that in legislation dealing with the user of agricultural land there are provisions by which security of tenure is given to the tenant and others by which protection is in various ways given

C to him. The problem has ultimately to be solved by considering the wording of s. 57. For the reasons which I have set out, I do not consider that the provisions of s. 57 were a bar to the successful presentation by the landlord of the claims which he put forward. I, therefore, consider that SLADE, J., was not debarred from awarding damages.

Appeal dismissed.

BIRCHALL v. J. BIBBY AND SONS, LTD.

E [LIVERPOOL ASSIZES (Jones, J.), November 20, 1952.]

Negligence—Res ipsa loquitur—Onus on defendant to disprove negligence—Evidence required to discharge onus—Plaintiff injured through breaking of hoist rope—Proof that rope had been cut maliciously.

On Sept. 13, 1951, the plaintiff, who was a carter, was loading bags of bran on a wagon at a warehouse, the property of the defendants. The

F bags were being moved from the second floor of the warehouse down a shaft to the wagon by means of a sling connected to a hoist, which was under the control of a servant of the defendants. During the course of the loading the control or "brake" rope of the hoist snapped, causing three

G bags in the sling to fall. The plaintiff was struck across the back by these bags and was injured. In an action for breach of statutory duty and/or negligence the judge found the following facts (i) that there had been no breach of statutory duty (under the Docks Regulations, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 279), reg. 20 (a) (i)) to provide rope of suitable quality and free from patent defect, (ii) that the rope had been properly inspected, was of a reasonable breaking strain, and was not too old, and (iii) that

H the rope had been deliberately, and, by implication, maliciously, cut by some person or persons unknown.

HELD: (i) that the facts of the case were such that the maxim "res ipsa loquitur" applied, and that, therefore, the onus of proving that they were not negligent was on the defendants;

(ii) that in proving that the rope had been cut maliciously the defendants had discharged the onus on them, and that it was not necessary to prove positively that it had not been cut by one of their servants.

JONES, J. (in the course of his judgment) said: This is a case to which the maxim res ipsa loquitur applies. All the plaintiff has got to do was to prove that he was there, that the bags were lowered, and that one fell on him. That being established, as it has been established by him, the onus of proof is on the defendants to explain that what occurred was not due to their negligence, because, prima facie, the falling of a bag in circumstances where they had got complete control over the whole building and everything else puts the onus on them to prove that they are not liable. Counsel for the plaintiff said she was not prepared to argue that the rope had not been cut. She was satisfied that the defendants had discharged the onus of proving that the rope had been cut. She did not, however, abandon her contention that the defendants were liable, basing it on the argument that there was an obligation on them to prove that the rope was not cut by one of their servants. It is important to come to a conclusion whether the rope was cut maliciously or not. If it was cut negligently by one of the defendants' servants, the defendants would most certainly be liable, but if it was cut maliciously by one of their servants, it would hardly be an act within that servant's employment. But there was no evidence as to who cut it, merely evidence that it was cut. I am unable to accept the contention of counsel for the plaintiff that there was an obligation on the defendants to prove that the cutting was not done by one of their servants. The obligation on them was to prove that they were not negligent, and, if they call evidence and prove that the rope was cut by some person maliciously, it seems to me that they have discharged the onus on them to prove that they are not liable. I am satisfied that this rope was cut by some unknown mischievous person for whose act the defendants had no responsibility. Therefore, they have satisfied me that they were not guilty of any negligence or breach of statutory duty, and, therefore, there must be judgment for them.

CUTTRESS AND OTHERS v. SCAFFOLDING (GREAT BRITAIN), LTD. AND OTHERS.

[LIVERPOOL ASSIZES (Jones, J.), October 16, 17, 20, 21, November 3, 1952.]

Negligence—Child—Allurement—Scaffold—Erection for repair of house—Children injured by scaffold being pulled over by boys—Foreseeable danger of young persons interfering with scaffolding.

A The second defendants, a company, who were about to repair a bombed house, entered into a contract with the first defendants who erected a scaffold along a wall of the house on a piece of waste land which was accessible to the public and on which young children were often at play. At a time when the second defendants' employees were not at work some boys uncoiled a rope from the top of the scaffold and swung on it with the result that the scaffold was pulled over and injured the infant plaintiffs.

B HELD: (i) each of the defendants owed a duty to the infant plaintiffs to take all reasonable steps to prevent the scaffold falling on them, each of the defendants should have foreseen the probability of the scaffold being pulled over by children, and each of the defendants was liable to each of the plaintiffs for failure to do so.

C (ii) the second defendants should have realised that the scaffold was unstable and a danger to passers-by and they were negligent in not providing a watchman when the scaffold was left unattended.

F ACTION for damages for negligence or nuisance.

In December, 1948, the second defendants, the Huntingdon Development Co., Ltd., were about to repair a bomb-damaged house. Part of the work to be done was the repair of a wall which had been an inner wall of the house, but had become exposed. The wall faced an open space which had been the site of buildings but had become a place where the public habitually walked and where children habitually played. The second defendants entered into a contract with the first defendants, Scaffolding (Great Britain), Ltd., who erected along the wall on the open space a scaffold which was not attached to the wall. On Jan. 9, 1949, at a time when the second defendants' employees were not at work, some boys uncoiled a rope which had been left at the top of the scaffold, swung on it, and pulled it with the result that the scaffold was pulled over in one piece, injuring in its fall the three infant plaintiffs who were playing nearby and now sued by their parents as next friends.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 3. JONES, J., stated the facts, said that his attention had been drawn to a pamphlet entitled "Scaffolding" published by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, which contained much information as to scaffolds, and to reg. 12 of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), which contained useful information as to the construction of scaffolds in cases to which those regulations applied, and he continued: I find that the scaffold fell in one piece and that it fell because it was not properly constructed and was not sufficiently strutted. I find that the immediate cause of it falling was the interference with it and pressure put on it by some twelve to fifteen boys, aged about fifteen or sixteen. I find that these boys could not have pulled the scaffold over if it had been properly constructed and secured by struts in the nature of buttresses to prevent it from falling in the direction in which it fell. I think that the servants of the first defendants were probably wise in not attaching the scaffold to the wall and I am not convinced that it could have been safely tied to the building in any way, but I am satisfied that there should have been struts placed on the side of the scaffold away from the building to prevent it falling in that direction and that it was negligent of the first defendants not to provide such struts. I find that their negligence was a contributing cause of the fall of the scaffold. I find that the scaffold was liable to fall and was a danger to passers-by using this open space. I accept the proposition that an independent scaffold is recognised as a safe scaffold in certain conditions, though I believe that such a scaffold may be unsafe to passers-by if not tied or strutted. Having regard to the nature of the ground on which the scaffold rested and the number of persons frequenting the place where the scaffold was erected, it should, in my view, have been strutted to prevent it falling. I think, too, that sole plates such as are shown in the figures in the pamphlet, "Scaffolding", should have been provided as the foundation for the base plates on which the uprights rested as the ground on which the base plates rested was not sufficiently firm or level to afford a satisfactory foundation for the base plates, even though the uprights could be shortened or lengthened for the purpose of compensating for the unevenness of the ground.

I find that the servants of the second defendants should have realised that the scaffold was insufficiently secured and that children would probably interfere with it, that they were negligent in leaving a rope attached to the top of the scaffold when they left it unattended, and that their negligence was a contributing cause to the fall of the scaffold. I find that the injuries to the infant plaintiffs were caused by the fall of the scaffold, and, as I have found that the immediate cause of the fall of the scaffold was the interference with it by the boys and pressure put on it by them, it is necessary for me to consider if it was reasonably foreseeable by either of the defendants that such interference would probably occur and such pressure probably be applied and if the injuries sustained by the infant plaintiffs were circumstances which the defendants, or either of them, should have contemplated.

I was referred by counsel to the following authorities: Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew, Ltd. (1); Donovan v. Union Cartage Co., Ltd. (2); Buckland v. Guildford Gas Light & Coke Co. (3); Mumford v. Naylor (4); and Bolton v. Stone (5). I find that it was obvious to the servants of both defendants that this open space was used by the public as a thoroughfare and by children as a playground and that the scaffold would be attractive and alluring to children, particularly to boys aged about fifteen and sixteen, as a place on which to climb and play, especially if so attractive and alluring a piece of equipment as a rope was left on it. In my opinion, the servants of both defendants should have realised that any reasonably active boy would be able to climb to the top of the scaffold and should have foreseen that, if the rope was left on the top, even though coiled up, it was probable that some boy or boys would climb up and detach the loose end and that others would pull on it and pull the scaffold over and cause injury to passers-by.

- I find that the servants of the first defendants should have foreseen this probability as they knew that the scaffolding could be pulled over. Their Liverpool manager, Mr. Suckling, said in evidence that he would accept that youths of fifteen or sixteen could be expected to pull over an independent scaffold and that he was not surprised that this scaffold was pulled over.
- A These defendants provided the rope attached to a pulley at the top of the scaffold, but there was no evidence that they took any steps to warn the other defendants of the unsuitability of the scaffold if lateral pressure was applied to it or of the danger of leaving the rope attached to the pulley if unattended. I find the servants of the second defendants should have foreseen the probability of the scaffold being pulled over by children as their workmen saw
- B children playing near and taking an interest in, and interfering with, the work being done. I find that it should have been obvious to the workmen that, if they left this independent unattached scaffold unattended with a rope attached, even if coiled up at the top of the scaffold, it was probable that some boy would climb up and throw down the end of the rope and other boys pull on it, and that, if they did so, the scaffold would fall over in the absence of ties or struts
- C to prevent that happening. Counsel for the second defendants asked me to hold on the authority of Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd. (6), that his clients should be absolved from liability because they employed competent scaffold constructors in the first defendants, but I am unable to take this view because, as I have found, the servants of the second defendants, who are experienced builders, should have realised that this scaffold was not sufficiently tied or
- D strutted to prevent it falling over in the probable event of boys playing with the rope attached to the top of it, and they went away and left it unattended. If the scaffold had been properly tied or strutted, I think it would have been unnecessary to provide a watchman to watch it while the workmen were away from it, but, in view of the facts that I have found the second defendants should have realised that the scaffold was unstable and a source
- E of danger to passers-by and that their workmen left a rope attached to the top of it when they left it unattended, I find that the second defendants were negligent in not providing a watchman when their workmen were not using the scaffold.

- For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that each of the defendants owed a duty to the infant plaintiffs to take all reasonable steps to prevent the
- F scaffold falling on them and failed to discharge this duty and that each of them is liable to each of the plaintiffs in damages for negligence, but I hold that the plaintiffs cannot succeed in their claim for damages for nuisance as the scaffold did not adjoin a highway and the infant plaintiffs were not using the highway when the scaffolding fell on them and caused them injury. [His LORDSHIP then dealt with the question of damages.]

OTTER v. CHURCH, ADAMS, TATHAM & CO. (a firm).

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), December 17, 18, 19, 1952.]

Solicitor—Negligence—Damages—Tenant in tail—Failure to advise disentailment—Death of tenant in tail—Diminution of estate—Damages recoverable by personal representative of tenant in tail.

In 1941 M., a minor, became tenant in tail in possession of settled property. On Sept. 18, 1944, M. attained his majority, and was then serving overseas in the Royal Air Force. In December, 1944, M.'s mother, as agent for M., consulted solicitors who, being under the misapprehension that M. was absolutely entitled, advised that no step need be taken to transfer the settled property to M. until he returned to England. In May, 1945, M. was killed in action. He was a bachelor and died intestate, without having disentailed the settled property, which, consequently, passed to an uncle of M. M.'s mother, as his personal representative, claimed damages from the solicitors for negligence and breach of contract. The court found as a fact that the solicitors were negligent and that the breach of contract was established. On the question of the measure of damages, HELD: the damages should not be limited to the nominal amount which M. would have recovered in his lifetime, but should be ascertained in accordance with the principles relating to damages for breach of contract and extended to all damage which would naturally be expected to flow from the solicitors' breach of duty, and, in the circumstances, the failure to give proper advice might be expected to result in the loss to M.'s estate of the settled property.

ACTION by Mrs. Joan Otter as the personal representative of her son, Robert Colin Michael Otter, deceased, against Church, Adams, Tatham & Co., a firm of solicitors, for damages for negligence while acting as solicitors to the deceased, and for damages for breach of their contract of employment as solicitors.

By her will, made in 1899, Catherine Elizabeth Younge, who died in 1901, devised freehold property ("the settled estates") to her trustees on trust inter alios for William Henry Otter for life and after his death on trust for his children in tail male, and subject thereto in trust for the first and every other son of Robert Henry Otter born during the lifetime of the testatrix and living at her death successively according to their seniority in tail male with remainders over. In 1914 Robert Henry Otter died leaving two sons, the elder being Robert Edward Otter. In 1932 the said Robert Edward Otter died, leaving surviving his wife (the plaintiff), his son Michael, who was born on Sept. 18, 1923, and a daughter. In 1941 William Henry Otter died, a bachelor, and thereupon Michael became tenant in tail in possession of the settled estates, the value of which for the purposes of this action was agreed to be £7,132. After the death of the said William Henry Otter, the solicitors to the trustees of the settled estates communicated with the plaintiff and subsequently with the defendants. The defendants agreed with the view expressed by the solicitors to the trustees that Michael, who was then a minor, was absolutely entitled to the settled estates, and they so informed the plaintiff. It was arranged that, pending the attainment of his majority by Michael, the plaintiff should be paid £100 per annum out of the income of the settled estates for his maintenance. In September, 1944, Michael attained the age of twenty-one years, and was then serving overseas in the Royal Air Force. In December, 1944, the plaintiff, acting as Michael's agent, consulted the defendants, and they advised her that the transfer of the settled estates to Michael could well await his return to England. On May 14, 1945, Michael was killed in action. He was a bachelor and intestate, and the settled estates, not having been disentailed, passed under the will of the said Catherine Elizabeth Younge to Francis Otter, the younger brother of the said Robert Edward Otter.

UPJOHN, J. (having stated the facts): I am satisfied, and I find as a fact that Mr. Tatham, the partner dealing with the matter for the defendants, was grossly negligent in the advice he tendered to his client through his mother, the plaintiff, in 1944. In principle, therefore, the plaintiff has established a breach of contract by the defendants, and the question arises what is the measure of damages. Counsel for the defendants submitted that the personal representative can have no higher or better rights than the person whom he represents, and so the plaintiff can recover no greater damages than the deceased could have recovered in his lifetime. It is then truly pointed out that damages in the deceased's lifetime must necessarily have been nominal, because, the mistake having been discovered, it could have been rectified by a stroke of the pen. Counsel submits forcibly that the plaintiff is really trying to recover damages which result not from the solicitor's breach of duty, but from the death of the deceased.

The matter is free from authority, though counsel for the defendants cited three cases to me. Lockier v. Paterson (1) was a case dealing with the rights of a personal representative in an action of tort and does not really touch on this point. Valpy v. Oakeley (2) also does not deal with the point I have to consider. Finally, there was Beckham v. Drake (3), where there is a useful discussion of the general principles. Counsel for the plaintiff, on the other hand, submits that what vests in the personal representative is the right of action which was previously vested in the deceased, and he referred me to Raymond v. Fitch (4) where the judgment of LORD ABINGER, C.B., shows that as a matter of common law all choses in action which are not of a purely personal nature, such as an action for slander, survive and pass to the personal representative. Indeed, that is not disputed. Then, says counsel, the right of action being vested in the personal representative, what is the measure of damages? He points out that the measure of damages must be such as must be expected naturally to flow from the breach. He submits that that is the proper test and it is not true that the damages can be no greater than those which the deceased could have recovered in his lifetime. He puts his case, shortly, in this way: There is the right of action in the personal representative, and the damages must be ascertained in accordance with principles affecting damages for breach of contract at the time that the damage accrues. I accept that submission.

What, then, is the proper measure of damages in this case? I was referred by counsel for the defendants to the well-known rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (5) as expounded recently in Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd. (6). Damages for breach of contract must be in respect of such damage as would naturally be expected to flow from the breach, or such as must have been in the contemplation of the parties. It seems to me impossible in this case to apply the latter test having regard to the nature of the breach of contract. Therefore, I have to consider what are the damages which may naturally be expected to flow from the breach. It is true that, if Michael had continued alive, damages would be nominal. Are they, however, to be limited to the damages which he could have recovered in his lifetime? In my judgment, no. It is contrary to common sense to suppose that the damages must only be nominal merely because, had the mistake been discovered in the lifetime of Michael, it could have been rectified. The true way of looking at it, in my judgment, is this. If the mistake had been discovered in Michael's lifetime it would have been his duty to mitigate the damages, i.e., to reduce them to a nominal sum by executing a disentailing deed, but, as the mistake was not discovered until after his death, Michael has been deprived of the opportunity of increasing his estate by executing a disentailing deed, and, therefore, on his death, his estate is diminished by that amount. To take one example only, suppose the mistake had been discovered in the lifetime of Michael. He is informed of the mistake, and told that he can do one of three things. He can let matters rest where they are, in which case on his death without male issue the fund will pass from him to another branch of the family, or, alternatively, he can execute a disentailing deed and the property will become his, or, in the further alternative, he can execute a will making the property his own on his death. Let us assume that, being so informed, he instantly sends an urgent message home: "Please send out for me a disentailing deed. I desire to reduce this property into my own ownership". A disentailing deed is produced, but, unfortunately, before he can sign it, he is killed. In those circumstances can it be seriously suggested that his executor is not entitled to sue for the diminution of his estate by reason of the solicitor's breach of duty? In my judgment, it cannot seriously be suggested that that is the law, and I am not bound to say that damages in this case are only nominal because Michael could only have recovered nominal damages in his lifetime.

What, then, is the true measure of damages? It was certainly more than a remote possibility that he would be killed while on active service. The result of this failure to give him proper advice might easily result in the loss of the settled estates and must be expected to flow from the breach of duty. Counsel for the defendants submitted that even on the footing that he was wrong on his first point, viz., that damages could not be greater than the deceased could have got in his lifetime, even so, damages are nominal. I reject that argument. In the circumstances of this case, there was a serious possibility that the failure to give Michael correct advice would lead to his estate losing the whole of the settled estates.

[HIS LORDSHIP referred, inter alia, to the fact that while the question whether Michael would have entailed was a matter of conjecture, the settled estates did not comprise the family mansion house so that there was no reason to think that Michael might, in any case, have wished the property to devolve on his male relations to the exclusion of his mother and sister. The settled estates would have borne income for the benefit of Michael's estate during the seven years which had elapsed since Michael's death. HIS LORDSHIP awarded the plaintiff, in her capacity as Michael's administratrix, £6,500.]

HINDE v. HINDE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Birkett and Morris, L.J.J.), November 7, December 19, 1952.]

Divorce—Maintenance of wife—Recovery from husband's executors—Order by consent for monthly payments "until re-marriage"—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 19 (3).

A On Mar. 23, 1936, the wife was granted a decree absolute of divorce on her petition against the husband. She applied for maintenance, and on Mar. 25, 1936, the registrar made an order in the following terms: "... by consent I do order that ... the respondent do pay or cause to be paid to ... the petitioner until re-marriage ... maintenance at and after the rate of £300 per annum gross ... payable monthly ...". On B Jan. 18, 1952, the husband died, and on June 21, 1952, probate of his will was granted to his executors. After the death of the husband, no maintenance was paid to the wife. On a summons by the wife for leave to issue execution against the husband's estate, or, alternatively, against the executors.

C HELD: under s. 190 (2) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (now s. 19 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950) the jurisdiction of the court to order maintenance by way of periodical payments was limited to an order for payments "during the joint lives" of the parties to the suit; parties could not by consent give the court a jurisdiction which it did not otherwise possess; while the court would D recognise a consensual arrangement between the parties, it would not lend its process to enforce as an order that which was drawn up in the form of an order, but which in reality was the statement of an agreement in terms which the court would have no jurisdiction to impose; in the absence of evidence that the order merely embodied or evidenced terms agreed between the parties, the order must be treated as having been made under E the powers conferred on the court by the statute; to have validity as such, it must be construed as an order made for joint lives; and, therefore, the summons must be dismissed.

APPEAL by the wife against a decision of BARNARD, J., in chambers on Oct. 14, 1952, dismissing her appeal against the dismissal by Mr. Registrar KINSLEY on Sept. 22, 1952, of her summons for leave to issue execution against the estate of her deceased husband, or, alternatively, against the executors of his will.

On Mar. 23, 1936, the wife was granted a decree absolute of divorce on her petition against the husband. She applied for maintenance, and on Mar. 25, 1936, the registrar made an order by consent as follows:

"Upon hearing the solicitors for the parties and by consent I do order that Walter Stanley Hinde the respondent do pay or cause to be paid to Eunice Olwen Hinde the petitioner until re-marriage as from the date of the decree absolute herein to wit Mar. 23, 1936, maintenance at and after the rate of £300 per annum gross the said sum to be payable monthly and to pay maintenance for Eleanor Margaret Hinde the child of the marriage as follows:—(i) Payment of accounts as and when rendered up to the amount of £50 per annum. (ii) Payment of the whole of her educational expenses."

On Mar. 27, 1936, the husband re-married, and on Jan. 18, 1952, he died. At that date there were no arrears of maintenance, the wife had not re-married, and the child was over twenty-one years of age. On June 21, 1952, probate was granted to Lloyds Bank, Ltd., and Richard Trevis Scriven Hinde, as executors of the husband's will. After Jan. 18, 1952, the executors paid to the wife no maintenance, they taking the view that the order was to be construed as for joint lives, and, therefore, it ceased on the death of the husband. On Sept. 12, 1952, the wife issued a summons for an order that she might have leave to issue execution against the husband's estate, or, alternatively, against his executors, on the order dated Mar. 25, 1936, whereby it was ordered that the husband should pay the wife maintenance at the rate of £300 per annum payable monthly. On Sept. 22, 1952, Mr. Registrar KINSLEY dismissed the summons. The wife appealed, and on Oct. 14, 1952, BARNARD, J., dismissed the appeal.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19. BIRKETT, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The order of Mar. 25, 1936, is, of course, unusual in form, and the circumstances in which it came into being cannot now be accurately ascertained. Counsel who addressed us on the appeal spoke about the mechanics of the order and how orders of this kind possibly come to be made, but on that matter I think it enough to say that I think the exact circumstances in which this particular and rather unusual order came into being cannot now be accurately ascertained. The provisions of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, were then in force, but the order with which we have to deal did not follow either s. 190 (1) or (2) of that Act.

Section 190 (1) is in these terms:

"The court may, if it thinks fit, on any decree for divorce or nullity of marriage, order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife such gross sum of money or annual sum of money for any term, not exceeding her life, as having regard to her fortune, if any, to the ability of her husband and to the conduct of the parties, the court may deem to be reasonable, and the court may for that purpose order that it shall be referred to one of the conveyancing counsel of the court to settle and approve a proper deed or instrument, to be executed by all the necessary parties, and may, if it thinks fit, suspend the pronouncing of the decree until the deed or instrument has been duly executed."

It is obvious that the provisions of sub-s. (1) were not embodied in any form in the order with which we have to deal. Sub-section (2) provides:

"In any such case as aforesaid the court may, if it thinks fit, by order, either in addition to or instead of an order under sub-s. (1) of this section, direct the husband to pay to the wife during the joint lives of the husband and wife such monthly or weekly sum for her maintenance and support as the court may think reasonable . . .”

There is no mention in the order of secured payments or any mention in terms of joint lives.

A Counsel for the wife suggested that the omission of the words “joint lives” was a deliberate omission, and that the reference to “until re-marriage” confirmed this view. He further said that the provisions relating to the maintenance of the child and her education supported the view that the order was not intended to be for joint lives, but was to continue after the death of the husband if the wife had not re-married. Counsel for the husband’s executors submitted that, the order being stated to have been made by consent, it would appear to have been drawn up by the solicitors on one side, agreed to by the B solicitors on the other side, and recorded as an order of the court, although the court would have had no jurisdiction to make an order extending beyond the joint lives. He submitted that, if this was to be regarded as an order of the court, which the court could enforce, it must necessarily be an order for joint lives and no more. Counsel for the executors submitted, further, that C on the true construction of the order it was not intended to outlast the husband’s life, and an examination of the wording of the order would support that view. He contended that, if the view of the wife that the order purported to extend beyond joint lives was right, there was no power in the court to enforce it as an order, and that, at the most, it was evidence of an agreement between the parties which might be enforced in other proceedings, but not in these. D He also submitted that the summons in the present case asked for leave to issue execution against the estate of the husband, and that was not permissible in these proceedings because, in any event, there was no power in the court to make an order extending beyond joint lives, and that the order should be construed by this court to give the order validity, and, if that were done, the contention of the wife must fail.

E In the last resort I think this appeal turns on the true construction of the order of Mar. 25, 1936. It is to be observed that the order directs “that Walter Stanley Hinde the respondent do pay or cause to be paid”. That would seem to indicate that the husband is alive to fulfil his obligation. Nothing is said that contemplates his death, or what is to happen to the provision for maintenance in that contingency. Nothing is said to indicate that the maintenance is to be paid “during the life of the wife” as in Kirk v. Eustace (1). It is true F that the order states that the husband do pay or cause to be paid to the wife “until re-marriage”, and the wife has never re-married, but I do not think that this provision is in any sense conclusive of the matter. In my view, it must be inread conjunction with the rest of the order and the event of re-marriage contemplated was re-marriage in the lifetime of the husband. I see G no ground for saying that by that provision the husband was binding his estate to pay maintenance after his death if the wife had not re-married. If the wife had re-married in the lifetime of the husband, the liability of the husband would have ceased, and that, I think, was the intent and meaning of the words.

H The provision for the child is made part of the order. The jurisdiction of the court to order such payments is contained in s. 193 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. The court cannot order payment after the child reaches the age of twenty-one. The provisions of the order relating to the child of the marriage would seem to have been framed on the view that the husband would be alive to meet them, and nothing is said about what is to occur if he dies before the educational expenses are complete or what is to happen to the payments of £50 per annum in the event of his death. All these matters seem to me to point to the conclusion that the order was made on the footing of joint lives.

In the course of the argument many cases were cited to us, but, with great respect, I do not think any of them was in any sense of decisive help in this case. In Kirk v. Eustace (1), by a deed made in 1922 providing for a separation between husband and wife, and containing mutual covenants to live separate and apart, the husband covenanted with his wife to pay her the weekly sum of £2 during her life for her maintenance and support, but determinable upon reconciliation. In 1936 the husband died. The widow claimed that his estate was liable to continue paying the maintenance during the rest of her life, but the executors contended that the liability had come to an end by the husband's death. It was held by the House of Lords that, as the deed provided that the weekly payment to the wife should continue during her life and as there was nothing in the language used to show an intention that the husband's obligation should continue only during his life, his estate remained liable to pay the weekly sum to the widow. It is to be observed that in the argument counsel for the wife said that the obligation undertaken by the husband was to pay that sum to the wife during her life, and it followed by virtue of s. 80 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, that it was binding on the husband's estate.

LORD ATKIN said ([1937] 2 All E.R. 718):

"Therefore, this contract, which is under seal, is to be read as if it were made by the husband for his executors and administrators, unless the contrary intention is found expressed in the covenant. So far, the matter seems to me to be beyond question, and the wife has the right expressed in the deed. From the judgment given by the late DEPUTY JUDGE OWEN—the judgment of a very careful, learned and experienced lawyer—the county court judge had apparently no doubt upon the matter, and he gave reasons, which appear to me to be convincing, for holding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. On appeal . . . the majority of the Court of Appeal took a different view; SLESSER and SCOTT, L.JJ., differed from EVE, J., and the majority took the view that, in this particular covenant, there was a contrary intention expressed as to the covenant binding the estate of the testator, or in other words continuing after his death. The view that was taken was that, in a deed of this kind (I am now paraphrasing the grounds of the judgment, but I think I am expressing them accurately), the main object of the deed was to provide for the parties living apart; on the death of the husband, they could no longer live apart—I think that is true—and, inasmuch as they could no longer live apart, the whole basis of the contract had disappeared, and thereupon all the agreements came to an end."

That case was considered by the Court of Appeal in Langstone v. Hayes (2), which, I think, was the most helpful of the cases cited. It was there held by the Court of Appeal that there was no rule of law that a covenant in a separation deed by a husband to pay his wife an annuity is intended to bind the estate of the covenantor. Whether it did so or not depended on the construction of the provisions of the deed. By a deed of separation executed on June 10, 1926, by Cecil Joseph Langstone and his wife, it was provided by cl. 1 (i) that the wife might at all future times live apart from the husband and free from his control. By cl. 1 (iii):

"The husband will pay to the wife . . . for her separate use and for the maintenance and support of herself a clear annuity of £104 . . . payable by weekly payments of £2 cash . . . until determined as provided by cl. 3 (ii) ", which was that:

"if, at any future time, the spouses shall with their mutual consent again cohabit as man and wife, or the wife shall not remain chaste, the annuity . . . shall thereupon determine and the deed shall then become void."

There were various other clauses about non-molestation and the like. SCOTT, L.J., who read the judgment of the court, said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 115):

A "The main issue tried by the county court judge was whether, on its true construction, the covenant by the husband bound his personal representatives, or was limited to the joint lives of the spouses . . . Counsel for the wife, both below and before us, relied upon the decision of the House of Lords in Kirk v. Eustace (1); or alternatively, if that decision did not conclude the appeal in his favour, he submitted that his contention gave the proper meaning to the covenant and he further relied upon certain observations of LORD ATKIN, and possibly of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, in that case. In our view, neither argument avails the wife. B Unless the deed or written contract under consideration is a matter of common form—at least, in respect of the particular provision which falls to be considered—it is dangerous to seek to apply to it the judicial interpretation of another document unless that other document is so similar in its terms as to be almost identical; a principle applied to a separation deed by BOWEN, L.J. (31 Ch.D. 524, at p. 529) in Nicol v. Nicol (3). In C Kirk v. Eustace (1) the deed of separation said expressly that the husband's obligation to pay was to endure 'during the life' of the wife. The majority of the Court of Appeal in that case (of which I was one, EVE, J., differing) thought that even that clear expression of intention ought to give way to other indications in the deed of an intention that it was only to operate D during the joint lives of the spouses. The instant deed, as the county court judge has pointed out, differs in an important respect from the deed in Kirk v. Eustace (1): viz., by the complete omission from the deed of the phrase 'during the life of the wife'. There were apparently no children of the marriage. [HIS LORDSHIP then read cls. 1 (i), 1 (iii) and 3 (ii) of the deed, and continued:] I can see nothing in these provisions to extend the husband's covenant beyond the term of their joint lives: E everything presumes the continuance of his life during performance of the covenant to pay. This view of the agreement is supported by other terms in the deed . . . Every one of these provisions seems to us in terms to assume that the husband is still alive and, therefore, to apply only to the period of their joint lives; thus distinguishing this deed of separation, on a radical point of its terms, from Kirk v. Eustace (1)."

F Langstone v. Hayes (2) seems to make it clear that the construction of the order in the present case is the all important thing and that the order must be read as a whole.

G The conclusions to which I come, therefore, are these: (i) If this order is to have validity as an order of the court, it must be construed as an order made for joint lives, and (ii) on the construction of the order, the use of the name of the husband simply, the absence of any reference to the life of the wife as the period for which maintenance is to be paid, the use of the words "until re-marriage" in the context of the order, the provisions for maintenance of the child of the marriage contained in the same order, all seem to me to point to the order being one in which the liabilities of the husband were limited H to the joint lives of the husband and wife. For these reasons, I think that the decision of BARNARD, J., was right and the order of Mar. 25, 1936, imposed liability on the husband for joint lives only. In my opinion, therefore, this appeal ought to be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J., stated the facts and continued: In an affidavit in support of the application to the registrar it was deposed:

"As a result of the death of the above-named respondent no steps have been taken to enforce the said order without leave under the provisions of r. 62 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950."

Rule 62 (1) of those rules is in the following terms:

"In default of payment to any person of any sum of money at the time appointed by any order of the court for the payment thereof, a writ of fieri facias, sequestration, or elegit shall be sealed and issued as of course out of the divorce registry upon an affidavit of service of the order and of non-payment."

Leave was sought pursuant to the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23 which are as follows:

"(a) Where six years have elapsed since the judgment or date of the order, or any change has taken place by death or otherwise in the parties entitled or liable to execution . . . the party alleging himself to be entitled to execution may apply to the court or a judge for leave to issue execution accordingly. And such court or judge may, if satisfied that the party so applying is entitled to issue execution, make an order to that effect, or may order that any issue or question necessary to determine the rights of the parties shall be tried in any of the ways in which any question in an action may be tried. And in either case such court or judge may impose such terms as to costs or otherwise as shall be just."

That order applies by reason of r. 80 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950.

The form of the proceedings makes it clear that the application to the court is for enforcement of an order of the court for the maintenance of the wife. It does not appear to be suggested that any order of the court for the maintenance or education of the child of the marriage still has effect. What is said, however, either expressly or by implication, is that by the order of Mar. 25, 1936, the court made an order binding the husband, or, after his death, his estate, to pay maintenance at the stated rate to the wife until her re-marriage. When the order was made the statutory provisions in force were those contained in s. 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. Sub-section (1) of that section provided for secured payments. The opening words are as follows:

"The court may, if it thinks fit, on any decree for divorce or nullity of marriage, order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife such gross sum of money or annual sum of money . . ."

My Lord has already read s. 190 (2). Then s. 193 (1) provides:

"In any proceedings for divorce or nullity of marriage or judicial separation, the court may from time to time, either before or by or after the final decree, make such provision as appears just with respect to the custody, maintenance and education of the children, the marriage of whose parents is the subject of the proceedings or, if it thinks fit, direct proper proceedings to be taken for placing the children under the protection of the court."

It follows that the only jurisdiction which the court had to order the husband to pay £300 per annum to the wife was limited to the period of the joint lives. Though parties may agree on amounts or may make agreements as to payments, they cannot by consent confer on the court a jurisdiction which it does not possess. Thus, in Re Aylmer. Ex p. Bischoffsheim (4) LORD ESHER, M.R., in the course of his judgment (20 Q.B.D. 262), referred to the "well known rule" that

"the consent of parties cannot give the court a jurisdiction which it does not otherwise possess."

See also British Wagon Co., Ltd. v. Gray (5).

In Maidlow v. Maidlow (6) there was an agreed order for payment of maintenance to a wife "for her life". It was held in this court, affirming the decision of SIR SAMUEL EVANS, P., that the court could not accede to the husband's petition for a decrease of the amount of maintenance. It was said ([1914] P. 249) by SWINFEN EADY, L.J., that, if there had been an order by consent in the language of the statute for the payment of maintenance to the wife during the joint lives of the husband and wife, the mere fact that the parties had agreed the amount to be paid would not have prevented an application from being made for a modification of the order if the circumstances of the parties afterwards changed. But the order which was made by consent was for payment to the wife "for her life". In reference to it, SWINFEN EADY, L.J., said (ibid.):

- A parties had agreed the amount to be paid would not have prevented an application from being made for a modification of the order if the circumstances of the parties afterwards changed. But the order which was made by consent was for payment to the wife "for her life". In reference to it, SWINFEN EADY, L.J., said (ibid.):
- B "It is objected that, unless the parties consented to an order in that form, there was no jurisdiction in the judge to make such an order. He could order payment of maintenance during the joint lives under the statute [Matrimonial Causes Act, 1907], but there is no power under s. 1 (2), to order payment to the wife during her life. Under s. 1 (1), there is power to secure to the wife such gross sum of money or such annual sum of money for any term not exceeding her life as, having regard to the various circumstances, may be deemed reasonable, and under sub-s. (2) power to order payment to the wife during their joint lives of such monthly or weekly sum as may be reasonable. It is urged that there was a bargain between the husband and wife, which the court is not at liberty to vary, and that the wife accepted a less sum than she might otherwise have claimed, so that she might have the advantage of receiving it for her life.
- C
- D In my opinion an order so made cannot be subsequently varied."

That case shows that the court will recognise a consensual arrangement and will not interfere with it, but it does not establish that the court will lend its process to enforce as an order that which is drawn up in the form of an order, but which in reality is the statement of an agreement in terms which the court would have no jurisdiction to impose. It is to be pointed out that in the present case there are not the words "for her life", though there are the words "until her re-marriage".

- E In Mills v. Mills (7) a wife obtained a decree absolute of divorce on Nov. 21, 1932. An order by consent was made on Dec. 29, 1932, directing the husband to pay to the wife during their joint lives and until further order maintenance of £5 a week, "without prejudice to any further order". In 1933 payments fell into arrear, and the wife took out a judgment summons for £90. The parties then agreed that the husband should pay the wife a lump sum of £1,250 in full discharge of all claims by her to maintenance. On Oct. 9, 1933, an order was made embodying the agreement. The order also discharged the order of Dec. 29, 1932, and dismissed the maintenance petition and the judgment summons. On Jan. 31, 1940, the wife took out a summons calling on the husband to show cause why she should not have liberty to apply for maintenance in accordance with the provisions contained in the order of Oct. 9, 1933. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the application was not "on" a decree for divorce within the meaning of s. 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and that the court had no jurisdiction to grant it. In the course of his judgment, SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., said
- G
- H ([1940] 2 All E.R. 258):

"The order on the face of it also purports to direct payment of a lump sum. That payment is something which the court had no jurisdiction in itself to order, because the jurisdiction of the court, so far as relevant, is confined to securing, under s. 190 (1), a gross or annual sum, or under s. 190 (2), ordering the payment of a periodical sum to the wife. It is settled that the court has not power to order payment to the wife out-and-out of a lump sum, but it has also been held that the court has jurisdiction by consent to make an order of that character. The order, therefore, on the face of it, is an order by consent directing the husband to do something which the court, apart from consent, could never order him to do, and by consent it is discharging the original order, and dismissing the petition upon which it was made . . . There is one further point, before I leave this matter, on the form of order, on which I should like to comment. I have already said that there is no jurisdiction in the court to order payment to the wife of a lump sum. Such payment can only be consensual. That being so, I take the view that in such cases it is not desirable that the court should direct the payment of such a lump sum, which is merely consensual. There is no necessity for the court to be appearing by consent to be making an order which it has no jurisdiction to make at all. There are many other ways of providing for these matters. What the court has jurisdiction to do is, of course, to discharge its previous order. The sum can be paid first, in which case all that is required is a recital in the order that such-and-such an agreed sum has been paid in full satisfaction, and an order by consent that the existing maintenance order be discharged. If the sum has not been paid, I see no reason why the order should not take the form that, upon payment of the sum, the existing order should stand discharged, when the ordinary routine would be, as is the practice in another Division, that, upon the party producing before the registrar an affidavit verifying the payment . . . the existing maintenance order should be discharged."

But it may well happen that the parties who have made a contract cause a consent order to be drawn up, which in its effect is no more than evidence of their contract. Thus in Wentworth v. Bullen (8), PARKE, J., said (9 B. & C. 850):

"Now though there is no remedy for disobedience of a judge's order (as such) by one of the parties against another by action, but by attachment merely, yet if it be made by the consent of both, and is founded on a binding agreement, an action will not the less lie upon that agreement, though it have also the additional sanction of a judge's order. The contract of the parties is not the less a contract, and subject to the incidents of a contract, because there is superadded the command of the judge."

The words "by consent" in the order of Mar. 25, 1936, may denote that the parties agreed the amounts which the court, acting within its jurisdiction, could order the husband to pay, or they may denote that the parties agreed to the terms extending beyond those which the court, acting within its jurisdiction, could order. A consent order may amount to a contract, or may be evidence of, or corroboration of, some contract which has already been made, but, if the court is invited to make an order by consent and an order is then drawn up which, according to one construction, is within the powers of the court, while, according to another construction, it is not, the court will proceed on the basis that the order is made within the powers of the court until it is shown that the position was that the parties merely made a contract and that the consent order was intended to be the embodiment or the evidence of the terms agreed.

The application made in the present case was one to enforce in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division an order made in that Division, that is, the order of Mar. 25, 1936. That order, if it was an order which was made within the power and jurisdiction of the court, must have been one to operate during the joint lives of the husband and wife, even though this is not expressly stated in the order. If, therefore, it was such an order, the application to enforce it after the death of the husband rightly failed. If it was not such an order, but if it is contended that there was a contract imposing an obligation not affected by the death of the husband, then the existence of such a contract must be established before there could be leave to issue execution. The present proceedings which are brought against the executors are brought to enforce in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division an order made in that Division and are not appropriate for advancing a contention that a purely contractual obligation has not been fulfilled. If it is sought to be said that the order of

- A Mar. 25, 1936, went beyond an order of the court made within its jurisdiction and was a contract in terms beyond the powers of the court, or was evidence of such a contract, this contention must be advanced in some proceedings raising it as an issue to be tried. It may be that there is no evidence of a contract other than such as is afforded by the circumstance that in the order of Mar. 25, 1936, which on this basis was not merely or strictly an order,
- B there is no stated overriding limitation referable to the continuance of the joint lives. Whether any other evidence exists is not known to the court. None has been mentioned. If the parties had wished to make provision extending beyond their joint lives they could have done so in some clear, formal document. The order of Mar. 25, 1936, does not, on its face or by its terms, contain any clear indication that it overran the statutory powers of
- C the court. Leave to issue execution on the order of Mar. 25, 1936, was rightly refused for the reason that, if it was an order of the Divorce Court, it was not made, and could not have been made, so as to operate beyond the period of the joint lives, and, therefore, this appeal must be dismissed. The possibility of asserting in an action and of seeking to prove and establish that there was a contract as alleged by the wife can neither be excluded nor encouraged.

Water and Watercourses—Pollution of river—Untreated sewage matter—Action by riparian owner and fishery owner against local authority—Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (c. 75), s. 3—Derby Corporation Act, 1901 (c. cclxvii), s. 109 (1), s. 113.

Electricity Supply—Right to abstract water from river—Water returned in heated condition—Injury to fish—Rights of Earl of Harrington "as riparian owner . . . upon the river"—Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Act, 1929 (c. lxxxvi), s. 37 (1), s. 37 (2).

Injunction—Nuisance—Local authority—Licence needed for work necessary for compliance with injunction—Form of order.

H

The first plaintiff, an angling association, was the owner or occupier of a fishery on the rivers Derwent and Trent from below the confluence of the rivers to Borrowash Bridge on the Derwent, about seven miles above the confluence. The second plaintiff, the Earl of Harrington, was a riparian owner of a considerable stretch of both rivers. On the banks of the Derwent below Derby and above the plaintiffs' waters were works maintained by the defendants. Immediately after passing Derby the river was in a reasonably pure state and supported game fish, but before reaching Borrowwash Bridge, owing to the activities of the defendants, it was polluted to such an extent that it was foul and black and contained little or no fish. The pollution was caused (a) by effluent consisting of sewage matter, insufficiently treated and discharged into the river from the sewage works of the second defendants, Derby Corporation, and (b) heated effluent, containing suspended organic matter, discharged into the river from the works of the first defendants, a company, which admitted liability. The damage and danger resulting from the pollution were aggravated by the rise in the temperature of the water caused by large quantities of heated effluent which were discharged into the river from the generating station of the third defendants, the British Electricity Authority, which had been set up and maintained under the powers conferred on their predecessor by the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Acts, 1901 and 1929. The water which was discharged into the river from the works of the electricity authority had been extracted from the river. On Apr. 9, 1952, in an action by the plaintiffs, the judge granted a perpetual injunction restraining each of the defendants from causing or permitting any effluent to flow or pass from their respective premises into the river Derwent (a) so as sensibly to alter the quality (including the temperature) of the waters of the river Derwent or of the river Trent where they flow past or over any part of the plaintiffs' premises, or (b) so as to interfere with the enjoyment by the plaintiffs, or either of them, of the right of fishing in any part of their waters. He further ordered that the operation of the injunction be suspended until Apr. 30, 1954. On appeal, the corporation contended, inter alia, (a) that, as the sewage works were authorised by the Derby Corporation Act, 1901, were completed in accordance with the Act, and were satisfactory when completed, if at a later date, owing to an increase of population, over which the corporation had no control, they functioned so as to cause a nuisance, this was merely non-feasance on the part of the corporation and the plaintiffs had no right of action against them, or, at most, merely a right to compensation; and (b) that, in any event, an injunction should not be granted against a local authority. The electricity authority, while accepting an injunction against them, contended that the injunction granted by the judge was too wide in its terms.

HELD: (i) section 109 (1) of the Derby Corporation Act, 1901, which authorised the corporation to construct and maintain their sewage works, contained an express prohibition, which was of general application, against the corporation operating the works so as to cause a nuisance; although s. 113 of the Act of 1901 empowered the corporation to divert brooks and streams and to use them when diverted for carrying sewage, the first proviso to the section stated that the corporation were not authorised to do anything in contravention of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, and under s. 3 of the Act of 1876 it was an offence to cause any solid or liquid sewage matter to fall or flow into any stream; the second proviso to s. 113 of the Act of 1901, whereby the corporation were to pay compensation for damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers of the section, did not apply, as a contravention of the Rivers Pollution (Prevention) Act, 1876, was not something done under the powers of the section; and, therefore, the corporation had no statutory defence to the plaintiffs' action, and were liable to the plaintiffs for the nuisance; and in regard to nuisance, the question of non-feasance, as distinct from misfeasance, was irrelevant, the question being whether the thing complained of as a nuisance was expressly or impliedly authorised by the Act under which the works in question were constructed.

Glossop v. Heston & Isleworth Local Board (1879) (12 Ch.D. 102), and A.-G. v. Dorking Guardians (1882) (20 Ch.D. 595), distinguished.

(ii) where an actionable nuisance had been created, the court would prima facie restrain the wrongdoer from persisting in his activities, and, although the court might, in special circumstances, leave the injured party to his remedy in damages, the mere fact that the wrongdoer was a local authority was not a circumstance of that character; the fact that, under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927, as amended), reg. 56A, the corporation would be unable to do the necessary work without a licence from the Minister of Works was not a sufficient reason why the ordinary practice should not be followed; the court, however, would not impose on a local authority, or on anyone, an obligation to do something which was impossible; and, therefore, the judge had rightly ordered the operation of the injunction to be suspended for a time.

(iii) the protection given by s. 37 (2) of the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Act, 1929, to the Earl of Harrington's rights "as riparian owner . . . upon the river" was, on the face of it, more extensive than the general protection of fishing rights given by the proviso to s. 37 (1), but, as it was not suggested that the earl was at present suffering from, or likely to suffer from, any damage to his riparian rights apart from anything that might be done to the fishery, and as the plaintiff association was entitled, under the proviso to s. 37 (1), merely to a protection of its fishery rights, the injunction against the electricity authority should be limited so as only to restrain them from returning the water, after using it, in such a condition as to cause injury to fish, and the earl should be given liberty to apply for a further injunction if he could show that some other of his riparian rights were being injuriously affected by the authority's activities.

APPEAL by the second defendants, Derby Corporation, and the third defendants, British Electricity Authority (East Midlands Division), from an order of HARMAN, J., dated Apr. 9, 1952, and reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 1326, in an action for damages and injunctions in respect of the pollution of certain stretches of the river Derwent and the river Trent.

The first plaintiff, the Pride of Derby and Derbyshire Angling Association, Ltd., was the owner or occupier of a fishery on the rivers Trent and Derwent at a point round about their confluence and running up the latter river about six miles, and it also had fishing rights at two points on the south bank of the river Derwent. The second plaintiff, the Earl of Harrington, was riparian owner of a considerable stretch of both rivers, the material part consisting of about seven miles of water beginning slightly below their confluence and running up the Derwent to a bridge known as Borrowash Bridge. In an action against British Celanese, Ltd., Derby Corporation and the British Electricity Authority, the plaintiffs claimed inter alia (i) an injunction restraining each of the defendants from causing or permitting any effluent to flow or pass from the premises of such defendant at Spondon, in the county of Derby, into the river Derwent so as to pollute (either by itself or in combination with any effluent discharged into such river by any of the other defendants or any other persons) the waters of (a) the river Derwent where they flowed past or over the lands below Borrowash Bridge and above the confluence of that river with the river Trent where the first plaintiff was owner of the bed thereof or of a several fishery therein, and the second plaintiff was owner of the banks or bank thereof, or (b) of the river Trent immediately F below its confluence with the river Derwent where the first plaintiff was owner of a several fishery therein, or entitled as tenant to a right of fishing, and the second plaintiff was owner of the banks or bank thereof; (ii) an injunction restraining the first defendant, British Celanese, Ltd., or the third defendants, the British Electricity Authority, from causing or permitting any effluent to flow or pass from their respective premises at Spondon into the river Derwent so as perceptibly to alter (either by itself or in combination with any other effluents discharged into such river by any of the other defendants or any other person) the temperature of the waters of the river where they flowed past or over any of the plaintiffs' premises; (iii) damages in trespass and nuisance against all the defendants.

Each of the defendants maintained works on or near the banks of the river Derwent near Spondon, up-stream of the plaintiffs' waters and below Derby.

B After leaving Derby and immediately below Raynesway Bridge, the river took three loops to the north. On the north bank of the first loop, the corporation had constructed sewage works under powers conferred on them by the Derby Corporation Act, 1901. The works had been extended under the Derby Corporation Act, 1930, but, owing to the increase of the population of Derby, they were now inadequate, and sewage matter which was insufficiently treated

C was discharged into the river from the sewage works by means of a pipe or drain. On the second loop of the river were the first defendant's works. About fifty-four million gallons of water were taken daily into the first defendant's lagoons and some of this water was returned to the river in a heated and extremely foul condition. On the third loop (and nearest to the plaintiffs' waters) were an electric generating station and works, which were

D constructed under the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Acts, 1901 and 1929, and were now vested in and maintained by the third defendants, British Electricity Authority, under the Electricity Act, 1947. To cool their condensers, the electricity authority took about a hundred and twenty million gallons of water daily from the river, and, as the water was already foul when it reached the generating station, a small quantity of chlorine was infused

E into it at the intake to neutralise the damage which it would otherwise do to the machinery. After use, the greater part of this water was returned to the river at a greatly increased temperature. Immediately after leaving Derby the river was in a reasonably clean condition, but by the time it reached the plaintiffs' waters, it was heated and extremely foul and could not sustain fish life. Shortly before the hearing of the action, the first defendant admitted

F that its activities polluted the stream to the detriment of the plaintiffs and submitted to some form of relief by way of injunction. The corporation and the electricity authority each denied liability and each contended that their own activities were not sufficient to cause a nuisance. The corporation further contended, inter alia, that, if a nuisance arose from their works, they were absolved as they were under a statutory duty to do the things which created

G a nuisance. The electricity authority contended, inter alia, that they were empowered by s. 37 (1) of the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Act, 1929, to abstract water from the river and use it in the way in which they did.

HARMAN, J., held that the plaintiffs had established a good cause of action against all three defendants and granted an injunction against them. Having

H ordered an inquiry as to damages, the learned judge apportioned the damage between the defendants at their request. The corporation appealed from the decision of HARMAN, J., on the ground, inter alia, that they were under a statutory duty to provide a sewage system for Derby, and, therefore, in the absence of negligence on their part, the plaintiffs had no cause of action against them. The electricity authority, while accepting that an injunction should be granted against them, appealed against the form of the injunction on the ground that it was too wide. In the event of both or either of these appeals being successful, the plaintiffs appealed against the apportionment of damage.

Teague for the first defendant, British Celanese, Ltd.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This is an action for pollution of the River Derwent east of Borrowash Bridge and up to the point of its confluence with the River Trent. The claim also extended to some pollution of the River Trent itself. The plaintiffs in the action are the Pride of Derby and Derbyshire Angling Association, Ltd., which is concerned with the state of the fishing in the stretch of the rivers in question, and the Earl of Harrington, who is a riparian owner on a considerable part of the rivers concerned. As such riparian owner, his common law rights in certain respects are more extensive than the rights of the plaintiff association, a point which is relevant to the appeal of the British Electricity Authority, and to which I shall in due course return. There were originally four defendants to the action: British Celanese, Ltd., Derby Corporation, the British Electricity Authority (East Midlands Division) and Midland Tar Distilleries, Ltd. The last-named defendants discontinued operations in this neighbourhood at an early stage, and the proceedings were, accordingly, stayed against them. The action proceeded to trial against the first three defendants. A large part of the judgment of HARMAN, J., is concerned with proof of the pollution on the part of each of the three defendants. He concluded that the material stretch of the river was very gravely polluted and was in a state such as extinguished therein all fish life and also all fish food. He also concluded that, although the first defendant, British Celanese, Ltd., was the most serious offender, the second and third defendants substantially contributed to the pollution, and, accordingly, that all three defendants were liable to the plaintiffs. He rejected the proposition that, since all defendants were individually polluting, none could be made liable, a proposition which seems to bear some analogy to the principle that a man armed with several umbrellas must be taken to have no umbrella at all. We are not concerned with these matters because there is no appeal in respect of any of them. As to the second defendants, Derby Corporation, the learned judge said:

"I cannot doubt, having heard the evidence, that the solids put into the stream by the corporation are a substantial contribution to the state of things existing in the plaintiffs' waters."

As to the third defendants, the electricity authority, he said:

"I find, therefore, that the power company's activities in the present state of the river sensibly contribute to the harm that is being done to the plaintiffs. Moreover, I accept the evidence of Dr. Steven, another scientist called by the plaintiffs, that, even if this were a clean stream, these activities, though perhaps not harmful to the plaintiffs in the winter months, would be harmful in the summer when the natural temperatures are higher."

Finally, at the end of his judgment, he said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1340):

"In the upshot, therefore, I hold that the plaintiffs have established a good cause of action against both the corporation and the power company, as they admittedly have against the first defendant."

The learned judge made the following order:

"This court doth order that each of them [British Celanese, Ltd., Derby Corporation and British Electricity Authority] (which defendants are in this order collectively referred to as the said defendants) be perpetually restrained from causing or permitting (whether by their respective servants or agents or workmen or otherwise howsoever) any effluent to flow or pass from their respective premises in the county of Derby in the pleadings mentioned into the river Derwent (a) so as sensibly to alter (either by itself or in combination with any effluent discharged into the said river by any of the said defendants or any other person) the quality (including the temperature) of the waters of the said river Derwent or the waters of the river Trent where the same flow past or over any part of the plaintiffs' premises as mentioned and defined in the statement of claim to the injury of the plaintiffs or either of them or their respective sequels in title or of any person or persons claiming under or through them or any of them in respect of the plaintiffs' said premises or any part thereof, or (b) so as to interfere (either by itself or in combination as aforesaid) with the enjoyment by the plaintiffs or either of them or their respective sequels in title or any person or persons claiming under or through them or any of them of the right of fishing in any part of the plaintiffs' waters as mentioned and defined in the statement of claim."

C Then, after a reference to certain undertakings, it was ordered:

"That the operation of the foregoing injunction be suspended until Apr. 30, 1954," i.e., approximately two years from the date of the order. The learned judge ordered an inquiry as to damages. The order proceeds:

D "And the said defendants by their counsel consenting to this apportionment it is ordered that the damages which upon the taking of such inquiry shall be certified as aforesaid be paid by the said defendants in the following proportions, namely: the defendant company [British Celanese, Ltd.] one half, the defendant corporation one quarter, the defendant authority one quarter."

E I need not refer to the rest of the order, which related to costs and matters of that kind, save to note that at the end of it there was included a direction: "And the parties are to be at liberty to apply as they may be advised". The apportionment of the obligation to pay damages will be noted. As each of the three remaining defendants are substantial, the plaintiffs are content with the result so long as neither of the appeals now before us succeeds. If either or both should succeed, then the plaintiffs have appealed, but their appeal has not yet been called on.

[HIS LORDSHIP summarised the facts, and continued:] The first appeal, that of Derby Corporation, raises two points, one being of a secondary character, and arising only if the corporation fail on the first. Their first and main contention is of this nature. They say (a) that they are a local authority charged by legislation (in their case, special legislation) with the duty of providing a sewerage system for the county borough of Derby; (b) that the present sewerage system, including the sewage disposal works, were originally constructed by them strictly in accordance with, and as contemplated by, their special legislation, viz., the Derby Corporation Act, 1901, and that at the time when they were first constructed, these works were effective to deal with the sewage of Derby without polluting the river Derwent; (c) that, after the sewerage works were enlarged, pursuant to and as contemplated by the Derby Corporation Act, 1930, they were again effective to deal with all the sewage of Derby without polluting the river Derwent; (d) that at no time has it been shown that the corporation have been guilty of any fault, such, for example, as failure to keep their system in a proper state of repair; and (e) that the pollution is the result of the fact that the system, which had become inadequate before 1930 through (and solely through) the increase of the population of Derby, has again become inadequate from similar causes, those causes being wholly beyond the control of the corporation. On those premises, the corporation say that the plaintiffs have no cause of action against them. The plaintiffs' remedy, they say, is solely by way of application to the Minister of Local Government and Planning under the Public Health Acts, calling on him to take, if he thinks fit, such steps as may be required to compel the corporation once more to enlarge their sewerage system. At most, say the corporation, the remedy of the plaintiffs is to obtain, under the Acts, compensation as therein provided for the damage that they have suffered: see Public Health Act, 1936. Counsel for the Derby Corporation contended, in brief, that, once it is established that the work, being work of a local authority duly authorised by Act of Parliament, was completed in accordance with the Act, and was satisfactory at the time when it was completed, then if at a later date, owing to circumstances beyond the control of the local authority (and in the absence of any negligence on their part), the system so functions as to cause a nuisance, that is a mere non-feasance, and the only remedy of anyone damaged is, as I have indicated, under the Public Health Acts. There is no dispute about the premises as I have stated them. The question is in regard to the validity of the conclusion. A

The secondary argument of the corporation was that if the plaintiffs had a cause of action, the judge ought not to have granted an injunction, but should have left them to their remedy in damages. That argument was based, primarily, on the peculiar difficulties of the corporation, having regard, among other things, to the necessity of licences for building operations, under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927, as amended), reg. 56A, and also to the fact that any money required for undertaking works of reconstructing the sewerage system could be borrowed only with the consent of the Minister of Health. Counsel for the corporation contended that an injunction should never be granted against a local authority, at any rate in regard to its sewerage works, since an injunction, though negative in form, was mandatory in substance and would be a means of bringing improper pressure to bear on the Minister of Works in the exercise of his duties in granting licences. He further contended that it was a wrong interference with the corporation's right to deal with their problems in such order as they thought fit. B

I can dispose summarily of the corporation's submission that the injunction would operate in some way as bringing pressure on the Minister of Works. I have no doubt whatever that the Minister will perform his duty of granting licences and priorities in respect of licences with impartiality, and with the single aim of faithfully performing his duty to the national benefit. The existence of the injunction will, no doubt, make clear to him that the pollution of the river by the Derby Corporation is serious (as the corporation now admit that it is) and that ameliorative measures in respect thereof are urgent. As for the point that the injunction constitutes, as it were, an invasion of the sovereign authority of the corporation to decide as they choose what operations to perform and when, I say no more than that, in my judgment, such a submission is without warrant or foundation. C

It is clear that, if a public authority so exercise any of their functions as to cause a private nuisance to any person, the authority, like any other subject, are liable in consequence to be sued in these courts, unless they can rely on some statute as providing, by express language or necessary or proper inference, a defence to such an action. So much appears, for example, from Metropolitan Asylum District v. Hill (1). In the present case, the corporation have set up the Derby Corporation Act, 1901, as their defence. The Derby Corporation Act, 1930, for present purposes adds nothing to what may be extracted from the Act of 1901. The first and principal question, therefore, is the construction D and effect of the Derby Corporation Act, 1901. That Act made provision in Part V, s. 105 to s. 117, for the "Sewerage and sewage disposal works" with which we are concerned. Section 105 provided that:

"The corporation may appropriate and utilise for the treatment and disposal of sewage the lands described in sched. V to this Act . . ."

The lands so described are those shown on the sketch plan which was used by both sides in this case. Section 106 reads:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act the corporation may make and maintain in and according to the lines situations and levels shown on the deposited plans and sections the sewerage works hereinafter described together with all necessary and proper intakes outfalls overflows sewers drains channels weirs sluices junctions syphons engines pumps boilers machinery culverts shafts tanks manholes filters contact beds works buildings and conveniences connected therewith and may enter upon take and use such of the lands delineated upon the deposited plans and described in the deposited books of reference as may be required for that purpose."

Although that section is in terms permissive, I assume in the corporation's favour (and I think that the assumption is well-founded) that the effect of s. 112 and s. 117 is that these works were not only permissive, but were, in fact, directed and certainly contemplated. There then follows in s. 106 a short description of the various works which were to be undertaken, a total altogether of twenty-three. The works particularly connected with the sewage disposal works are Nos. 15, 16, 17, 18 and 19. The Act then contains a number of sections, familiar in legislation of this kind, for the protection of various bodies of persons or corporations. Thus s. 107, according to the marginal note is: "For protection of Midland Railway Company as to sewage works". Section 108, again, according to the marginal note, is: "For protection of Derbyshire County Council". The most important section for our purpose is s. 109, which has the marginal note: "For protection of the parish of Spondon". Section 109 is as follows:

"(1) The sewage disposal works constructed on the lands acquired under the powers of this Act shall at all times hereafter be conducted so that the same shall not be a nuisance and in particular the corporation shall not allow any noxious or offensive effluvia to escape therefrom or do or permit or suffer any other act which shall be a nuisance or injurious to the health or reasonable comfort of the inhabitants of Spondon and this Act shall not exempt or be deemed to exempt the corporation from any liability for any nuisance arising from such sewage disposal works or from any proceedings which might but for this Act be taken against them under the provisions of the Public Health Acts or otherwise and the county council may take any proceedings they may think fit for the purpose of enforcing or giving effect to these provisions. (2) The corporation shall within six months after they have acquired under the provisions of this Act the lands described in sched. V hereto reserve out of the same a strip of land ten yards in width along the northern boundary of such lands and shall forthwith plant the said strip with trees and evergreen shrubs so as to form an effectual screen in front of the rest of the lands and shall for ever afterwards maintain the same so planted. The rural district council may take such proceedings as they think fit for the purpose of enforcing or giving effect to the provisions of this sub-section."

"The rural district council" there must mean the rural district council of Spondon. Section 110 is described in the marginal note as:

"For protection of Great Northern Railway Company as to sewage works."

Before passing from that group of sections, it is to be noted that, except in the case of s. 109, each of the other sections begins in effect by specifically stating that the provisions are for the protection of the named persons or corporations. In the case of s. 107, it is not quite so clear. The language begins:

"In executing the works by this Part of this Act authorised where the same will affect any railway . . . of the Midland Railway Company . . . the following provisions shall unless with the previous consent of the Midland Company . . . apply and have effect . . ."

But s. 108 opens: "For the protection of the county council", and, similarly, s. 110 opens: "The following provisions for the protection of the Great Northern Railway Company".

Section 113 is of some importance, and is as follows:

B

"The corporation may divert all brooks streams and waters which can or may be intercepted or taken by the sewers authorised by this Part of this Act and the corporation may by means of such sewers discharge or permit to flow into the river Derwent the waters so intercepted or taken together with any effluent and other waters passing over or through or discharged from the sewage disposal works of the corporation: Provided that nothing in this Part of this Act contained shall authorise the corporation to construct any works or do any other thing in contravention of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, or s. 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875: Provided also that the corporation shall pay compensation to any person for any damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers of this section the amount of such compensation failing agreement to be settled by arbitration under the Arbitration Act, 1889."

Section 115 contains divers provisions as to the main drainage area. Section 115 (15) deals with the obligations of local authorities having branch sewers which they are to connect with the main sewers of the corporation constructed under the Act, and at the end of the sub-section is a proviso in these terms:

"Provided that the corporation shall keep the local authorities respectively indemnified against any breach of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Acts, 1876 and 1893, or the general law which may be committed by the corporation in reference to the treatment and disposal by the corporation of the sewage of the local authorities respectively and not arising through any neglect or default on the part of the local authorities respectively."

F

The first matter to consider is the effect of s. 109. It was contended on behalf of the corporation that this section was solely for the protection of the parish of Spondon, or, alternatively, that it was a further section for the protection of the Derbyshire County Council. For the proposition that it was exclusively for the protection of the parish of Spondon counsel for the corporation relied on the marginal note, which so states. I assume in this case that it is permissible to have regard to these marginal notes, for it appears that they formed part of the Act when it was passed. If, therefore, there should arise an ambiguity in the meaning of the section, it would be permissible to see whether the marginal note offered any solution for the ambiguity. In my judgment, however, there is no ambiguity whatever in this section. If any ambiguity arises at all, it is solely injected by the marginal note itself, and I cannot accept the argument that the marginal note should then have the effect of resolving in a particular way an ambiguity for which it is itself wholly responsible. The language of the section seems to me to be almost too plain for argument. Section 109 (1) reads:

H

"The sewage disposal works . . . shall at all times thereafter be conducted so that the same shall not be a nuisance . . ."

That is perfectly general. But the sub-section then goes on to give a particular illustration of the general:

“ . . . and in particular the corporation shall not . . . do or permit or suffer any . . . act which shall be a nuisance or injurious to . . . the inhabitants of Spondon . . . ”

If the argument is right that this section operates solely for the protection of the parish of Spondon, the generality at the beginning “ so that the same shall not be a nuisance ” must be treated as wholly otiose or meaningless. But that is not the end. The sub-section continues, after the copulative “ and ”:

“ . . . and this Act shall not exempt or be deemed to exempt the corporation from any liability for any nuisance arising from such sewage disposal works or from any proceedings which might but for this Act be taken against them . . . ”

Pausing there again, it is to be observed that those words are wholly general, and are not confined to the parish of Spondon. The sub-section then goes on: “ under the provisions of the Public Health Acts or otherwise ”. “ Or otherwise ” again seems to me to mean exactly what it says. It means that this Act is not to exempt the corporation from liability for nuisance, or from proceedings for nuisance which might be taken against them either under the Public Health Acts or otherwise—e.g., under the general law. Nor can I read the final words of the sub-section, giving liberty to the county council to take any proceedings which they may think fit, as excluding the rights of other persons to take proceedings which they may be entitled to take. It is true that s. 109 (2), relating to the planting of the ten yards of trees and evergreen shrubs, is exclusively for the benefit of the parish of Spondon which lies to the north, or on the left bank of the river, but it appears to me impossible to hold, on the ordinary meaning of the words of s. 109, that the only persons to whom protection was given by the section were the parishioners or rural district council of Spondon. There remains the use of the word “ conducted ” in the opening phrase of s. 109 (1): “ The sewage disposal works . . . shall at all times hereafter be conducted ”. Counsel for the corporation tried to persuade the court that the word “ conducted ” was one of narrow significance—narrower, for example, than the words “ use and keep ” in the Public Health Acts. I cannot so construe it. The word “ conduct ” seems to me to mean “ manage ” or “ operate ”. Section 109 (1), therefore, is, in my judgment, a prohibition against the corporation managing or operating their disposal works so as to cause a nuisance.

I hope I shall be forgiven for dealing only in a sentence with the alternative submission that s. 109 is solely for the protection of the Derbyshire County Council. I do so because, quite frankly, I have been unable to comprehend it. The submission rests, I gather, on the circumstance that at the end of s. 109 (1) there is the reference to the fact that the county council may take any proceedings they may think fit. Such a submission is obviously in direct conflict with s. 109 (2) and with the marginal note on which counsel for the corporation based his first contention. I can see no foundation for the argument. Section 109 seems to me not only to forbear from giving permission, express or by implication, to operate the sewage works so as to cause any other person a nuisance, but expressly to forbid it.

I agree with the learned judge that s. 113, from which counsel for the corporation sought to derive some support, is directed merely to giving power to the corporation to divert brooks or streams and to use them when diverted for carrying sewage. But that permission, however far it may extend, is subject to the first proviso to the section, viz., that:

“ . . . nothing in this Part of this Act shall authorise the corporation to construct any works or do any other thing in contravention of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, or s. 17 of the Public Health Act."

I agree that the words "in contravention of" are not very apt. The reference to the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, is, undoubtedly, to s. 3 of that Act, which provides:

"Every person who causes to fall or flow or knowingly permits to fall or flow or to be carried into any stream any solid or liquid sewage matter, shall (subject as in this Act mentioned) be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act . . ."

Those words indicate that a form of penal proceeding is provided under the Act for commission of the offence created. The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 17, provides:

"Nothing in this Act shall authorise any local authority to make or use any sewer drain or outfall for the purpose of conveying sewage or filthy water into any natural stream or watercourse, or into any canal pond or lake until such sewage or filthy water is freed from all excrementitious or other foul or noxious matter such as would affect or deteriorate the purity and quality of the water in such stream or watercourse or in such canal pond or lake."

That section is, in part, a proviso to the powers which precede it, and, in part, an implied authority. Counsel for the corporation contends that the use of the phrase "in contravention of", in s. 113 of the Act of 1901, means that, if proceedings are started against the corporation under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, or under the Public Health Acts, then the Act of 1901 cannot be set up as a defence. I cannot agree with that contention. It appears to me that, though the phrasing is not entirely happy, the meaning is tolerably clear. It is to the effect that nothing in the Act of 1901 is to be taken to authorise the corporation to do anything which would or might cause the corporation to be proceeded against under either of the Acts mentioned. That in no way qualifies or affects their liability (in the event of their so doing) to other persons who may be damaged in consequence. It follows, therefore, that the power to divert streams, and the consequential power to carry the diverted streams laden with sewage into the Derwent, is subject to the limitation which the first proviso to s. 113 puts on it, and, unless the condition of that proviso is satisfied, then there is no power whatever under s. 113 to do what the section otherwise authorises. That result must be borne in mind when dealing with the second proviso to s. 113.

The second proviso to s. 113 is that the corporation are to pay compensation for damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers "of this section". If, therefore, what is done is a "contravention" of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, or the Public Health Act, 1875, then the thing done is not something done under the powers of the section, and the second proviso, accordingly, has no application. I, therefore, think that s. 113 reinforces the view which I have expressed on s. 109. Certainly it is, in my judgment, of no assistance to support the main contention of the corporation. I agree with the learned judge that s. 115 (15), with its reference to proceedings under the general law, also tends to support (and to support not negligibly) the view which I have formed on the meaning of s. 109. I, therefore, agree with HARMAN, J., that the discharge through this pipe of the effluent from the sewage disposal works is not only something not expressly or impliedly permitted under this Act, but is, in terms, expressly prohibited by it. If that view is right, it is, as counsel for the corporation frankly admits, the end of the appeal by the corporation on their main point. But, as we have heard a very full argument on a number of cases relating to the Public Health Acts, starting with the well-known case of Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board (2), and in case I am wrong in my construction of the Act of 1901, it is, perhaps, useful and proper that I should make some observations, so far as they are relevant to the present case, on these more general matters.

A In Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board (2) the plaintiff, who was the owner of a house and pleasure-grounds within the district of the defendant local board, claimed an injunction restraining the local board from permitting sewage, or water polluted by sewage or other offensive matter, to pass through the drains or channels under their control into the river Crane in such a manner as to render the water of the river unfit for use by the plaintiff. The river was stated to be “ . . . an ancient watercourse passing through the plaintiff's pleasure-grounds, and at a distance of about thirty yards from his house.”

B In November, 1875, by virtue of the Public Health Act, 1875, the channels and drains, which were the sewerage system of the neighbourhood, and which had been made by the predecessors of the defendant board, were vested in the board. The plaintiff complained to the board that the river was polluted with sewage poured into it from the drains and sewers, and, nothing having been done to abate the nuisance, he commenced the action in July, 1876, within a matter of months after the vesting had taken place. The defendants, in their
C defence, denied the existence of the nuisance, and alleged that the state of the river Crane was the same as it had been for more than twenty years and that it had received a considerable amount of sewage for many generations. They stated that they had not had time to provide a proper system of sewers for their district, but intended as speedily as possible to provide a proper system of sewers and proper sewage works. The plaintiff moved for an injunction in the terms of his claim, and by consent that was turned into the trial of the D action, and both parties gave evidence. It is, I think, important to bear those facts in mind, as MALINS, V.-C., granted the relief which the plaintiff sought, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal. JAMES, L.J., clearly formed the view that, whatever might on the face of the pleadings have been the nature of the plaintiff's complaint and of his cause of action, he was seeking, by a mandatory order of the courts, to compel the defendant board to expedite the intention which they had expressed of providing a proper system of sewage for their district. JAMES, L.J., said (12 Ch.D. 109):

“ It is quite manifest, from the form of the claim and the evidence, that the action was not based upon any act whatever done by the defendants. It is based entirely upon their alleged neglect to perform the Parliamentary duty cast upon them as the sanitary authority of a particular district. It is said that this is a very serious matter to the plaintiff and to the public generally. It appears to me that if this action could be sustained, it would be a very serious matter indeed for every ratepayer in England in any district in which there is any local authority upon which duties are cast for the benefit of the locality. If this action could be maintained, I do not see why it could not in a similar manner be maintained by every owner of land in that district who could allege that if there had been a proper system of sewage his property would be very much improved. I do not see why, if that is so, every owner of property in London which has not received the benefits it ought to have received from a complete system of sewage carried out by the Metropolitan Board of Works might not say, ‘ My court or alley is not properly cared for ’, and who might not bring an action against the Metropolitan Board of Works or any local board having duties in the district, and why he would not be entitled to bring it on the very day the board was constituted and the duties cast upon it. According to my view there is no sufficient principle to sustain that, and no authority really which comes near it, except the authority of the case before HALL, V.-C., which I will refer to.”

After a reference to s. 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875, JAMES, L.J., continued (ibid., 110):

"If the sewer, being in the state in which it was transferred to [the defendants], would, independently of the Act of Parliament, give to any landowner or any riparian proprietor a right to an injunction to restrain the use of that sewer, or the abuse of that sewer, it appears to me they would be in the same position as any other owner of a sewer would be. But the case here is not based upon any common law nuisance, or any nuisance existing, or any damage existing irrespective of the neglect of the Act, but upon the alleged neglect to comply with the provisions of the Act of Parliament."

At the end of his judgment, after referring to certain cases, JAMES, L.J., said (ibid., 117):

"But those cases have no application to this case, where all that can be alleged against the defendants, even if the allegation were sustained, which does not appear to me to be the case, is, that they have not, within a reasonable time, performed the public duty which they owed, not to the plaintiff, but to the district in which the plaintiff is one of the inhabitant landowners. The only case the plaintiff has alleged or attempted to prove is that he has not been relieved from a damage to which he was subject before this body were called into existence in the way he hoped to be, and as he would be if they had done their work in draining this district."

Whether JAMES, L.J., did full justice to the nature of the plaintiff's claim as pleaded is, perhaps, open to some doubt. BRETT, L.J., and COTTON, L.J., expressed themselves somewhat differently. BRETT, L.J., opened his judgment thus (ibid.):

"It seems to me in this case that the defendants have not been guilty of any wrongful act, and they have not been guilty of any neglect which gives the plaintiff a right to any remedy of any kind. But if they have been guilty of any neglect, the proper remedy has not been asked for, neither has the proper court been applied to."

Later, he posed this question (ibid., 119):

"Under those circumstances what is their position with regard to the law? They have done no act. It is suggested it might have been proved they had done some act, and it was said the plaintiff was taken by surprise. I cannot accede to that argument."

After referring to A.-G. and Dommes v. Basingstoke Corpn. (3), a decision of of SIR CHARLES HALL, V.-C., BRETT, L.J., said (ibid., 121):

"So, indeed, I am inclined to think that in the present case, under this statute [the Public Health Act, 1875], if the former board had done an act that would have given the plaintiff a right to damages or to some other remedy, and the effect of that act continued in the defendants' time, the defendants would have been liable for the continuance of the consequences of that act, and would have been liable to an injunction."

COTTON, L.J., said (ibid., 123):

"I agree with BRETT, L.J., that, as regards the question of fact, if the right of the plaintiff would follow our decision on that, he has made out his case; that is to say, he has shown, in my opinion, that the water in this stream is in such a state that if that were the result of an action of an individual or a body not having Parliamentary authority to put the stream into such a state, or to do acts which necessarily brought the stream into that state, he would have a ground of action against them. But although that is established, it is a very different thing and a very different consideration whether as against these defendants he is entitled either to the decree granted by the Vice-Chancellor or to any decree in this action . . . it must not be supposed, although I concur in thinking that the plaintiff is not entitled to any decree, that I am of opinion (or that the rest of the court are of opinion) that the defendants have a right under this Act of Parliament to make any new sewer, and thereby to conduct any fresh sewage matter into the river Crane. In my opinion, if they were intending to do so, or had done so, there would be a clear case on the part of the plaintiff for an injunction against the defendants, because that would be within the clear prohibition of the Act of Parliament [s. 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875]. The decree against them in substance, no doubt, was intended to be a decree against them to restrain them from permitting any sewage to go into the river Crane. It is not said they have done any act the consequence of which has been to bring the sewage down to the river Crane. If that were so, unless they could show that in doing that act, and so causing a nuisance to the plaintiff, they are protected by the Act of Parliament, it would be the duty of this court, as it has done in many cases already, to restrain the defendants from creating a nuisance, and although they are a public body, having public duties and powers to perform those duties, that would not exempt them from legal liability in consequence of a nuisance caused by them. On the evidence there is no ground for saying they have done that. I shall have to refer to the cases on the point on another part of the case, but it is sufficient to say here that those cases for the present purpose may be disregarded. It is not the act of the defendants that has caused any nuisance to the plaintiff."

That decision was followed in A.-G. v. Dorking Guardians (4). I need not refer in detail to that case, but I observe that COTTON, L.J., was also a member of the Court of Appeal which decided it. I share in some degree the difficulty which PARKER, J., felt, in Jones v. Llanrwst Urban Council (5), in regard to the ratio decidendi, on the one hand, of JAMES, L.J., and that of BRETT, L.J., and COTTON, L.J., on the other. PARKER, J., used this language ([1911] 1 Ch. 405):

"I think it clear that the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (6) would apply to the owner of a sewer, whether he made the sewer or not: see Firth v. Bowling Iron Co. (7). His duty at common law would be to see that the sewage in his sewer did not escape to the injury of others, and mere neglect of this duty would give any person injured a good cause of action. JAMES, L.J., evidently thought there was no common law nuisance, or at any rate that the action was not a bona fide action to remedy a private wrong. On the other hand, BRETT, L.J., and COTTON, L.J., while holding that the plaintiff would have had a cause of action for what was being done if the sewers in question had belonged to a private person, held that the defendants were not liable because they were a statutory body with only a limited property in, and with only limited powers, and therefore limited duties, with respect to, the sewers transferred to them by the Act. They would be liable for nuisance caused by the exercise of any power vested in them, but not liable, except upon prerogative writ of mandamus, for neglect to perform their statutory duty. In other words, supposing the case put by JAMES, L.J., of an existing nuisance at the time of the transfer, the plaintiff's remedy had, in their opinion, gone altogether, and, so far as I can see, without compensation. In Foster v. Warblington Urban Council (8) STIRLING, L.J., seems to have thought that the ratio decidendi of Glossop v. Heston & Isleworth Local Board (2) was to be found in the judgments of BRETT, L.J., and COTTON, L.J., and certainly those lords justices constituted the majority of the court. If the explanation of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.

[in Foster v. Warblington Urban Council (8)] is to prevail, I am of opinion that Glossop v. Heston & Isleworth Local Board (2) has no application to the present case. I am satisfied that the plaintiff is bona fide complaining of a private wrong, and that he is not, under colour of such a wrong, merely attempting to compel the defendants to fulfil their statutory duty. If, on the other hand, the explanation of STIRLING, L.J., is to prevail, it is impossible to say whether the case applies without tracing the history of the sewerage system of Llanrwst."

But, whatever may be the true ratio decidendi of the judgments in the Isleworth case (2) and the Dorking case (4) which followed, they must, I think, clearly be taken as deciding that, where a local authority has inherited drains or sewers under the Public Health Act, and those drains or sewers constitute a nuisance by reason only that they have ceased to deal adequately with the sewage of the authority's district, then the local authority, not having themselves been at fault save that they have not used the powers vested in them to enlarge the sewerage system, are not liable to be sued in the courts, for such an action would be, in effect, an action to compel them to exercise their statutory powers or perform their statutory duty. Further, it must, I think, be taken from these cases as established that the word "use", in s. 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875, does not involve a prohibition against the local authority permitting the inhabitants of their district (in exercise of statutory or other power or right authorising them so to do) to put sewage in the local authority's drains or sewers. Similarly, the word "kept" in s. 19 of the Act of 1875 must be construed by reference to its associated words "constructed", "covered" and "ventilated", and does not constitute an obligation to enlarge or re-construct if the drains or sewers have become, in the course of time, inadequate for the quantity of the sewage of the district. But the decisions in the Isleworth case (2) and the Dorking case (4) are themselves limited to cases where the local authority have, to use the word which I have already used, "inherited" the drains and sewers from some predecessor. They do not in terms cover the case where the local authority have themselves constructed the sewerage system. Indeed, some of the language of BRETT, L.J., and COTTON, L.J., seems to indicate a distinction in that respect vital to the question of liability.

Counsel for the corporation, however, contended that, since the later decisions in Robinson v. Workington Corpn. (9) and, more particularly, in Hesketh v. Birmingham Corpn. (10), that distinction is no longer valid or maintainable. He said that, if the local authority itself had constructed the drains and sewers pursuant to the Public Health Act, and the drains and sewers were satisfactory at the time of their completion, then no cause of action would arise against the local authority from mere passive conduct, though the drains and sewers had later become inadequate owing to increase of population. Before passing to the two cases which I have just mentioned, I venture to make one or two observations on non-feasance, to which JESSEL, M.R., and COTTON, L.J., referred in the Dorking case (4). The proposition that a local authority is not liable for non-feasance in regard to highways rests, I understand, on particular historical grounds, and it may lead to error or confusion if it is assumed that a similar proposition can be necessarily applied in the case of sewers and drains. As regards sewers and drains, it is, in my judgment, necessary to keep clearly in mind the possibility of two distinct causes of action, namely, (i) for nuisance, and (ii) for negligence. I venture to think that the distinction may not always have been clearly observed in certain of the earlier cases. As regards negligence (and I may say that we are not in this case concerned with negligence, there being no claim for negligence in the statement of claim), it may well be that non-feasance in the sense of failing to perform some positive statutory duty does not give rise to a cause of action for negligence against the local authority in respect of its sewerage system. In regard to nuisance, however, I think that the question of non-feasance, as distinct from misfeasance, has no real relevance. As regards nuisance, the question is whether the thing complained of as a nuisance is expressly or impliedly authorised by the Act of Parliament in accordance with which the works were constructed, or whether (and this is, perhaps, the same thing) the nuisance complained of is the inevitable consequence of that which the Act both authorised and contemplated. On this question, it seems to me that whether the thing complained of can be described as non-feasance or misfeasance is wholly beside the point.

I refer also to one other general matter. It was suggested that local authorities have a special immunity from the so-called rule in Rylands v. Fletcher (6). I am not, as at present advised, satisfied that that is so. PARKER, J., clearly applied the rule in Jones v. Llanrwst Urban Council (5). So far as relevant to the facts as they are in the present case, I think that the result is the same whether that which is complained of would render the doer of the act liable on the grounds of nuisance or on the grounds of the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher (6), if applicable. In either case the question depends on whether the Public Health Act or the special Act, as the case may be, provides, on the principles stated, a defence to the claim which otherwise would lie.

I now come to Robinson v. Workington Corpn. (9) and Hesketh v. Birmingham Corpn. (10). I need not pause, save for a brief time, on the former. It does not clearly appear from the LAW REPORTS that the sewers which were there in question had been made by the corporation sued, but my brother DENNING, L.J., having referred to the report of the case in the TIMES LAW REPORTS, has noted that they were so constructed. On the facts of that case, however, it is quite plain that the cause of action was neither more nor less than an attempt to compel performance, for the benefit of the plaintiff and his business, of the statutory duty which was laid on the corporation, under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 15, to make or provide a proper drainage system. With Hesketh v. Birmingham Corpn. (10) I would like to deal in more detail. It is, however, to be noted that that was not a case in which the plaintiff's complaint related to pollution. The nuisance alleged arose from the discharge of excessive quantities of water from a sewer into a brook, and the overflow of the brook. The first contention of the plaintiff was that the defendant corporation had damaged him by a nuisance arising from the largely increased quantity of water passing into the brook. The answer of the corporation to that contention was that the passing of that quantity of water into the brook was authorised expressly, or by necessary implication, by statute. The plaintiff then fell back on a second and alternative point. He contended that, even if the corporation were authorised to pass the water from the sewer into the brook, they were negligent in that they had not done what they could to minimise the damage which he suffered in consequence. The answer to that contention was that it was not negligent for a local authority merely to fail to exercise statutory powers, especially since the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 299, provided a specific remedy for such failure. BANKES, L.J., said ([1924] 1 K.B. 266):

"The plaintiff's case was that the acts of the defendants in discharging the overflow of the sewers into the brook without any statutory authority in that behalf amounted to a nuisance, or that the defendants were guilty of negligence in continuing to discharge the sewage into the brook after it had become of insufficient capacity to carry it in consequence of the growth of the population. No reference appears to have been made at the trial to the provisions of the Public Health Act, but after Mr. Upjohn's argument [for the defendants] it seems plain that it is impossible to adjust the rights of these parties without reference to the provisions of that Act which are to be found in s. 15, s. 16 and s. 17. Mr. Hurst [for the plaintiff] very frankly told us that those sections were not present to his mind at the time of the trial."

After reading those sections the learned lord justice said (ibid., 267):

"The effect of [s. 17] has been considered in . . . Durrant v. Branksome Urban Council (11). There NORTH, J., said ([1897] 2 Ch. 295): 'I think that section recognises in the clearest way that, subject to complying with the provisions of that section, the local authority have a right to empty their drains into a natural stream or canal, pond and so on, observing, of course, the provisions of that section. It is clear from that to my mind that they may turn clean water into a stream, or what I may call cleaned water into a stream. They may even turn water that is sewage or filth into a stream if they free it from such noxious matters as would deteriorate the stream itself'. And CHITTY, L.J., says (ibid., 305): 'The first part of [s. 17] is prohibitory, and it is by way of proviso on something that has gone before. The second part is explanatory. I do not say that by itself it confers a power. I think the better reading is that the power is conferred by s. 16, and in this portion of the section, which says that the sewage is not to be poured in until it is freed from foul or noxious matter, the legislature assumes it had already said something that would justify the pouring of pure water or water not fouled or noxious into the stream or canal'. Therefore you find in the combination of those passages statutory authority for discharging clean or cleaned water into a stream, and if the stream itself is of such a character that the discharge of foul water into it would not affect or deteriorate the purity and quality of the water, you find statutory authority for discharging foul water. Some day an allegation that foul water has been discharged into a stream in such a way as to materially affect its quality may give rise to a serious question as to the party on whom the onus lies of showing that the case does or does not fall within the section."

SCRUTTON, L.J., undoubtedly, used language of a more general character (see, in particular, [1924] 1 K.B. 271), but, in so far as his language supports the broad contention of counsel for the corporation in the present case, it must, I think, be treated as obiter. BANKES, L.J., indeed, seemed to indicate that, in a case where the nuisance complained of was pollution, the fact that the authority had themselves made the sewer would prima facie render them liable. If that is right, the case would, on that ground, be distinguishable from the Isleworth case (2), even though the nuisance arose merely from subsequent inadequacy of the sewer.

It seems to me, therefore, that the question whether the principle of the Isleworth case (2) is applicable only where the authority sued has not itself constructed the sewers complained of as creating a nuisance by pollution has not yet been actually decided. For my part, I see great force in the argument of counsel for the corporation that there is no logical or valid distinction between the case where a local authority have inherited, say, half a century ago, sewers and drains made (and at the time of their construction adequately made) by some predecessor, and a case in which a local authority themselves made, half a century ago, some sewers and drains which, when they were made, were similarly adequate properly to drain the city or town without causing pollution. But I think that it is unnecessary that I should express a concluded view on the point, because, on the facts, I think that the present case is clearly distinguishable from the type of case considered in the earlier authorities. We are here concerned, not with a drain or a sewer down which local inhabitants (having the right so to do) send sewage matter which passes, accordingly, into a river, but with sewage disposal works built on the Derby Corporation's own land. We have not seen the plans which are referred to in s. 106 of the Act of 1901 for those sewage disposal works. We are told that the plans did not contain any drawing of an effluent pipe leading from the sewage disposal works to the river, though, no doubt, some such discharge pipe must have been contemplated. But what the corporation are doing, as I follow it, is pumping or otherwise diverting into the river, by such mechanical or other means as may be there, the effluent after treatment in the beds and tanks of the disposal works on their own land. In my judgment, therefore, as at present advised, if the Public Health Acts applied to this case, or if, contrary to the view which I have expressed, the Act of 1901 ought to be construed as equivalent, in effect, to the Public Health Act, there would be no statutory defence available to the corporation for what they are doing in discharging effluent through this pipe into the Derwent river. And this also, I think, may fairly be noted. This case cannot be called an action obliquely directed to commanding a local authority to perform a public duty. The plaintiffs are claiming damages in respect of injury suffered to their property some miles from the county borough of Derby. They are not concerned with, nor are they complaining about, the method by which the citizens of Derby are provided with a sewerage system. Indeed, if the sewage disposal works were shut down, the inhabitants of Derby, so far as I understand, would not in the least degree be affected. No such frightful results would occur in Derby as would occur if the sewers and drains themselves were stopped up. The result would be that all the sewage treated with storm water would, presumably, be extruded from the storm water overflows direct into the River Derwent. That, of course, would not in the least help the plaintiffs, but the point is made to demonstrate the true character of the action which the plaintiffs are bringing. The point is one which the learned judge noted (and I think it was a legitimate consideration on his part) where he said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1337):

“The plaintiffs’ claim here is not that the corporation have neglected to provide further sewers, although it may be that the remedy for that of which they complain will be the construction of further sewers. They are not ratepayers of Derby who complain of the insufficiency of the drainage of the city. Their complaint is the converse, namely, that the city is so drained that their property outside it is damaged.” ~

It follows that many of the observations which JAMES, L.J., directed to the plaintiff in the Isleworth case (2) would, on any view, be quite inapplicable to the present case.

So much for the main point raised by the Derby Corporation. I can deal more briefly with the question of the appropriate remedy, assuming that they are wrong (as I think they are) on their main submission. With some aspects of this matter I have already dealt. I venture to think that the fallacy which underlies this part of the corporation’s argument is based on the statement made on their part that an injunction is purely discretionary—if by that is meant that, in a case where a person’s rights, such as the plaintiffs’ rights, are being damaged and there is a threat of continuing damage, the question whether an injunction will be granted is determined by the court on the balance of convenience on one side or the other. In my judgment, that is not a correct statement of the position. It is, I think, well settled that, if A. proves that his proprietary rights are being wrongfully interfered with by B., and that B. intends to continue his wrong, then A. is prima facie entitled to an injunction, and he will be deprived of that remedy only if special circumstances exist, including the circumstance that damages are an adequate remedy for the wrong that he has suffered. In the present case, it is quite plain that damages would be a wholly inadequate remedy for the plaintiff association. The general rule which I have stated applies, in my opinion, to local authorities as well as to other citizens. Equally, of course, the court will not impose on a local authority, or on anyone else, an obligation to do something which is impossible, or which cannot be enforced, or which is unlawful. Therefore, the practice is adopted in the case of local authorities of granting injunctions, and then suspending their operation for a time, long or short. Such a practice has been long established—at least since A.-G. v. Birmingham Borough Council (12)—and, frequently applied: see, again, for example, the decision of PARKER, J., in Jones v. Llanrwst Urban Council (5). The Defence General Regulations, 1939, reg. 56A, is, beyond doubt, a matter proper to be considered, but the mere fact that, without obtaining a licence, the authority would be unable in any case to do the work is not, in my judgment, a sufficient reason why the ordinary procedure should not be followed. A

What, after all, are the alternatives? It is suggested by counsel for the corporation that the plaintiffs should be left to bring a series of actions for damages. In every such action the plaintiffs would have again to prove their case, for the corporation could put them to such proof by a mere traverse of the facts alleged. The result would, obviously, be a vast expenditure of costs, a matter on which, I understand, the corporation are themselves particularly tender. I think that much the same result would follow if the plaintiffs were merely given liberty to apply for an injunction, for they would then, presumably, have to establish as a matter of fact that some circumstances had arisen which then justified the granting of an injunction which had not been granted at the time of the trial. Nor, in my judgment, would the matter be materially affected even if the corporation were to give some kind of undertaking to get on with the work when it was possible or convenient to do so in the ordinary way. It appears to me that, the corporation having been proved to be wrongdoers (and not disputing that they are wrongdoers), the onus should be on them, if they want a further suspension, to satisfy the court that justice requires that a further suspension should be granted. If the corporation show that they are unable to do more than they are doing, or that they cannot get any licences under reg. 56A, then I have no doubt that a further suspension will be granted until such time as this urgent matter can be put in hand. Finally, the objection that the injunction is permanent in form seems to me to be entirely unsubstantial. In any event, there is, at the end of the order, liberty to apply, and, when all the matters of which the plaintiffs complain have been put right, the court will, no doubt, be ready to hear any application which the corporation might be minded to make to discharge the injunction. As a matter, therefore, of jurisdiction and general principle, I see no ground whatever why the injunction which was granted should not be granted. Still less do I see any ground on which this court could be invited to interfere with the discretion exercised by the learned judge. The result, therefore, as regards the Derby Corporation's appeal, is that, in my opinion, the judgment of HARMAN, J., is correct in every particular, and the appeal wholly fails. D E F

I now come to the second appeal, that of the British Electricity Authority. These defendants are not suffering from what I venture to call the complexes about immunity of public corporations from which the Derby Corporation appear to suffer. Like the corporation, the electricity authority accept the findings of fact on the part of the learned judge, and they accept, therefore, the finding that they are substantially contributing—in this case, as I have said, by temperature only—to the pollution of this river. But they also accept that an injunction should go against them. They contend only that the form of that injunction should be qualified, having regard to the language of certain statutory provisions which are applicable to them. The nature of the authority's appeal is sufficiently indicated by their notice of appeal. I have read the injunction granted by the learned judge, and the proposed form of injunction which they seek is this: G H

"That the order in this action made by HARMAN, J., on Apr. 9 and entered on May 7, 1952, may be varied by inserting after the injunction therein lettered (b) the words: 'Provided that (so far as concerns any alteration in the temperature of the waters of the said rivers caused by any effluent from the said premises of the defendant authority) the foregoing injunctions lettered (a) and (b) shall not enure to [the plaintiffs] or to either of them or to the sequels in title to either of them against the defendant authority so long as the defendant authority shall comply with the proviso to s. 37 (1) of the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Act, 1929, that is to say, shall return water abstracted from the river Derwent pursuant to the said sub-section (except that unavoidably lost by evaporation) in such a condition as not to cause (in the waters of the said river where the same flow below and after receiving such effluent) injury to fish'."

The power station in question was vested in the British Electricity Authority under the Electricity Act, 1947, on Apr. 1, 1948. The history of the previous legislation, including the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Act, 1929, referred to in the notice of appeal, is carefully traced by the learned judge, and I need not read it. It is admitted by the plaintiffs that the Act of 1929, and, particularly, s. 36 and s. 37, continue to apply, and are, therefore, available to the defendant authority. The question under appeal turns exclusively on the effect of those two sections. Section 36 provides:

"The company [i.e., the power company, which was the predecessor in title of the authority] may upon the lands described in sched. I to this Act maintain carry on work and use and from time to time extend alter and renew the generating station and works of the company situate upon the said lands and they may on such lands exercise in relation to the said station and works the powers conferred by the Act of 1901 in relation to the generating stations and works by that Act authorised and the powers conferred by the Electricity (Supply) Acts, 1882 to 1928."

Section 37 provides:

"(1) The company may abstract water from the river Derwent and may utilise the same for condensing and other purposes of the generating station situate upon the lands described in sched. I to this Act: Provided that all water so abstracted except that unavoidably lost by evaporation shall be returned to the river above Borrowash Weir in such a condition as not to cause injury to fish. (2) Nothing in this section or in the section of this Act of which the marginal note is 'Maintenance and use of generating station'—[s. 36]—shall authorise the company to abstract water from or return water to the river Derwent in any manner contrary to or inconsistent with the provisions of the deed set forth in sched. II to this Act or in any manner prejudice diminish alter or take away any of the rights privileges powers or authorities vested in or enjoyed by Charles Joseph Leicester Earl of Harrington or his heirs or successors in estate or any person in trust for him or them as owner or owners of Borrowash Mill and the weirs and sluices referred to in the said deed or as riparian owner or owners upon the river except so far as may be provided by the said deed."

The first point raised in the appeal is a brief one, and is to this effect. Counsel for the authority seeks to incorporate into the injunction by means of his proviso words operating to construe the proviso of s. 37 (1). In general, it is not, I think, the practice of the court, when granting an injunction, to construe the language of the restriction in the statute or contract which has been broken, and which the defendant is restrained from breaking again. But in this case the learned judge used language in the course of his judgment which has led the authority to make this application. HARMAN, J., said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1340):

"It was further argued on the plaintiffs' behalf that the quantity of chlorine found in the effluent itself was injurious to fish, and that the proviso [to s. 37 (1)] does not mean that the river, after the effluent has mingled with it, shall not be injurious, but that the effluent itself shall not be injurious. In my judgment, the right answer is the latter, and, if so, there is evidence that on some occasions a quantity of free chlorine is emitted, which may cause injury to fish . . ."

I am not sure whether the learned judge meant that the effluent itself, before it enters the river, must be of such a temperature, and of such a character, as not to be liable to cause injury to fish. I am not suggesting that he did, but, if he did, I think, with all respect, that he would not be right. I think that the construction of this proviso is tolerably clear. During the course of the argument I suggested that what it meant was "that the water so abstracted shall be returned to the river in such a condition as not to cause by its presence in the river injury to fish", and that view was accepted both by counsel for the plaintiff and counsel for the authority. Having expressed that view of the meaning of the proviso, which is recorded, and having also mentioned the agreement of counsel, which is also recorded, I think it is unnecessary to do more. I, therefore, do not think that any qualification to the form of the injunction should be made to give effect to that view of construction.

The defendant authority's second point is much more difficult. I have observed already that the rights of the second plaintiff, the earl, as riparian owner, may be much more extensive than those of the plaintiff association. The earl's right is, in my view, correctly taken by the learned judge from his reference to John Young & Co. v. Bankier Distillery Co. (13). HARMAN, J., said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1330): "The law is stated in much the same way in John Young & Co. v. Bankier Distillery Co. (13)". After reading the head-note of that case, HARMAN, J., continued (ibid.):

"LORD MACNAGHTEN said ([1893] A.C. 698): 'The law relating to the rights of riparian proprietors is well settled. A riparian proprietor is entitled to have the water of the stream, on the banks of which his property lies, flow down as it has been accustomed to flow down to his property, subject to the ordinary use of the flowing water by upper proprietors, and to such further use, if any, on their part in connection with their property as may be reasonable under the circumstances. Every riparian proprietor is thus entitled to the water of his stream, in its natural flow, without sensible diminution or increase and without sensible alteration in its character or quality. Any invasion of this right causing actual damage or calculated to found a claim which may ripen into an adverse right entitles the party injured to the intervention of the court'."

It is obvious that a prohibition against making a "sensible alteration" in the character or quality of the water may impose a much greater burden on the electricity authority than an alteration which is liable merely to cause injury to fish. The plaintiff association is, in any case, not entitled to anything more than a protection of its rights to fish, a point, distinguishing its rights from those of the earl, which was, apparently, overlooked when the matter of the form of the injunction was discussed and settled. But counsel for the authority contended that, by reason of s. 36 and s. 37 of the Act of 1929 and the scheduled agreement which is there referred to, the earl has lost any riparian rights greater than the plaintiff association's rights to protect fishing. The scheduled agreement, which was also confirmed in s. 38 of the Act of 1929 was an agreement giving effect to an arrangement of this character, put briefly, that the power company, the predecessors of the authority, should be entitled to operate certain weirs and sluices, the property of the earl, in such a way that in dry weather they would cause the banking up of a sufficient head of water to supply the requirements of the power company for their power station, and for that advantage they paid the earl a substantial sum of money. Counsel for the authority says, therefore, that, if the last words of s. 37 (2), "or as riparian owner or owners upon the river", mean what they appear to mean, then the proviso to s. 37 (1) becomes a complete nullity, because there would be no point in providing that the water should not be returned in such a condition as to injure fish. He also contended that the power to carry on the power station which formed the basis of the agreement (and which is expressly referred to in s. 36) necessarily involved some interference with the rights of the earl as riparian owner. On the other hand, counsel for the plaintiffs contended that the proviso to s. 37 (1) was for the protection of people who might have fishing rights, whatever might happen thereafter to the riparian rights owned by the earl. He further says that s. 37 (2) applies no less to s. 36 than to s. 37, and that, if, as counsel for the authority contends, the carrying on of the power station destroyed as a necessary consequence the riparian rights, or some of the riparian rights, of the earl, then there was no point whatever in adding these words at the end of s. 37 (2).

On the face of the language used in s. 37 (2), it is difficult to see any answer to the argument on construction put forward by counsel for the plaintiffs. After a specific reference to the rights of the earl as owner of the mills and weirs, the draftsman has inserted, in the widest possible terms, the words "or as riparian owner or owners upon the river". But the words of any clause in a statute, or in an agreement, have to be construed according to the properly admissible surrounding circumstances. What were the facts in 1929 when this Act was passed? We know that the land lying on the right bank of the river, which is now the property of the electricity authority, was then the property of the Earl of Harrington. In other words, the earl was a riparian owner immediately opposite the outfall from the power company's works. But beyond that there is no evidence. We do not know what the facts were as to the temperature of the water when it was discharged from the power station in 1929 and whether it could be said as a fact that the necessary consequence of having the power station operated on its present site must have been (and must have been known to have been) to cause some "sensible alteration" of the character and quality of the water, so that any view of the effect of this section other than that suggested by counsel for the authority would inevitably mean some derogation from the earl's grant in the scheduled deed. It is true that the earl sued as a riparian owner, but the main question in the action was in regard to the fishery, and in that matter the earl joined forces with the plaintiff association in his attack on the three defendants. Nor, indeed, so far as I understand, is it suggested that at the moment the earl is suffering from, or likely to suffer from, any damage to his riparian rights over and above anything that may be done to the fishery, nor has he made any specific complaint to that effect. In these circumstances, and having regard, in particular, to the fact that the injunction in its widest form could not be sustained on the part of the plaintiff association, it seems to me that the fair and just thing to do at the present time is to limit the present injunction in the way suggested so as only to prohibit the electricity authority from returning the water, after using it, in such a condition as to cause injury to fish, but to give to the earl (and to his successors in title) liberty to apply for a further injunction, if he should desire to contend, or if he can show, that in some other way some other of his riparian rights are being injuriously affected by the authority's activities. To that extent, therefore, the appeal on the part of the British Electricity Authority succeeds.

DENNING, L.J.: In submitting the appeal of the Derby Corporation, counsel urged that there was a difference between misfeasance and non-feasance.

He admitted that the corporation had been guilty of non-feasance because they had not enlarged their sewage works so as to cope with the increased population. But this, he said, did not give rise to an action at law, the only remedy being by complaint to the Minister of Local Government and Planning under the Public Health Acts. There is one decisive answer to that argument, and it is this. The distinction between misfeasance and non-feasance is valid only in the case of highways repairable by the public at large. A
It does not apply to any other branch of the law. I am well aware that in 1924, in Hesketh v. Birmingham Corpn. (10), SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1924] 1 K.B. 271): "The general rule is that a local authority is liable for misfeasance but not for non-feasance". But when he said that, I fear that, for once, Homer nodded. It would, I think, be very unfortunate if the exemption for non-feasance was extended to local authorities generally. Even in highway cases, B it has been said to be unsatisfactory: see Swain v. Southern Ry. Co. (14) ([1939] 2 All E.R. 807). It introduces distinctions so fine as to be scarcely perceptible: compare Boorman v. Brown (15) (3 Q.B. 526); and it is only to be explained on historical grounds. I tried to trace its history and its limits in a note I wrote in 1939 in the LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW, vol. 55, p. 343.

If we put highway cases on one side, there are innumerable cases to be found where public authorities have been held liable for non-feasance. Let me give just four instances over the centuries. In 1594 the parson at Quarleys in Hampshire was under a public duty to keep a common bull for the service of the cows of his parishioners. For three years he neglected to find a bull, and it was held that every inhabitant who had suffered damage was entitled to bring an action: see Yielding v. Fay (16). In 1828 the corporation of Lyme C
Regis were under a public duty to repair the sea wall. They failed to do it, and the sea came in and overran some cottages. It was argued that the corporation were not liable for non-feasance, but they were held liable by all the courts, and by the House of Lords: see Henly v. Lyme Corpn. (17) (5 Bing. 109). In 1900 the Portslade Urban District Council failed to clean out its sewers, and thus caused a nuisance to the plaintiff. It was held by this court that they D were liable to an action: see Baron v. Portslade Urban Council (18). Finally, in 1938 the Islington Borough Council took over a disused tramway, but took no steps to rid the highway of the danger caused by the derelict tramlines, and they were held by this court to be liable for the consequent death of a cyclist in 1941: see Simon v. Islington Borough Council (19). The only cases, other E than highway cases, where it has been suggested, at any rate in this court, that a local authority are exempt from liability for non-feasance are the F
Isleworth case (2), the Dorking case (4), the Workington case (9), and the Birmingham case (10), but those were all cases of a particular kind of non-feasance. They were cases where all that could be said against the local authority was that they had failed to carry out their statutory duty to drain their district, and, on the true construction of the statute, the remedy for that omission was not by action at law, but by complaint to the Local Government G
Board (whose functions were later transferred to the Minister of Health). Those four cases do not illustrate any general exemption for non-feasance, but only the rule that the question whether an action lies for breach of a statutory duty depends on the true construction of the statute. That appears clearly from the explanation which LORD ESHER, M.R., gave ([1897] 1 Q.B. 621) of H the Workington case (9).

Once rid of the distinction between misfeasance and non-feasance, the case can be reduced to simple terms. The first question is: Have the plaintiffs a prima facie cause of action at common law? If so, the second question is: Have the defendants a defence by reason of statutory authority? In this case, negligence is not alleged. The only cause of action available to the plaintiffs is an action for nuisance. I pause here to say that I doubt whether the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (6) applies in all its strictness to cases where a local authority, acting under statutory authority, build sewers which afterwards overflow, or sewage disposal works which later pour out a polluting effluent, for the simple reason that the use of land for drainage purposes by the local authority is "such a use as is proper for the general benefit of the community", and is on that ground exempt from the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher (6): see Rickards v. Lothian (20), per LORD MOULTON ([1913] A.C. 280), approved by the House of Lords in Read v. J. Lyons & Co., Ltd. (21), per VISCOUNT SIMON ([1946] 2 All E.R. 475) and per LORD UTHWATT (ibid., 484); and also on the ground of statutory authority: see Hammond v. St. Pancras Vestry (22) per BRETT, J. (L.R. 9 C.P. 322). But, although the plaintiffs may not be able to rely on the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (6) as such, they have a perfectly good cause of action for nuisance if they can show that the defendants created or continued the cause of the trouble, and it must be remembered that a person may "continue" a nuisance by adopting it, or in some circumstances by omitting to remedy it: see Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan (23).

This liability for nuisance has been applied in the past to sewage and drainage cases in this way. When a local authority take over or construct a sewage and drainage system which is adequate at the time to dispose of the sewage and surface water for their district, but which subsequently becomes inadequate owing to increased building which they cannot control, and for which they have no responsibility, they are not guilty of the ensuing nuisance. They obviously do not create it, nor do they continue it merely by doing nothing to enlarge or improve the system. The only remedy of the injured party is to complain to the Minister of Health. That was the position in the four "non-feasance" cases which I have mentioned. In the Isleworth case (2) and the Dorking case (4), the local authority had not themselves constructed the sewers. They had only taken them over from others, and done nothing. In the Workington case (9) and the Birmingham case (10), the local authority had themselves constructed a drainage system which was quite sufficient at the time, but later became inadequate through increased building which the local authority could not control. It is very different, however, when the local authority themselves do the increased building, or permit it to be done, because they are then themselves guilty of the nuisance. They know (or ought to know) that the increase in building will cause the existing sewers to overflow, and yet they allow it to go on without enlarging the capacity of the sewage system. By so doing, they themselves are helping to fill the system beyond its capacity, and are guilty of the nuisance. That is, I think, fully established by Hawthorn Corpn. v. Kannuluik (24) in the Privy Council (of which I have examined the record) and Hanley v. Edinburgh Corpn. (25) in the House of Lords. A moment's reflection will show that the four "non-feasance" cases have little or no application at the present day. In the nineteenth century local authorities had no authority over increased building. They did not build dwelling-houses themselves and could not control building by others, and anyone who built a house had a statutory right to connect it to the sewer. But in the last few years, the position has radically changed. The local authorities have built more houses than anyone else, and under the Town and Country Planning Acts they have full control over the building in their district. They cannot now disclaim responsibility for increased building. By building houses themselves or permitting others to build them, they become responsible for any nuisance that results from the sewage system, just as the corporations were responsible in the Hawthorn case (24) and the Edinburgh case (25).

It would not be right to found the decision in this case on that point, because no evidence was given of the building or planning activities of the Derby Corporation, but their responsibility is amply shown on other grounds. When the increased sewage came into their sewage disposal works at Spondon, they took it under their charge, treated it in their works, and poured the effluent into the river Derwent, but their treatment of it was not successful in rendering it harmless. It was still noxious. Their act in pouring a polluting effluent into the river makes them guilty of nuisance. Even if they did not create the nuisance, they clearly adopted it within the principles laid down in Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan (23), and they are liable for it at common law unless they can defend themselves by some statutory authority. A

Have they, then, any statutory authority to commit this nuisance? None at all. Like other local authorities, they had statutory authority to pour a harmless effluent into the river, but they had no authority to pour into the river an effluent which was noxious or polluting. That is made plain by s. 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (now s. 30 of the Public Health Act, 1936), s. 3 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (now s. 2 of the Rivers (Prevention of Pollution) Act, 1951), s. 109 and s. 113 of the Derby Corporation Act, 1901, and Midwood & Co. v. Manchester Corpn. (26). The corporation are, therefore, guilty of a nuisance, and are liable in damages to any riparian owner or fishery owner who has suffered damage by it. B

The remaining question is whether an injunction should be issued against them. Counsel for the corporation argued that an injunction should not issue. The corporation, he said, could not dam back the sewage because that "would cause a most frightful nuisance" to the inhabitants of Derby, and they could not extend their sewage disposal works because they were prohibited under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 56A, from doing so without the consent of the Minister of Works. These are strong reasons for suspending the injunction, but are no reasons for not granting it. The power of the courts to issue an injunction for nuisance has proved itself to be the best method so far devised of securing the cleanliness of our rivers, and in this connection it is significant that the law relating to nuisance has been expressly preserved by s. 11 (6) of the Rivers (Prevention of Pollution) Act, 1951. The issue of an injunction does not interfere with the power of the Minister to determine the proper order of priority of public works, but it does mean that, if these works are to be deferred, the court will want to know the reason why. Only an over-riding public interest will suffice. C D

One further point. It has, I believe, been suggested in some of these cases that the individual members of a corporation may themselves be liable to be committed for breach of an injunction. As to that, I would only say, with BLACKBURN, J. (L.R. 10 Exch. 95), in Mill v. Hawker (27) that, if it were necessary to decide that question, I should require time for consideration: see what was said by KELLY, C.B. (L.R. 9 Exch. 321) in Mill v. Hawker (27). A corporation can in these days be fined—it could not previously—or its property sequestered for breach of an injunction, but I would not wish to assert that individual members could be committed unless I was satisfied by authority that it could be done. I agree that the appeal of the Derby Corporation should be dismissed. E F

The appeal of the British Electricity Authority raises only two points of construction. It seems to me that the provision in s. 37 (1) of the Act of 1929 prescribes a standard for the effluent from the generating station. The used water, when returned into the river, must not, by its presence there, cause injury to fish. Section 37 (2) appears to me to be designed to protect the rights of the Earl of Harrington in regard to flow and quantity, but I doubt whether it entitles him to insist on a higher standard for the effluent than anyone else. If the effluent does not cause injury to fish in the river, he has not much cause for complaint. I think that the appeal of the authority should be allowed to the extent stated by the Master of the Rolls, and I agree with my Lord in the orders that he has proposed. G H

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. Once it is conceded or established that the deplorable condition of the river Derwent below Borrowash Bridge is due in a substantial degree to the discharge of noxious material from the Derby Corporation's sewage works (and there can be no doubt whatever that such is the fact), then the corporation can escape liability only by showing that the nuisance which has arisen is the inevitable result of the performance by them of that which they are authorised by statute to do. In my judgment, there are two conclusive reasons why that defence cannot succeed. First, the works which the corporation were authorised (and, indeed, compelled) to construct and maintain under the Act of 1901 were not such as inevitably to result in a nuisance by pollution to anyone, and, moreover, no nuisance did, in fact, occur for years after the works were put into operation. It was not inevitable in 1901 that the population of Derby would substantially increase, and there is certainly no indication in the Act of 1901 that Parliament envisaged that it would or might increase beyond the capacity of the authorised works. If the population had remained static, or had increased only slightly, or (as was possible) had decreased, no question of a nuisance would ever have arisen. Secondly, on the construction which the Master of the Rolls has placed on s. 109 of the Act (and with which I entirely agree), it is impossible for the corporation to say that Parliament impliedly authorised them to create a nuisance, for it enacted in unmistakable language by that section that they were not to do so, and this intention of the legislature is fortified, if it needed fortification, by the references, in s. 113 of the Act of 1901, to the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, and s. 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and see also s. 115 (15) of the Act of 1901. It appears plain to me, therefore, that the corporation have no statutory defence to the plaintiffs' action, and, as they have no other defence, the action must succeed.

I would like, however, to say a few words on the question whether an injunction should be granted against the corporation. It was strongly urged on HARMAN, J., and as forcibly urged on us, that the plaintiffs should be relegated to their right to damages, and that it was not right or proper that the court, in the exercise of its discretion, should enjoin the corporation against further continuing the nuisance which they are causing. Counsel for the corporation, in the course of his argument before us on this point, said that he was prepared, if necessary, to contend that no injunction should ever be granted against a local authority by reason of the public services which it is their duty to render. If this contention were to be accepted, the result would be to confer on local authorities a privilege which is enjoyed by no other section of the community, and which, so far as I am aware, has never been accorded by the courts to any person or body of persons since the equitable remedy of injunction was devised. For my part, I am quite unable to accept the contention, and can find no possible warrant for it. Anyone who creates an actionable nuisance is a wrongdoer, and the court will prima facie restrain him from persisting in his activities. If special circumstances be shown, the court may leave the injured party to his remedy in damages, but, in my judgment, the mere fact, in itself, that the wrongdoer is a local authority (however important) has never been, and ought not now to be, regarded as a circumstance of this character. Local authorities have great and important duties to discharge, and the court, in deciding what order it should make, would, undoubtedly, take those duties into consideration, and would no more make an order that was virtually impossible for an authority to perform than it would order a private individual to perform an act which it was not in his power to do. Accordingly, it would be quite wrong in the present case to grant an injunction against the Derby Corporation which was to take immediate effect, nor have the plaintiffs ever suggested that such an order should be made. Why, however, no injunction should be granted at all—with the result that the plaintiffs would be compelled to bring one action after another for damages in the future—I am wholly at a loss to see. The proper course to adopt (and one which has been adopted on innumerable occasions in the past) is that which was taken by HARMAN, J., and which my Lord has indicated, namely, to grant an injunction, but to suspend its operation for a reasonable time with liberty to the defendants to apply for a further suspension in the event of circumstances rendering it necessary for such an application to be made. It would be as well, however, for the members of the corporation to bear very clearly in their minds that a further suspension of the injunction will by no means be granted automatically, but only on their satisfying the judge (and the onus will be wholly on them) that they have in all sincerity done all that is reasonably within their power to remedy the grievous injury which they are inflicting on the plaintiffs, but that, notwithstanding their efforts, they have been unable to comply fully with the order which has been made against them. In my view, therefore, the appeal of the Derby Corporation fails. As to the appeal of the British Electricity Authority, I entirely agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said, and with the order which he has proposed.

R. v. ROGERS.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Hallett, JJ.), December 17, 1952.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—Preventive detention—Supervision—Previous convictions—"Previous occasions"—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 21 (1) (b), s. 21 (2) (b), s. 22 (1) (a).

Criminal Law—Sentence—Supervision—Order not made by court of trial per incuriam—Inclusion in sentence by Court of Criminal Appeal.

Before a court can pass a sentence of preventive detention under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21 (2), it must be proved (s. 21 (2) (b)) that the offender has been "convicted on indictment on at least three previous occasions". A "previous occasion" within the sub-section means a separate occasion at a separate assizes or quarter sessions. The same construction is to be put on the similar words in s. 21 (1) (b) (relating to corrective training) and in s. 22 (1) (a) (relating to supervision of the offender after discharge from prison). Summary convictions for the purposes of s. 21 (1) (b) are on separate occasions if they take place on different days.

Where a supervision order under s. 22 (1) has not been made by the court of trial per incuriam the Court of Criminal Appeal may alter the sentence imposed to include such an order.

FOR THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT, 1948, s. 21 (1), (2), s. 22, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 28, pp. 371-373.

APPEAL against a sentence of eight years' imprisonment passed at Dorset Quarter Sessions on the conviction of the appellant on charges of housebreaking and larceny.

Elam for the appellant.

Buzzard for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant was convicted at Dorset Quarter Sessions of housebreaking and

A larceny, and, he being a man with a very bad record and it being shown that he was really incorrigible (because on the very day he had been put on probation he committed the offences for which he was before the quarter sessions) he was regarded as a very fit person for preventive detention, but the learned deputy chairman saw a difficulty because the three previous convictions, notice of which had been served on him, consisted of a conviction at Wiltshire Quarter Sessions and two convictions before the Dorset Sessions which took place at the same sessions on the same day. The learned deputy chairman said that he was not satisfied that he had jurisdiction to pass a sentence of preventive detention because the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21 (2) (b), provides that, before that can be done, the offender must have "been convicted on indictment on at least three previous occasions", and there had not been such three previous convictions unless the two convictions that took place at Dorset Sessions on the same day, which were on two counts of the same indictment, could be regarded as two separate occasions.

B The court gave leave to appeal because, though we had no doubt that the sentence which the sessions passed (a sentence of eight years in the aggregate) was in the circumstances right in point of time, it was obvious that a matter of great importance was raised because these circumstances might easily arise again at any assizes or quarter sessions, and, therefore, we gave leave to appeal so that we could consider what is the meaning of the words "at least three previous occasions". Do they mean at least three separate appearances before a court, or do they mean three different convictions of which separate records of conviction can be drawn up? In other words, if a man has appeared before, let us say, the Central Criminal Court in the January sessions and has there pleaded Guilty either to an indictment containing three counts or to three separate indictments all at the same sessions, has he been convicted on three previous occasions so that, if he subsequently commits an offence, he can be sent to preventive detention?

C The Criminal Justice Act, 1948, uses practically the same expression in two other places—in s. 21 (1) (b) and in s. 22 (1) (a). Section 21 (1) deals with corrective training, and provides, among other things, that an offender must have been convicted "on at least two previous occasions . . . of offences punishable on indictment with [a sentence of imprisonment]", but on those occasions he need not have been convicted on indictment. Section 22 (1) provides:

F "Where a person is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or more and that person—
(a) has been convicted on at least two previous occasions of offences for which he was sentenced to Borstal training or imprisonment . . ."

G an order under that section shall be made requiring him to report when he comes out of prison. So there are at least three places where the words "previous occasions" are used, and, in the opinion of the court, the same interpretation must be put on those words where they appear in s. 21 (1) (b), relating to corrective training, and in s. 22 (1) (a), relating to notice to report, as the court puts on them in regard to s. 21 (2) (b), dealing with preventive detention. It is obvious that where you find an expression like "previous occasions" being used twice in one section and once in the following section, H the same construction must be put on it.

The object of preventive detention is the protection of the public by keeping an offender who is liable to it in detention for a long period. If a person is sentenced at assizes for two or three offences, the court always aggregates those offences, and says in effect either: "You will have five years on count 1 and three years on count 2 concurrent, in which case you will serve five years", or, if it does not think that is sufficient: "You will have five years on the first count and three years on the second count consecutive, which means you will serve eight years ". Is it, therefore, to be said that when he is sentenced to five years and to three years, he is being sentenced on two separate occasions whereas if he is sentenced to five years alone he is being sentenced on one occasion only ? The point is that if he shows that the sentences he receives at that court and two other courts do not deter him from committing crime, he is to be liable to preventive detention.

Therefore, the court is of opinion that we must construe these words " on at least three [or " two "] previous occasions ", as meaning that each occasion is a separate occasion, that is to say, the convictions referred to are convictions at different sessions or assizes, and two or more convictions at the same sessions or assizes will not rank as separate occasions. I think that, on the whole, that is giving effect to the intention of the Act. A

The only difference with regard to the provision relating to corrective training in s. 21 (1) (b) is that in those cases summary convictions count if they are of offences which would be punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or more. In our view, there is a conviction on a separate occasion on each occasion when a court of summary jurisdiction adjudicates on an information. If the offender is dealt with for two offences in, say, the month of April, he will only have been convicted on one occasion if that is done at the same court, but if he appears on separate informations twice in the same month, but at courts held at an interval, he will then be convicted on two occasions. For these reasons we think that the learned deputy chairman was right in holding that the appellant was not eligible for preventive detention, and we see no reason to alter the sentence. B C

The only other thing I have to say is that we mentioned in giving leave to appeal that the deputy chairman had not said in passing sentence that there would be an order for supervision under s. 22 (1). That matter has been considered in this court before now. Where it appears, when a case comes up on appeal, that an order has not been made per incuriam, we find no difficulty in saying that the sentence will be altered to that extent. In this case, the appellant has leave to appeal against sentence and so clearly we can do this, but in a case where an appellant has not appealed against sentence we have called attention to the fact that the order can be made because the statute is mandatory that the order shall be made unless, having regard to the circumstances, the court refrains from making it. I think also we may say that, if, when the governor of the gaol receives the prisoner in custody or the return signed by the clerk of the peace, he finds, in a case in which the section would operate, that an order has not been made, there is no objection to his applying to the clerk of assize or the clerk of the peace to find out whether the order has not been made per incuriam—whether it was omitted because the court forgot to make it or the clerk of the peace forgot to record it. The governor is entitled to call the court's attention to it. D E F

VAUGHAN v. VAUGHAN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Romer, L.JJ.),
December 18, 1952.]

Licence—Licence to occupy premises—Revocation—Deserted wife in occupation of matrimonial home—Dissolution of marriage—Length of notice to deliver up possession.

Husband and Wife—Deserted wife in occupation of husband's dwelling-house—Dissolution of marriage—Revocation of licence to occupy premises—Length of notice to deliver up possession.

The husband was the owner of a dwelling-house which was the former matrimonial home of the parties. In 1948 he deserted the wife, leaving her in the house and saying that she could "always live there". On June 19, 1950, the wife obtained a decree of divorce on the ground of the husband's adultery. By letter dated Mar. 11, 1952, the husband purported to determine the licence of the wife to remain in the house. On a claim by the husband for possession of the house,

HELD: after the dissolution of the marriage the wife could not assert a continuing right to remain in occupation of the former matrimonial home unless she could set up some kind of contract; the husband's statement and the subsequent conduct of the parties could amount to no more than that the wife was entitled to remain in occupation as a bare licensee of the husband under a licence which was revocable; but after revocation of the licence the wife must be given reasonable time to remove herself and her belongings from the premises, and, in the circumstances six months was reasonable.

PER SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: I did not intend to lay it down in Foster v. Robinson ([1950] 2 All E.R. 346) that, where a promise has been made which is not contractual in form or effect and that promise has been acted on, then and without more a right is given to the promisee to go on enjoying the subject-matter of the promise indefinitely.

PER DENNING, L.J.: A contractual licence by the husband giving the wife the right to stay in the house for the rest of her life . . . would be a "post-nuptial settlement" within the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court which could then decide whether or not the husband should get possession and, if so, on what terms.

APPEAL by the husband from a decision of His Honour JUDGE EMLYN JONES, sitting at the Birkenhead County court, dated Nov. 3, 1942.

F. D. Paterson for the husband (plaintiff).

W. G. O. Morgan for the wife (defendant).

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This appeal raises, in a somewhat different form from that in which it has appeared in other recent cases, a problem concerning the occupation of the former matrimonial home by a former wife. I emphasise those last three words, "a former wife", because it is important to note that the marriage between the husband (the plaintiff in the action) and the wife was dissolved on the wife's petition on June 19, 1950. Whatever may have been her rights as regards the matrimonial home before that date, thenceforward any rights she can assert to remain in occupation of the former matrimonial home must rest on some other basis than that of her being the wife of the proprietor of the premises.

The facts, so far as it is necessary to state them, are these. No. 65, Grosvenor Road, Birkenhead, is a house belonging to the husband. For some time before February, 1948, that house was the matrimonial home of the husband and wife. They had been married for some twenty-one years, but whether they lived there during all that time is not in evidence. On Feb. 10, 1948, the husband deserted his wife, leaving her in the house. According to the findings of the learned judge, who in this regard accepted the evidence given to him by the wife, at the time of the desertion the husband told his wife that she could "always live there"—that is, at 65, Grosvenor Road. In January, 1949, the wife took proceedings for judicial separation, but on June 19, 1950, she obtained a decree on the ground of her husband's adultery. By the present proceedings the husband seeks to obtain an order for possession of the house. The learned county court judge refused to make the order on the ground that the statement or promise made by the husband to the wife, which I have mentioned, gave her a right, as a licensee, under a licence not revocable by the husband, to continue, and continue indefinitely, in the premises. That view was based on certain observations of DENNING, L.J., in Bendall v. McWhirter (1), and Errington v. Errington (2) where reference was also made ([1952] 1 All E.R. 155) to certain observations of mine in Foster v. Robinson (3).

In my judgment, and without trying to expound this subject to any greater degree than is necessary to decide this case, the wife cannot, now that the marriage has been dissolved, assert a continuing right to remain in occupation of this house unless she can set up some kind of contract. I do not need to pursue the question whether there should be a good consideration, but there must be something contractual—that is, a promise made, intended to have and having contractual effect. When reference is made to this statement of the husband's and regard is had to the time at which it was made, it seems to me impossible to suppose that what the husband said could have been meant or intended by him or understood by her to have had any contractual basis or effect. Nothing, be it observed, was said at all about paying rent or rates or about repairs. Without more, it seems to me impossible to suppose that the husband intended to bind himself so that the wife was entitled, for the whole of her life, come what may, to remain in occupation of the house—I suppose on terms that her husband would provide the rent and the rates and, possibly, money for repairs also. If that is right, then this statement made by the husband and the subsequent conduct of the parties, which is consistent

A with the statement originally made, can amount to no more than that the wife was entitled to remain in occupation as a bare licensee of her then husband as the proprietor of the premises. If that view is right, the licence was clearly revocable. Being revocable, and having, in fact, been revoked, either by notice (which, I understand, was given in March, 1952), or, failing all else, by the issue of a summons, the only question remaining is: What length of time ought to be allowed for the wife to remove herself from the premises? It is well settled that, though a licence may be revoked, the licensee is not
B instantaneously turned into a trespasser; he or she must be given time, reasonable in all the circumstances, in which to remove himself or herself and his or her belongings from the land in respect of which the licence operated. On that matter I have been much assisted by the suggestion of counsel for the husband, for he said that he would not object to four to six months being
C allowed to the wife. I take the larger period, for I think that, though it is generous, it is also not unreasonable, bearing in mind the length of time during which she has occupied the house.

One other thing only I need say. Foster v. Robinson (3) was a somewhat special case. Possession was sought, not against the person who had, as it was said, become a licensee of the premises, but against his daughter. Shortly
C after the end of the first world war the plaintiff took over the management of a farm and let a cottage near by to a man who worked on the farm at a rent of £3 5s. a half-year. Later, the plaintiff let the farm, but the tenant of the cottage continued to work till, in 1946, he became unfit to do so by reason of age and infirmity. The plaintiff then told him that the existing
D tenancy would cease, but that he could live at the cottage rent free till he died. The tenant accepted that offer and lived in the cottage without paying rent till he died. The defendant, his daughter, had lived in the cottage for nine years, and, on her father's death, she took out letters of administration of his estate and claimed to remain on at the cottage paying the old rent. In proceedings by the plaintiff to recover possession, it was held that the plaintiff
E was entitled to possession on the ground that the original tenancy had, as a result of the arrangement in 1946, been surrendered by operation of law. The court was not concerned with the question whether the former tenant could enforce the promise made to remain rent-free at the cottage. It is, no doubt, true that the pre-existing tenancy could only come to an end if its place were taken by something else. Certain findings of fact had been made
F by the county court judge. I observe from the judgment of SINGLETON, L.J. ([1950] 2 All E.R. 350), that the county court judge had found that from May, 1946, until his death the father was a licensee, paying no rent, but entitled to remain in the cottage for the rest of his life. The passage from my own judgment on which reliance was placed in the court below is this (ibid., 346):

G "Since the recent decision in Winter Garden Theatre (London), Ltd. v. Millennium Productions, Ltd. (4) I think that, although a licence of that kind may, apart from the terms of the contract, be revoked, it may now be taken that, if the landlord, having made that arrangement, sought to revoke it, he would be restrained by the court from so doing. Thus, the result is arrived at that Mr. Robinson was entitled as licensee to occupy the cottage without charge for the rest of his days, and he did so. I prefer H that analysis of the case."

I did not intend to lay it down in that passage that, where a promise has been made which is not contractual in form or effect and that promise has been acted on, then and without more a right is given to the promisee to go on enjoying the subject-matter of the promise indefinitely. I have thought it right to make that explanation because I think the county court judge in the present case may have thought that the words of mine which I have read did lead to such a conclusion; that though there was in the present case nothing contractual, still, the promise having been made, the wife was entitled to assert it as a defence to any proceedings by her former husband to recover possession of his premises notwithstanding that he had in the meantime revoked the licence. In my opinion, the defence which was set up is not available to the wife, and I think this appeal must be allowed, and I think that the proper order will be that the wife should be required to deliver up possession by June 24, 1953.

DENNING, L.J.: The county court judge seems to have thought that there was a contractual licence by the husband giving the wife the right to stay in the house for the rest of her life. If such a contractual licence were established, I would agree that the husband's claim should be dismissed, but I would like to say that, in that event, the contractual licence would be a "post-nuptial settlement" within the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court which could then decide whether or not the husband should get possession and, if so, on what terms, for, as I understand the law on this matter, when a husband makes a continuing provision for the future needs of his wife, in her character as a wife, which is still continuing when the marriage is dissolved, the provision is a "settlement" which can be brought before the court to see whether it should continue now that she has ceased to be a wife: see Smith v. Smith (5); Gunner v. Gunner & Stirling (6); Halpern v. Halpern (7).

The difficulty here is to see that a contractual licence was established. To establish a contractual licence there must be a promise which is intended to be binding and is either supported by consideration or is intended to be acted on and is, in fact, acted on: see Dillwyn v. Llewelyn (8) and Plimmer v. Wellington Corpn. (9). In this case I cannot interpret the promise as one which was intended to create legal relations for life. It simply expressed in words the authority which the court would presume if nothing was said, namely, that the wife had authority to stay in the house in her capacity as a wife during the marriage. It is one of the familiar cases where the express authority is co-extensive with the presumed authority and, like it, comes to an end by death or divorce: see Bendall v. McWhirter (1) ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1311). The result is that the wife's right to stay in the house came to an end when she divorced her husband. She ought to have protected her position by taking steps in the divorce proceedings before decree absolute. She ought to have applied in those proceedings for maintenance, and then have come to an arrangement with her husband whereby he agreed not to turn her out of the house except by an order of the court and she in return agreed to accept a reduced sum for maintenance so long as she lived in the house. Such an arrangement would, undoubtedly, be sanctioned by the Divorce Court on or after making the decree and thus become binding: Bennett v. Bennett (10). The wife here, unfortunately, did not protect her position in that way, and on the decree absolute she became simply a licensee with a revocable licence to stay in the house. She could not, however, be turned out at once. She was entitled to have a reasonable time to make her arrangements, and what is a reasonable time depends on all the circumstances of the case: see Minister of Health v. Bellotti (11). Regard must, therefore, be had to the history of the marriage, to the fact that these persons had been married for twenty-one years when the husband deserted the wife and later committed adultery, and also to the question whether any alternative accommodation was available for the wife. Any difficulty about fixing a reasonable time in this case was, however, solved when counsel for the husband said that he was prepared to allow the wife another six months. That gives her time to go to the Divorce Court and get the maintenance increased up to a sum sufficient for her to live in comparable comfort somewhere else. I agree that the appeal should be allowed and an order made for possession on June 24, 1953.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree. If a wife is to establish a contractual right to continue to reside indefinitely in the former matrimonial home after the dissolution of the marriage, it seems to me that she would have to have much more material at her disposal than the wife has here, because all sorts of things would have to be considered as incidental to that right. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., mentioned the question of repairs and rates, which would be material matters for consideration and agreement. Then there is the question whether or not the wife's right should continue after her re-marriage, the question whether she should have powers, and, if so, what powers, of sub-

 A letting or assigning, and the further question whether, supposing she went abroad for three or four years, she would be entitled to resume possession on her return. All sorts of considerations of that kind would have to be considered as preliminary to the granting of a right to remain in possession of the former home. It is not suggested that any of these matters were considered between the parties in the present case. Further, it seems to me that, if the position of the wife
 B in this case was as her counsel suggested it was, the result would be that (subject only to the arrangement being embodied in a written instrument) the wife would have the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1925, and could sell the premises. I am sure that no such conception was present to the minds of either party in the present case. I am satisfied that the wife is not entitled to the right which she is claiming, and I am unable,
 C therefore, to agree with the learned judge when he said that the husband was precluded from asserting his legal right as owner. I think the position is as SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., has indicated, and that, subject to reasonable notice being given, the wife must leave the premises.

Appeal allowed.

MORGAN AND ANOTHER v. GRAY AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), December 19, 1952.]

Company—Shareholder—Bankruptcy—Right to vote.

F The authorised share capital of a company was £100 divided into shares of £1 each, of which A. and B., the only directors, held fifty each. A. was adjudicated bankrupt, and under the articles of association of the company he became disqualified from being a director. B. appointed his wife a director in place of A., and it became necessary for her, under
 G art. 18 of the company's articles, to acquire, as qualification, at least fifty shares. A meeting of the company was called, notice being given to A.'s trustee in bankruptcy, and was attended, for the purpose of voting, both by A. and a representative of the trustee each of whom in the alter-
 H native tendered proxies. The proxies were refused by B., who declared that there was no quorum present, and, in accordance with the articles, adjourned the meeting for one week. At the adjourned meeting, at which proxies were again tendered on behalf of A. and his trustee, the proxies being once more refused by B., B., as the only member present, passed a resolution, inter alia, deleting art. 18. A. and the trustee sought to restrain the company from acting on the resolution.

HELD: there being no provision in the company's articles or in the Companies Acts to the contrary, as A. remained on the register of shareholders, notwithstanding his bankruptcy he was entitled to attend the meetings of the company and to vote in person or by proxy, and, therefore, the resolution was invalid, and an injunction would be granted.

AS TO EFFECT OF BANKRUPTCY OF SHAREHOLDER, see HALSBURY, 1949 Edn., Vol. 5, pp. 285, 293, 300, paras. 492, 503, 514; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 9, pp. 410, 411, Nos. 2636-2643.

MOTION for an injunction restraining the defendants in the action from acting on a resolution which a meeting of the members of British Ethical Proprietaries, Ltd., purported to pass on Sept. 5, 1952, amending the company's articles of association, or on a resolution which a meeting of members purported to pass on Oct. 25, 1952, appointing the second-named defendant a director of the company. The parties agreed to treat the hearing as the trial of the action.

Harold Lightman for the plaintiffs, Seamus Brendan Morgan, and his trustee in bankruptcy.

Harold Christie, Q.C., and G. B. Parker for the defendants, Lionel Arthur Gray, Mabel Muriel Gray, and British Ethical Proprietaries, Ltd.

DANCKWERTS, J.: This is a motion in an action brought by Seamus Brendan Morgan and the trustee of his property in bankruptcy against Lionel Arthur Gray and his wife, Mabel Muriel Gray, who claim to be directors of the defendant company, British Ethical Proprietaries, Ltd. The notice of motion asks for an injunction to restrain the defendants from acting in pursuance of resolutions claimed to have been passed at certain meetings of the company which the plaintiffs say were not properly constituted.

The company has a share capital of £100, and originally fifty shares of £1 each were issued to Mr. Morgan, and fifty to another member, who in 1951 transferred his shares to the first defendant, Mr. Gray. On Apr. 30, 1952, Mr. Morgan was adjudicated a bankrupt, and thereupon he became disqualified to be a director, but, possibly, he resigned his post as director on the preceding day, Apr. 29, 1952. On Aug. 6, 1952, Mr. Gray appointed Mrs. Gray to be an additional director to fill the vacancy left by Mr. Morgan's disappearance from the board. Under the articles as they stood Mrs. Gray would have to acquire fifty shares, which, in effect, would have meant acquiring Mr. Morgan's fifty shares, within two months of her appointment as director, otherwise she would cease to be qualified. A meeting was called of the company for Aug. 29, 1952. At that meeting, Mr. Gray acted as chairman. Mr. Morgan and a representative of his trustee in bankruptcy attended the meeting for the purpose of voting and tendered proxies, but Mr. Gray refused to accept their proxies. He declared that there was not a quorum, the company's articles calling for a quorum of two holding sixty per cent. of the capital, and he adjourned the meeting after half an hour until Sept. 5, 1952. On Sept. 5, 1952, proxies were tendered again on behalf of Mr. Morgan and his trustee and were refused by Mr. Gray as chairman, and, after waiting half an hour, the chairman acted on the footing that the member present, being himself only, constituted a quorum and proceeded to pass a resolution altering the articles of the company by deleting art. 16 and art. 18. The effect of deleting art. 18 would be to remove the requirement that a director should hold fifty shares. On Oct. 18, 1952, the annual general meeting of the company was held, pursuant to a notice dated Sept. 26, 1952, which was sent to the trustee in bankruptcy. At the meeting, Mr. Gray was again tendered forms of proxy from the trustee in bankruptcy and Mr. Morgan, and disallowed the proxies. Mr. Morgan was not present in person at that meeting. After half an hour, the same result followed as at the previous meeting, it being declared that there was not a quorum, and the meeting was adjourned. On Oct. 25, 1952, the adjourned meeting was held and Mrs. Gray was elected a director of the company. The annual accounts were dealt with at that meeting.

A It is claimed on behalf of the plaintiffs that, as Mr. Morgan remained on the register of the company at all these material dates, he was entitled to vote at those meetings, and his vote in person when he was present, and his proxies which would have been available if he or his representatives had been allowed to demand a poll, were improperly disallowed, and, therefore, the resolutions were not properly passed. The articles of the company provide, by art. 7:

B “No person shall be recognised by the company as holding any share upon any trust, and the company shall not be bound by or recognise any equitable, contingent, future or partial interest in any share or any interest in any fractional part of a share, or (except only as by these presents otherwise expressly provided) any other right in respect of any share except an absolute right to the entirety thereof in the registered holder.”

C Article 9 provides:

“No business shall be transacted at any general meeting unless a quorum of members is present at the time when the meeting proceeds to business. Two members present in person or by proxy and holding between them not less than sixty per cent. of the issued share capital shall be a quorum.”

D By art. 13:

“The chairman shall have no second or casting vote.”

By art. 14:

“A poll demanded shall be taken forthwith.”

By art. 16:

E “Unless and until otherwise determined by the company in general meeting, the number of the directors shall be two. The first directors of the company shall be James Devane and Seamus Brendan Morgan who shall be life directors, and they shall hold office until they respectively die or resign (subject to art. 23) and they shall not be liable to retire by rotation.”

F By art. 18:

“The qualification of a director shall be the holding of at least fifty shares in the company of the aggregate nominal value of at least £50, and it shall be his duty to comply with the provisions of s. 141 of the Companies Act, 1929. A director may act before acquiring his qualification.”

G Under art. 23 a director who becomes bankrupt is disqualified. Table A of the Companies Act, 1929, is incorporated with the exception of the articles which are excluded, and among those which are excluded is art. 45. Article 22 of Table A of the Companies Act, 1929, provides:

H “A person becoming entitled to a share by reason of the death or bankruptcy of the holder shall be entitled to the same dividends and other advantages to which he would be entitled if he were the registered holder of the share, except that he shall not, before being registered as a member in respect of the share, be entitled in respect of it to exercise any right conferred by membership in relation to meetings of the company.”

Article 46 is important, because under that article the chairman purported to act:

“If within half an hour from the time appointed for the meeting a quorum is not present, the meeting, if convened upon the requisition of members, shall be dissolved; in any other case it shall stand adjourned to the same day in the next week, at the same time and place, and if at the adjourned meeting a quorum is not present within half an hour from the time appointed for the meeting the members present shall be a quorum."

Article 54 provides:

"On a show of hands every member present in person shall have one vote.

On a poll every member shall have one vote for each share of which he is the holder."

Under art. 78 and art. 79 an additional director can be appointed to fill a vacancy. Article 106 provides:

"A notice may be given by the company to the persons entitled to a share in consequence of the death or bankruptcy of a member by sending it through the post in a prepaid letter addressed to them by name, or by the title of representatives of the deceased, or trustee of the bankrupt, or by any like description, at the address, if any, within the United Kingdom supplied for the purpose by the persons claiming to be so entitled, or (until such an address has been so supplied) by giving the notice in any manner in which the same might have been given if the death or bankruptcy had not occurred."

By art. 107:

"Notice of every general meeting shall be given in some manner hereinbefore authorised to (a) every member except those members who (having no registered address within the United Kingdom) have not supplied to the company an address within the United Kingdom for the giving of notices to them, and also to (b) every person entitled to a share in consequence of the death or bankruptcy of a member, who, but for his death or bankruptcy, would be entitled to receive notice of the meeting. No other persons shall be entitled to receive notices of general meetings."

It appears, therefore, that the company would be justified in sending notice of a general meeting to the persons who became entitled in consequence of the bankruptcy of a member, and, by inference, in place of the member who had become a bankrupt.

It is curious that the question has never been decided, so far as can be ascertained, whether, in spite of his bankruptcy, a member of the company who remains a registered proprietor of shares on the company's register can continue to vote. It is, no doubt, the case that, if he can vote, he must exercise those votes in accordance with the direction of the persons beneficially entitled to the shares, which in the present case would be his trustee in bankruptcy, because the beneficial interest in his shares would have vested in the trustee. I am referred by counsel for the plaintiffs to Wise v. Lansdell (1), in which ASTBURY, J., treats the bankrupt member still on the register as entitled to vote. The circumstances were somewhat different in that case, since the persons who were entitled to direct the votes were mortgagees, and the equity of redemption in the shares in question had been disclaimed by the trustee. Consequently, so far as the trustee was concerned, he had no further interest in the shares, and in fact the bankrupt was a trustee for the mortgagees.

Counsel for the defendants relied on two cases. Motion v. Moojen (2) did not seem to me to affect the matter very much. It merely depended on the general principle that a bankrupt cannot sue, but an action can be brought by the trustee in bankruptcy. Of more interest, perhaps, was Re Cape Breton Co. (3). There, in the case of a company in liquidation, it was held that the bankrupt was not a contributory, and, therefore, was a stranger to the company, and could not interfere in regard to the administration of the company's affairs in its liquidation. It seems to me that that case has nothing to do with the present one, because there was in the Companies Act, 1862, s. 77, a provision similar to that which is now to be found in the Companies Act, 1948, s. 216, in these terms:

“ If a contributory becomes bankrupt, either before or after he has been placed on the list of contributories,—(a) his trustee in bankruptcy shall represent him for all the purposes of the winding-up, and shall be a contributory accordingly, and may be called on to admit to proof against the estate of the bankrupt, or otherwise to allow to be paid out of his assets in due course of law, any money due from the bankrupt in respect of his liability to contribute to the assets of the company . . . ”

Those words are very strong. It is plain that the trustee in bankruptcy is the contributory and the bankrupt is not, and, therefore, it follows that the bankrupt has no status in the winding-up of the company and cannot be allowed to interfere. That, however, is very different from the position where the company is still in operation and the bankrupt remains the registered proprietor on the company's register of the shares which he formerly owned beneficially as well as legally. It seems to me that, unless there is some provision in the company's articles or in the Companies Acts which empowers me to say that the bankrupt is no longer a member of the company, and, therefore, is, expressly, unable to vote, I must come to the conclusion that he remains a member as long as he is on the register, notwithstanding that, by taking steps under the appropriate provisions, the trustee in bankruptcy may be able to secure registration of himself as the proprietor of the shares. Unless and until that is done, and so long as the bankrupt remains on the register of the company, he remains a member in respect of those shares, and is entitled to exercise the votes which are attributed to that status, notwithstanding that he has no longer any beneficial interest in the shares and that the company is entitled to pay any dividends to his trustee in bankruptcy.

It seems to me, therefore, that at all material times in the present case the person who was the proprietor of the fifty shares not held by Mr. Gray was Mr. Morgan, and Mr. Morgan was entitled to attend the meetings of the company, whether or not he was entitled to demand that notices of general meetings should be sent to him and not to his trustee in bankruptcy. If he attended, as long as he was on the register he was entitled to vote, and as long as he was on the register he was entitled to give proxies for somebody else to vote on his behalf. Accordingly, it seems to me, in the result the resolutions on which the defendants rely should not have been passed.

Injunction granted.

THE HANS HOTH.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), October 29, 30, 1952.]

Shipping—Collision—Limitation of liability—Actual fault or privity of owner—Local traffic signals ignored—Compulsory pilot on board.

Harbour—Pilot—Compulsory pilot—Responsibility of shipowner—Local traffic signals ignored.

On matters of local knowledge, such as local signals, a master, exercising ordinary and reasonable care, is entitled to rely on the guidance which he obtains from the local pilot.

Entrance to and exit from Dover Harbour was controlled by signals exhibited from a mast ashore. On May 14, 1951, the m.v. Hans Hoth arrived off Dover and took on a compulsory pilot in order to enter the harbour. A signal was exhibited denoting that a vessel (s.s. Halladale) was leaving harbour and that no vessel was to approach so as to obstruct the entrance. The pilot did not see the signal, and he proceeded to take the Hans Hoth into harbour. The master, who was on the bridge, saw the signal, but he did not ascertain its meaning in the official publication nor did he draw the pilot's attention to it. At the entrance to the harbour the Hans Hoth collided with the Halladale, which suffered damage. The owners of the Hans Hoth admitted liability. On a claim by the master, as one of the owners of the Hans Hoth, for a declaration of limitation of liability,

Held: the question of signals directing traffic was a matter of purely local knowledge, on which a master, exercising ordinary and reasonable care, was entitled to rely for guidance on the local pilot, and, therefore, the master was entitled to the declaration claimed.

ACTION by the plaintiffs, owners of the German motor vessel, Hans Hoth, for a declaration of limitation of liability arising out of a collision between the said motor vessel and s.s. Halladale on May 14, 1951.

The Hans Hoth carried a crew of nine and her engines were controlled directly from the bridge. On May 14, 1951, she arrived off the entrance to Dover Harbour in daylight, in fine, clear weather, and exhibited the appropriate signal requesting a pilot, whose presence on board a ship entering the harbour was compulsory. A pilot duly put off in a boat and proceeded on board. There was only one entrance to the harbour in use, and admission to, and exit from, it was controlled by visual signals exhibited from a mast near the southern extremity of the eastern arm of the breakwater. On the occasion in question the signal three red balls in a triangle was being shown, denoting:

"A vessel is leaving the harbour, and no vessel is to approach so as to obstruct the entrance whilst this signal is shown."

The pilot failed to see the signal and proceeded to take the Hans Hoth into harbour, ordering the engines "full speed ahead". The master, who was one of the plaintiffs, was on the bridge at the engine control and he saw the signal. He knew from the chart and from what he described as a "sailor's handbook" that signals were exhibited at Dover to control traffic, but he did not refer to the official German publication to see what this particular signal meant. The Halladale was first seen at the entrance to the harbour approaching on a crossing course, broad on the starboard bow and at close quarters, and, although the Hans Hoth altered course to port and the Halladale to starboard, the two ships collided.

The plaintiffs, who were the three owners of the Hans Hoth, admitted liability for the collision. The defendants conceded that two of the plaintiffs were entitled to the decree sought, but said that the third plaintiff, who was acting as master, was not entitled to a decree on the ground that he was on the bridge and in command and that the collision occurred with his actual fault and/or privity. On behalf of the defendants, it was contended (i) that the master failed to post a proper look-out or to see that the pilot received such assistance as he was entitled to expect in the matter of look-out; and (ii) that the master failed to acquaint himself with the signals beforehand, and to draw the pilot's attention to the fact that he was taking the vessel into harbour against the signals. On the first contention WILLMER, J., found on the facts in favour of the plaintiffs and this report deals only with his finding on the second contention.

Adams, Q.C., and Hene for the plaintiffs.

Carpmael, Q.C., and J. B. Hewson for the defendants.

WILLMER, J.: In cross-examination the master said:

"We had all the proper books on board. It was my duty, as master, to see that we had them on board. The books were supplied so that I might consult them as necessary. I agree I ought to consult them when going to a port which I have not been to before."

Later, he said:

"My duty, as master, is to study the official book."

He then explained that the "sailor's handbook" referred him to the official book, which, he says, he did not consult. He then went on to say:

"I agree it was my duty to learn what the signals were."

By way of defence, or in mitigation of the offence he was admitting, he said:

"Sometimes signals are changed. The pilot would then tell me what the signals are. Since in this case the pilot was on board, I did not look at the book any more."

Towards the end of his cross-examination, he came back to the point again, and said:

"If I had read in the book and knew about the three red balls signal, I would have said to the pilot: 'Are they the right signals?' I would have asked him: 'Are they stopping us going in?' That is what ought to have happened. It did not happen. It was not only my fault. You have to think that the pilot knows the regulations. I should have known about the signals. I ought to have known about them."

Those answers, bearing in mind where the onus of proof lies in a limitation action, certainly did not make the case any easier for the plaintiffs. It is, nevertheless, argued that, when a local pilot is engaged, a master cannot be under any sort of duty to know all the local signals for himself, or to do anything other than trust his pilot in such a matter of local knowledge. I think it is fair, in that connection, that I should refer to some answers which the pilot himself gave in reply to questions which I put to him. He said:

"I did not expect any assistance beyond what I got. It was the usual thing. I do not blame anyone else for my failure."

Therefore, the pilot was not in any way trying to place a share of the blame on the master for not checking him with regard to the signals.

I think I have said enough now to make it clear that, without question, A there was some omission on the part of the master. He himself admitted that omission. I thought that the contention of counsel for the plaintiffs was well founded when he submitted that, following what BUCKLEY, L.J., said in Asiatic Petroleum Co., Ltd. v. Lennard's Carrying Co., Ltd. (1), the test is blameworthiness. I think it may be useful to read the relevant passage from BUCKLEY, L.J.'s judgment in that case, and I merely remark, in passing, that, B although that case went to the House of Lords, nothing, so far as I know, was said by any of their Lordships to cast any doubt on the accuracy of the following statement of principle enunciated by BUCKLEY, L.J. ([1914] 1 K.B. 432):

"The words 'actual fault or privity' in my judgment infer something C personal to the owner, something blameworthy in him, as distinguished from constructive fault or privity such as the fault or privity of his servants or agents. But the words 'actual fault' are not confined to affirmative or positive acts by way of fault. If the owner be guilty of an act of omission D to do something which he ought to have done, he is no less guilty of an 'actual fault' than if the act had been one of commission. To avail himself of the statutory defence, he must show that he himself is not blameworthy for having either done or omitted to do something or been privy to something. It is not necessary to show knowledge. If he has means of knowledge which he ought to have used and does not avail himself of them, his omission so to do may be a fault, and, if so, it is an actual fault and he cannot claim the protection of the section."

E It will be seen, as I have said, that BUCKLEY, L.J., there makes the test one of blameworthiness. What constitutes blame is that which would impart a legal liability. It seems to me, therefore, that I have to view the master's conduct in relation to these signals in the same way as I would view it if he were being sued for negligence for his part in relation thereto. The test is whether he failed in his duty to exercise that ordinary and reasonable care which is to F be expected of an ordinarily competent master of a vessel of this class in these circumstances. Again, I must stress that I bear in mind throughout that in a limitation action it is for the plaintiff to satisfy me that he has exercised that degree of care.

G I was pressed with a number of authorities in which the duties of a master in relation to the pilot have been considered. It is well known that those cases mostly arose in connection with the old defence of compulsory pilotage, which in recent years has no longer been available, but, so long as it existed, that defence led to a number of interesting and important decisions on the functions of pilot, master, and crew respectively. I propose to refer to two of the cases cited, which, I think, contain short statements of the principle relied on here on behalf of the defendants. The first of those cases is The Tactician (2). I desire H to refer to a short passage in the judgment of LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., sitting in the Court of Appeal. LORD ALVERSTONE dealt, first, with the danger of divided command and the risks which might be caused by undue interference by the master with the pilot's conduct, and he went on ([1907] P. 250):

"But side by side with that principle is the other principle that the pilot is entitled to the fullest assistance of a competent master and crew, of a competent look-out, and a well-found ship. I agree with the appellants' counsel that the cases in which the master has to interfere at all with the pilot very rarely occur, but I think the passages they have cited from the cases show that there is, or may be, a distinction between interference and bringing to the pilot's notice anything which the pilot ought to know. The pilot has a good many things to attend to, particularly in a place like the Thames, and certainly it is not putting the case too high to say that he is entitled to full information with regard to any surrounding fact which it is important that he should know."

The other case to which I ought to refer shortly, which contains a similar statement of principle, is S.S. Alexander Shukoff v. S.S. Gothland, S.S. Larenberg v. S.S. Gothland (3). There, again, the defence of compulsory pilotage was under discussion—this time in the House of Lords. In the course of the case, LORD BIRKENHEAD, L.C., referring to the question of responsibility in relation to compulsory pilotage, said ([1921] 1 A.C. 223):

" . . . this rule, which is intended as a measure of security, does not mean, and must not be taken to mean, that a pilot when once he is in charge of a vessel is so circumstanced that the master and crew owe him no duty to inform him of circumstances which, whether he has noticed them himself or not, are material for him to know in directing the navigation of the vessel. The master and crew are not mere passengers when a pilot is on board by compulsion of law. The pilot is entitled to their assistance, and to apply the defence of compulsory pilotage to a case where the accident would have been averted if such assistance had been given, though in fact it was not, would defeat the policy which has created the defence, and so far from increasing the safety of navigation would actually increase its risks."

Those are two striking passages, and there are others, both in the same cases and in other cases to which I was referred, where similar statements of principle were made which go to show that there is, undoubtedly, a duty on the part of the master and crew of a vessel towards the pilot.

It is contended that the same principle applies here to impose a duty on this master in relation to the signals at Dover Harbour, that is to say, it is contended that he ought to have known what the signals were, and, knowing what they were, ought to have drawn the attention of the pilot to them. I have to consider that forceful argument very carefully, but I think it is right to say that, in my judgment, there is a distinction to be drawn between the cases which have been cited in support of the defendants' proposition and the facts of this case. The Tactician (2), The Alexander Shukoff (3), and the other cases where the duty of the master and crew were similarly stressed were cases dealing with their duty to draw the pilot's attention to such things as lights of other vessels, that is to say, matters of ordinary navigation within the competence of any seaman and quite apart from any question of local knowledge. Here, on the other hand, the omission relied on is solely in relation to a piece of local knowledge, on which the pilot would ordinarily have been expected to be himself an authority. Because a pilot is entitled to the assistance of the master and crew in relation to matters such as the observation of lights of other vessels, sound signals, and so on, it does not in the least follow, to my mind, that the same duty necessarily arises in relation to matters of purely local knowledge, such as the signals with which we are concerned in this case—i.e., the signals exhibited by the local harbour authority. It appears to me that it is a question of what standard one ought to exact from a master of ordinary skill, exercising reasonable care.

I think I am right in saying that in the course of the argument both counsel agreed that it was a matter on which it would be proper that I should consult the Elder Brethren. I have, therefore, consulted them, to ascertain their view as to what could reasonably be expected of a competent master, exercising reasonable care in circumstances such as those of the present case. In putting my question to the Elder Brethren I invited them to assume that they were in command of a British vessel, of the size of the Hans Hoth, which was in the process of visiting a foreign port where it was known that local signals directing traffic were in existence. I asked the Elder Brethren whether, in such circumstances, they would regard it as being a part of their duty in the ordinary way to check the observations of the pilot with regard to such matters as local signals, and so forth. Their advice to me was that they would not regard that as being part of the ordinary duty of a competent master exercising ordinary care. They point out that, if one were to impose that sort of duty on a master visiting a strange or foreign port, it is difficult to see where the duty would stop. If it is right that a master visiting Dover from abroad ought to know the significance of a signal of three red balls in a triangle exhibited at the entrance to the harbour, and ought to be ready to warn the pilot if he is going against that signal, it would be equally right that he should know the significance of all the other local signals which he might encounter in that port. One can, perhaps, test it, as the Elder Brethren invited me to test it, by imagining how much a foreign master visiting the River Thames would have to know, if he were to be prepared to check the pilot. As is well known, the Port of London Authority issues a handbook of local bye-laws which gives descriptions of local lights, signals, and so forth. All those are matters which a local pilot knows, and must know, as part of his ordinary stock-in-trade. The Elder Brethren advise me that one could not reasonably expect any ordinarily competent master, when visiting a foreign port, to know all that sort of thing, or to be ready to check the pilot in relation to what is no more than a question of local knowledge.

Having received that advice, it only remains for me to say that I unhesitatingly accept it. Not only do I attach great importance to such advice coming from such a quarter, but I am bound to add that the advice which I have received accords with my own idea of the common sense of the matter. In my judgment, it would be putting too much on a master and would be asking him to exercise more than ordinary care, to regard him as being under a duty to know all the local signals when he has a pilot on board, or to expect him to be ready to query the pilot's actions in relation to such local signals. In my judgment, on such matters of purely local knowledge, a master exercising ordinary and reasonable care is entitled to rely on the guidance which he obtains from the local pilot. After all, it is for the reason that he has this local knowledge, and for no other reason, that the ship is required by Act of Parliament to take a pilot. One must further remember, as was pointed out by the master himself when he was giving his evidence, that, even if the master of a ship visiting a strange port does take the trouble to read in advance from some official publication what the local signals are at the port he is to visit, it does not follow that when he gets there he will not find that the signals have been changed overnight by some edict of the responsible harbour authority. I have come to the conclusion that, the omission of the master here being in relation to something of purely local significance, this case is to be distinguished in principle from cases such as The Tactician (2) and the other cases to which I was referred. I am satisfied that the plaintiff master cannot be held to be blameworthy in the sense in which I understand BUCKLEY, L.J., to be using that word in Asiatic Petroleum Co., Ltd. v. Lennard's Carrying Co., Ltd. (1). It follows, therefore, that the plaintiffs have, although not without difficulty, succeeded in establishing to my satisfaction that this collision occurred without their actual fault or privity. In my judgment, they are entitled to the relief claimed.

Re PERREYMAN (deceased). NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK, LTD. v. PERREYMAN AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), November 26, 1952.]

National Health Service—Hospital—Gift of share of residue—“To any three hospitals in . . . Devon which . . . are most in need of it”—“Need” of hospitals vested in Minister of Health—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 54 (1), (2).

By his will, dated Mar. 20, 1941, the testator, who died on Sept. 3, 1948, appointed the plaintiff bank as his executor and trustee and gave his residuary estate to the bank on trust to pay one-half thereof to a certain hospital and to divide and pay the other half “to any three hospitals in the county of Devon which in the opinion of the bank are most in need of it and in such proportions as the bank deem most suitable”. On July 5, 1948, under the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 6, the hospitals in Devon vested in the Minister of Health. By s. 52 (1) of the Act any expenses incurred by the Minister in the exercise of his functions under the Act are to be defrayed out of moneys provided by Parliament, and s. 54 (1) provides for payment to the regional hospital boards, out of moneys provided by Parliament, of such sums as may be necessary to defray the expenditure of the board, being expenditure approved by the Minister in the manner prescribed by regulations made under the Act. In an affidavit sworn on Aug. 8, 1952, on behalf of the South Western Regional Hospital Board, who were responsible for all hospitals in Devon which vested in the Minister under the Act of 1946, the secretary of the board stated that there were considerable differences between the hospitals in their standards of efficiency and upkeep, and, consequently, in their financial needs; that, though this difference had been mitigated to some extent since July 5, 1948, it had not been abolished, as the annual grants made by the Exchequer to the board for capital expenditure were insufficient to bring the hospitals in the lower categories up to the standard of those which were efficient; and that, owing to shortage of funds, the progress of hospital development and improvement, designed to produce an equal standard of efficiency as between different hospitals, was necessarily slow and the existing inequalities were certain to persist for a long period.

HELD: as the Exchequer was unable, at present, to provide sufficient funds for all the needs of the hospitals so as to enable every hospital vested in the Minister of Health to maintain a proper standard, hospitals vested in the Minister could be in need of funds additional to those provided by Parliament, and, therefore, they were objects of the discretionary trust contained in the will and were entitled to benefit thereunder.

FOR THE NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE ACT, 1946, s. 52 and s. 54, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 15, pp. 385, 386.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, whether on the true construction of the will of Richard Charlie Perreyman, who died on Sept. 3, 1948, any hospitals now vested in the Minister of Health by virtue of the National Health Service Act, 1946, were objects of a discretionary trust, conferred on the plaintiff bank, the trustee of the will, to pay a moiety of the testator's residue “to any three hospitals in the county of Devon which . . . are most in need of it”.

Rink for the plaintiff bank.

M. Browne for the first, second and third defendants, interested under an intestacy.

Denys B. Buckley for the South Western Regional Hospital Board and the Attorney-General.

DANCKWERTS, J.: By his will, dated Mar. 20, 1941, the testator, Richard Charlie Perreyman, appointed the plaintiff bank to be the executor and trustee thereof. He gave his residuary estate to the bank on the usual trusts for sale and conversion, and, after giving thereout certain pecuniary legacies, he directed the bank to pay one-half of the residue to Brixham Cottage Hospital for the general purposes thereof and

“ . . . to retain the other half upon trust to divide and pay the same to any three hospitals in the county of Devon which in the opinion of the bank are most in need of it and in such proportions as the bank deem most suitable.”

The testator died on Sept. 3, 1948, and, therefore, his will came into operation shortly after the National Health Service Act, 1946, came into effect on July 5, 1948. The question is whether any of the hospitals which vested in the Minister of Health under s. 6 of the Act are qualified to take under the terms of the discretionary trust regarding the second moiety of the testator's residuary estate.

Section 3 (1) of the Act of 1946 provides:

“ As from the appointed day, it shall be the duty of the Minister to provide throughout England and Wales, to such extent as he considers necessary to meet all reasonable requirements, accommodation and services of the following descriptions, that is to say:—(a) hospital accommodation; (b) medical, nursing and other services required at or for the purposes of hospitals; (c) the services of specialists . . . and any accommodation and services provided under this section are in this Act referred to as ‘ hospital and specialist services ’.”

Section 7 provides:

“ (4) All endowments of a voluntary hospital to which [s. 6] applies . . . being endowments held immediately before the appointed day, shall on that day be transferred to and vest in the Minister by virtue of this Act free of any trust existing immediately before that day; and the Minister shall establish a fund, to be called the Hospital Endowments Fund, to which he shall transfer all such endowments . . . (5) Regulations shall provide . . . (b) for enabling the Minister to apply, to such extent as may be prescribed, the assets of the fund for discharging any liabilities transferred to him under [s. 6] in connection with the transfer of such a voluntary hospital as is mentioned in [s. 7 (4)], or transferred to him under this section; (c) subject to any provision for the discharge of such liabilities, for apportioning the capital value of the fund among the several regional hospital boards and hospital management committees constituted under the following provisions of this Part of this Act, in such shares as may be determined by the Minister in the prescribed manner, and for distributing the income of the fund to those boards and committees proportionately to those shares; (d) for enabling the Minister, on the application of a regional hospital board or hospital management committee, to transfer to that board or committee for such purposes as may be approved by the Minister any part of the capital assets of the fund not exceeding in value the said share of that board or committee, and for reducing that share accordingly. (6) Subject to such general conditions as may be prescribed, any income received by a regional hospital board or hospital management committee under the last foregoing sub-section may be used for such purposes relating to hospital services, or to the functions of the board or committee under this Part of this Act with respect to research, as the board or committee thinks fit. (7) Every board of governors and hospital management committee shall, in the case of any endowment transferred to them under this section, and the Minister shall, in the case of any endowment transferred to him and the Hospital Endowments Fund under this section, secure, so far as is reasonably practicable, that the objects of the endowment and the observance of any conditions attaching thereto, including in particular conditions intended to preserve the memory of any person or class of persons, are not prejudiced by the provisions of this section."

A Section 52 provides:

"(1) Any expenses incurred by the Minister in the exercise of his functions under this Act . . . shall be defrayed out of moneys provided by Parliament. (2) All sums received by the Minister under this Act, except sums required to be transferred to the Hospital Endowments Fund, shall be paid into the Exchequer."

B Section 54 provides:

"(1) There shall be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament to—
C (a) every regional hospital board such sums as may be necessary to defray the expenditure of the board (including expenditure incurred by a hospital management committee in exercising functions on behalf of the board), being expenditure approved by the Minister in the prescribed manner; (b) every board of governors of a teaching hospital such sums as may be necessary to defray the expenditure of the board being expenditure approved as aforesaid. (2) All expenditure of a hospital management committee approved as aforesaid shall be defrayed by the regional hospital board for the area in which the hospital or group of hospitals in question is situated . . .
D (6) Payments made under this section shall be made in accordance with regulations made by the Minister and approved by the Treasury, and shall be made at such times and in such manner as the Treasury may direct, and subject to such conditions as to records, certificates, or otherwise [as] the Minister may with the approval of the Treasury determine."

E Counsel for the next-of-kin submitted that, by reason of the provisions of the Act of 1946, the onus was on the Minister of Health to show that any of the hospitals vested in him were in need. He further contended that, as money was provided by Parliament to defray the needs of these hospitals, it could not possibly be said that they were "in need of" money left by the testator. This, no doubt, might be a valid argument if the funds provided by the F Exchequer were unlimited so as to satisfy, beyond question of any possible need, whatever demands were made by the hospitals. But that this is not the case is shown by the affidavit of Mr. Carter, secretary of the South Western Regional Hospital Board, who are responsible for all hospitals in Devon which became vested in the Minister of Health under the Act of 1946. In his affidavit, which was sworn on Aug. 8, 1952, Mr. Carter says:

G "When the said hospitals became vested in the Minister on July 5, 1948, there were very considerable differences between them in their standards of efficiency and upkeep and consequently in their financial need . . . Some of them were well administered and equipped, and others were deficient in these respects . . . The difference in standards . . . has been to some extent mitigated since the appointed day, but it has not H been wholly abolished, for the reason that the annual grants made by the Exchequer to the board for capital expenditure are insufficient . . . to bring the hospitals in the lower categories up to the standard of those which are most up-to-date and efficient . . . Owing, therefore, to shortage of funds, the progress of hospital developments and improvements, designed to produce an equal standard of efficiency as between different hospitals, is necessarily slow, and the existing inequalities are certain to persist for a very long period . . ."

Mr. Carter then specifies the hospitals in Devon which, in his opinion, are in the greatest need of help. It is thus clear that, at present, the Exchequer is unable to provide sufficient funds for all the needs of the hospitals so as to enable every hospital vested in the Minister of Health to maintain a proper standard. Therefore, it is not correct to say that none of the hospitals vested in the Minister is in need of funds additional to those provided by Parliament. Accordingly, hospitals vested in the Minister are within the terms of the discretionary trust contained in the will and are entitled to benefit thereunder.

Master and Servant—Wages—Regulation—Catering worker—Cloak-room attendant—Absence of control over manner of doing work—No contract of service Remuneration by tips—No “employment in undertaking”—“Deemed to be employed”—Catering Wages Act, 1943 (c. 24), s. 1 (2), (4).

The defendants, who were restaurant proprietors, entered into an oral agreement with the plaintiff under which she was to act as cloak-room and toilet attendant at their restaurant. She was to clean the cloak-room and toilet accommodation, for which she was supplied with the materials. She was given certain hours of work, but was not required to “clock in” like the other workers at the restaurant and she provided a substitute at her own expense when taking an evening off. She received no wages, but she kept all tips and was provided with certain meals. The defendants informed her that she was self-employed, and she stamped her insurance cards as a self-employed person. She paid no income tax under the “P.A.Y.E.” scheme. In an action by her to recover the minimum wages which she alleged were payable to her by virtue of s. 1 (2) and (4) of the Catering Wages Act, 1943, and the Wages Regulation (Licensed Residential Establishment and Licensed Restaurant) Order, 1949, sched. I, para. 2,

HELD: (i) as the defendants were unable to control the manner in which the plaintiff's work was done there was no contract of service between them, and

(ii) the plaintiff was not “employed” by the defendants within the meaning of s. 1 (2) of the Act of 1943, since “employed in any undertaking” in that sub-section did not mean merely “working in” the undertaking, but

(iii) the plaintiff was a worker who performed work in pursuance of an express arrangement made by her by way of trade with the defendants who were carrying on their restaurant undertaking for the purpose of that undertaking, and was, therefore, “deemed to be employed” within the meaning of s. 1 (4) of the Catering Wages Act, 1943, and was entitled to be paid the minimum wages prescribed under that Act and the order of 1949.

ACTION for the recovery of alleged arrears of wages.

B The plaintiff was a cloak-room attendant, and, in June, 1949, on the introduction of an employment agency, she entered into an oral agreement with the defendants, proprietors of the "96" Restaurant, Piccadilly, London, to act as a cloak-room and toilet attendant at the restaurant. Under the agreement she was to do the cleaning of the cloak-room and toilets, all materials being supplied by the defendants, and she was given certain hours of work, but she did not have to "clock in" like other workers at the restaurant and she never asked for a "clocking in" card. She was to receive no wages, but she was to be allowed to keep all tips and was to have certain free meals. When taking an evening off each week she was to provide and remunerate a suitable substitute, and in her discretion, without asking for the approval of the defendants, she employed the wife of one of the waiters at the restaurant, this woman being remunerated with the tips for the evening. No provision was made as to employment cards, insurance cards, payment of income tax by "P.A.Y.E.", or the use of the staff entrance, but the plaintiff was informed D that she was not being employed by the defendants as one of their servants but was self-employed and "on her own". She stamped her insurance cards with 5s. 1d. stamps as a self-employed person after a refusal by the defendants' secretary to stamp them. She paid no income tax. On July 7, 1950, she was given notice to leave on July 14.

E The plaintiff contended that she was at all material times a worker to whom the provisions of the Catering Wages Act, 1943, applied, and, therefore, for whom "statutory minimum remuneration for employment" had been fixed by the Wages Regulation (Licensed Residential Establishment and Licensed Restaurant) Order, 1949, the minimum rate for a cloak-room and toilet attendant being set out in para. 2 of sched. I, and that she was employed by the defendants as a cloak-room and toilet attendant either under a contract F of service made orally between the parties in June, 1949, within the meaning of s. 1 (2) of the Act of 1943, or, in the alternative, that she was to be "deemed to be employed" by them under s. 1 (4) of the Act. The defendants contended that the Act and the regulations had no application to the plaintiff, that there was no contract of service between the parties, and that s. 1 (2) and (4) of the Act did not enable her to say that she was employed or "deemed to be G employed" within the meaning of those sub-sections.

Cur. adv. vult.

H Dec. 18. BIRKETT, L.J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and continued: The first question I have to decide is whether the plaintiff was a worker employed in the defendants' undertaking. The Catering Wages Act, 1943, is described as:

"An Act to make provision for regulating the remuneration and conditions of employment of catering and other workers and, in connection therewith, for their health and welfare and the general improvement and development of the industries in which they are employed."

Section 1 of the Act provides:

"(1) The Minister of Labour and National Service . . . shall establish a commission, to be called the Catering Wages Commission . . . to perform, in relation to the workers to whom this Act applies and their employers, such functions as are entrusted to the commission by this Act . . . (2) The workers to whom this Act applies are all persons employed in any undertaking, or any part of an undertaking, which consists wholly or mainly in the carrying on (whether for profit or not) of one or more of the following activities, that is to say, the supply of food or drink for immediate consumption, the provision of living accommodation for guests or lodgers or for persons employed in the undertaking and any other activity so far as it is incidental or ancillary to any such activity as aforesaid of the undertaking."

It is said, first, on the plaintiff's behalf that she was so employed under a contract of service made orally in June, 1949. This is a question of fact, as WARRINGTON, J., said in Re Winter German Opera, Ltd. (1) (23 T.L.R. 662) where he said that " . . . the question in this and similar cases must turn upon the particular facts of each particular case, and the authority of other cases, and particularly of cases based upon different statutes, was of very little assistance."

Much point is given to this observation by a glance at STROUD'S JUDICIAL DICTIONARY, 3rd ed., vol. 2, pp. 943-949, where a bewildering array of decisions on various statutes is set out, and the construction of the word "employment" is dealt with.

In Gould v. Minister of National Insurance (2) ORMEROD, J., says ([1951] 1 All E.R. 371):

"It is easy in some cases to say that the contract is a contract of service and in others that it is a contract for services, but between these two extremes there is a large number of cases where the line is much more difficult to draw. Although the authority of cases based on different statutes may be of very little assistance in deciding any particular case, it is possible to extract from these authorities a common principle on which the decisions are founded. It is clear that the real question is one of the degree of control exercised by the person employing the artist, and this, as I see it, means not only the amount of control but the nature of that control and the direction in which it is exercised. In Short v. Henderson, Ltd. (3), a case in the House of Lords under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, LORD THANKERTON (115 L.J.P.C. 47) recapitulates with approval the four indicia of a contract of service derived by the Lord Justice-Clerk from the authorities referred to by him. These are: (a) the master's power of selection of his servant; (b) the payment of wages or other remuneration; (c) the master's right to control the method of doing the work; and (d) the master's right of suspension or dismissal. He goes on to say that the particular requirement of a contract of service is the right of the master in some reasonable sense to control the method of doing the work, and that this factor of superintendence and control has frequently been treated as critical and decisive of the legal quality of the relationship."

In the case now before me the defendants selected the plaintiff. There was remuneration solely by tips (and, of course, a person may be none the less a servant by reason of the fact that his remuneration consists solely of tips). The defendants could suspend or dismiss the plaintiff, but, in my opinion, they did not control the manner in which the work should be done. The plaintiff was not obliged to "clock in" as the other workers were. She stamped her own card as a self-employed person within s. 1 (2) (a) (b) of the National

Insurance Act, 1946. She could stay away when she pleased and provide and pay for a substitute or an assistant, and, though the defendants required the work to be done, they did not control the manner in which it was to be done. I have come to the conclusion on all the facts of this case that there was no contract of service between the plaintiff and the defendants, and that it was well understood between them that the plaintiff was a self-employed person, and I do not accept the evidence of the plaintiff when she says otherwise.

A For the space of a year she appears to have been quite content, and with good reason. I was given no reliable evidence of the amount which she received in tips, for she kept no accounts and paid no income tax. There was no P.A.Y.E. card as in the case of other workers, and, while she told me that the amount she received was about £7 per week, from certain other information she gave and from the evidence about banquets and other special occasions, I incline

B to the view that she received more than this. It would appear to me that the union took up this matter as a question of principle, and the fact that the plaintiff, as I think, was remunerated on a handsome scale by the tips she received must not obscure the point of principle to be determined.

It was then said on behalf of the plaintiff that, if she was not employed under a contract of service, the meaning of the word "employed" in s. 1 (2) of the Act was merely that of "working in", and the section should, therefore,

C be read as: "The workers to whom this Act applies are all persons working in any undertaking". I cannot accept this contention, for it seems to me that, if that interpretation is to be put on the words, it is a strange thing that Parliament did not use the words "working in" instead of the word "employed". I think, therefore, that the plaintiff fails to bring herself

D within s. 1 (2) of the Act.

The application of s. 1 (4) seems to me to be the substantial question in the case. It reads:

"For the purposes of this Act, any worker who, for the purposes of any undertaking or part of an undertaking performs any work in pursuance of an arrangement express or implied, made by the worker by way of trade with the persons carrying on that undertaking shall be deemed to be employed by them in that undertaking or part."

If the Act is looked at as a whole, it is plain that the intention is to provide a complete code for the catering industry so far as conditions of work and remuneration are concerned. The Catering Wages Commission referred to in

F s. 1 (1) is given very wide powers. In the Wages Regulation (Licensed Residential Establishment and Licensed Restaurant) Order, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 908) made by the Minister of Labour and National Service, which came into operation on June 1, 1949, the cloak-room attendant is specifically provided for as follows (sched I, para. 21):

"Cloak-room and toilet attendant is a worker aged twenty-one years or over who is wholly or mainly employed on one or more of the following duties, that is to say, the receipt, custody and issue of personal effects deposited in the cloak-room, or the charge of, and responsibility for cleaning or for the cleanliness of, toilets."

and in para. 2 of sched. I the rates applicable to cloak-room and toilet attendant (female) are set out. In para. 22 of the order, the workers to whom the schedule

H applies are listed:

"Subject to the provisions of para. 23 the provisions of this schedule apply to all workers employed in Great Britain in a catering undertaking who are employed by the person or body of persons carrying on that undertaking and who are so employed . . . (2) . . . and who are engaged on any of the following work [then various categories are set out; and, finally] . . . (h) any work other than that specified in sub-paras. (a) to

(g) hereof performed on or about the premises or place where food or drink is prepared or served or where living accommodation is provided, including work in connection with any service or amenity provided on or about such premises or place."

Looking at s. 1 (4) in the light of all this, it is plain, and, indeed, it is not contested by counsel for the defendants, that the plaintiff is a worker. She is, in fact, a cloak-room and toilet attendant. Secondly, her work is for the purpose of an undertaking, i.e., the defendants' restaurant. Thirdly, that work is performed in pursuance of an express arrangement made by the worker with the defendants who are carrying on that undertaking. The crucial question which remains, and, I think, the only question, therefore, is: Is that arrangement made by the worker by way of trade? If the answer is in the affirmative, then the plaintiff "shall be deemed to be employed by the defendants in that undertaking."

The contest on this point was simple and short. Counsel for the defendants submitted that the words "by way of trade" meant that the worker who made the arrangement with the persons carrying on the undertaking must be carrying on a specific trade and made the arrangement as such trader. He submitted that the plaintiff was not carrying on any trade, and the arrangement she made in this case with the defendants was, therefore, not made "by way of trade". When one looks at the "Table of weekly minimum remuneration" in para. 2 of sched. I, and sees all the various workers who are there set out, barman, barmaid, cashier, cellarman, chambermaid, chef, cleaner, clerk or receptionist, cloak-room attendant, cook, fireman and housekeeper, it would be difficult to say that any of them carried on a trade in the ordinary acceptation of that term, but they are all listed as workers to whom minimum rates apply.

Counsel for the defendants said the meaning of the words "by way of trade" ought not to be extended beyond the definition for which he contended. Counsel for the plaintiff, on the other hand, submitted that the words should not be so narrowly construed, and that they were wide enough in this case to cover the arrangement made, and, indeed, were intended to do so in order that the scheme of the Act of 1943 should not be weakened by any attempts at evasion. He said (and it is right that I should repeat it) that in this case the good faith of the defendants had never been impugned, and I should add that under the arrangement made with the plaintiff that could scarcely be said, because it was, I think, of an extremely profitable character, far exceeding the minimum wages laid down in the schedule to the order.

In the Trade Boards Act, 1909, these same words, "by way of trade" appear, and it is to be observed that the marginal note to s. 9 of that Act reads "prevention of evasion". Section 9 is in these terms:

"Any shopkeeper, dealer, or trader, who by way of trade makes any arrangement express or implied with any worker in pursuance of which the worker performs any work for which a minimum rate of wages has been fixed under this Act, shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be the employer of the worker, and the net remuneration obtainable by the worker in respect of the work after allowing for his necessary expenditure in connection with the work shall be deemed to be wages."

I gain considerable assistance, although the facts are very different, from Skinner v. Jack Breach, Ltd. (4). The headnote of that case reads ([1927] 2 K.B. 220):

"By orders made under the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918, the Minister of Labour directed that those Acts should apply to 'the mending, re-fitting and re-conditioning of drift nets', which thereby became a ‘specified trade’ within the meaning of the Acts, and in due course the trade board fixed for certain classes of female workers in the trade minimum rates of wages, which were made obligatory by an order of the Minister of Labour. The appellant, one of the workers in respect of whom the trade board had fixed minimum wages, had been employed for over three years, and was employed, with thirty other women, by the respondents, who were fishermen and owners of fishing boats, in mending drift nets, which were exclusively the property of the respondents and were only used by them in their business:—Held, that the Trade Boards Acts applied to workers in a ‘specified trade’ by whomsoever they were employed, if their employment was regular and for commercial purposes, and not only to workers employed in a ‘specified trade’ by an employer who was solely engaged in the same trade, and, therefore, the respondents were bound to pay to the appellant the minimum wage fixed by the trade board for workers of her class in her branch of industry.”

While, as I have said, the facts in that case were wholly different from the facts with which I have to deal, it does assist in some degree in shedding light on the meaning of the words “by way of trade”, and I observe that in the argument of the Attorney-General in this case, he said (ibid., 224):

“In the Trade Boards Acts, the object of which is to prevent the underpayment of workers, ‘trade’ is used in the sense of the operations which are carried on by the worker by way of business; see s. 1 (1) (2), s. 4 (1) and other sections of the Act of 1909; and it is immaterial that the employer is engaged in a trade different from that which he employs the worker to carry on . . . Section 9, which compels the payment of the minimum wage to those who might be thought to be independent contractors, shows that the legislature regarded the matter from the point of view of the worker and his work, and wished to secure that a worker who was commercially employed should receive proper wages for his work, whatever the object for which that work was produced.”

That, of course, was the argument. LORD HEWART, C.J., said (ibid., 225):

“We have to regard the true meaning of the Trade Boards Acts and the orders and regulations made under them. No doubt in a great many contexts the word ‘trade’ indicates a process of buying and selling, but that is by no means an exhaustive definition of its meaning. It may also mean a calling or industry or class of skilled labour. When one looks at Acts of Parliament like the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, it appears that the word ‘trade’ is commonly used to indicate the position created by the relation of employer and employed in certain branches or classes of industry . . . The meaning which has to be collected from phrases like that—and they by no means stand alone—and from the whole scheme and purpose of the Act is reinforced by the particular language of s. 9. That section, no doubt, deals with an individual matter, but it contains words which illuminate the purpose of the statute as a whole. It shows that, even where an outworker, or a worker who provides some of the requisite materials or tools, is concerned, the Act regards the nature of the work performed, and that, if the worker is doing a kind of work to which a minimum rate of wages applies, it matters not that the ‘shopkeeper, dealer, or trader’ would not describe his business, or the whole of it, by words applicable to that particular branch of industry . . . It is enough to say that casual work is not within the scope of the Acts, nor is work given to another by a private person. There must be trade in the sense of commercial employment, but if that is present it does not matter that the description of the work done by the worker is not exhaustive of the description of the whole business of the employer.”

In the present case I think I have to consider the whole purpose and design of the Catering Wages Act, 1943. I think its purpose was to see that the workers employed in an undertaking supplying food and drink for immediate consumption, such as the "96" Restaurant, or in any incidental or ancillary activity of the undertaking, should receive wages based on the figures laid down by the commission. Where on the special facts of any particular case it would not be said that they were employed within the meaning of s. 1 (2) of the Act, either by a contract of service or otherwise, nevertheless, if there was an arrangement made by the worker with the persons carrying on the undertaking, and that arrangement provided for the worker to do the kind of work to which a minimum rate of wages applied, that arrangement was by "way of trade", using and interpreting the term in the sense of commercial employment, and the worker was to "be deemed to be employed by the persons carrying on the undertaking."

That, I think, was the position of the plaintiff on the facts of this case,¹ and I, therefore, give judgment for the plaintiff for the agreed sum of £200 and the costs of the action.

PIKE v. PIKE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Hodson, L.J.J.), November 19, 20, 1952.]

Divorce—Desertion—Constructive desertion—Conduct equivalent to expulsion of other spouse—Conduct falling short of cruelty.

A charge of constructive desertion cannot be proved by evidence of conduct, alleged to have caused the petitioner to leave the matrimonial home, of the nature of cruelty, but not amounting to cruelty in law. A charge of cruelty must be distinctly pleaded and proved as such.

APPEAL by the husband against a decision of Mr. Commissioner GOODMAN ROBERTS, Q.C., on July 29, 1952, whereby he granted a decree of divorce in favour of the wife on her petition alleging desertion by the husband.

The husband appeared in person.

MacPherson for the wife.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I will ask HODSON, L.J., to give the first judgment.

HODSON, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of [Mr. Commissioner GOODMAN ROBERTS, Q.C., dated July 29, 1952, in which he pronounced a decree of divorce in favour of the wife on the ground of the husband's desertion. The petition is dated May 12, 1951, and the charge of desertion is worded in this way:

"That the respondent has deserted the petitioner without cause for a period of at least three years and upwards immediately preceding the presentation of this petition. Particulars—By reason of the respondent's conduct towards the petitioner, the petitioner was forced to leave the matrimonial home at . . . Cheltenham aforesaid. The respondent would refuse to provide the petitioner with money for household expenses and in July, 1947, when the petitioner informed him that it was necessary for her to be X-rayed because of chest trouble, he informed her that he would love to see her in a sanatorium and that she was neurotic and not fit to live with him. The respondent further informed the petitioner that he did not desire to live with her and that it was cheaper for him to provide her with an allowance. That since Oct. 17, 1947, the petitioner and the respondent have lived separate and apart."

By his answer the husband contented himself with denying the allegations which were made against him, and as part of his denial he denied that he had been guilty of cruelty, although the word "cruelty" was not actually used in the petition. It is to be remembered that he was not charged with cruelty; he was charged with desertion. It is true it is described as constructive desertion, which means that it is not suggested that he left his wife, but that somehow or other he forced her to leave him. The danger in this class of case is that a person who is alleging constructive desertion without charging cruelty may be, in effect, making allegations of the character of cruelty which do not amount to cruelty, and, having done that, may come to the court and say: "It is quite true I have made out no case on cruelty, but I have made out a case of constructive desertion, because the conduct of the other side was so bad that in the result there are grave and weighty reasons why I should not be compelled to live with him any longer". But, of course, the real issue is whether the married life has been brought to an end by one party driving the other out, and, if so, whether that desertion has continued for three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition, so that one has always to consider, even if there has been a driving out, what has happened thereafter.

H

The parties were married in 1942, the husband being then thirty-one years of age, and the wife twenty-one years of age. The husband was serving in the Royal Air Force, and the wife stayed with her mother. He was stationed in Yorkshire for some time, and she stayed in Wales because she did not like the accommodation which he was able to offer in Yorkshire, and, according to him, she wanted to save up towards a home. In 1944, when he was moved to Malmesbury and was stationed there, the same situation continued; he was always wanting her to join him, and he was disappointed because she did not, so that the situation became strained between them. She became pregnant, and a child was born in July, 1946. At that time they had become reconciled. During the year 1946 the husband left the Royal Air Force and went back to his work as a civil servant working in Cheltenham. The wife at this time was still with her mother in Wales, and she remained there until January, 1947. During the whole of this time up to and after the time when the husband left the Royal Air Force, he was sending her £12 a month, as the commissioner finds in his judgment, so no question of privation, which is one of the matters alleged, could be said to exist up to that time. She was living of her own choice with her mother, and he was sending her this allowance for herself, and, when the baby came, for herself and the baby. From January, 1947, onwards there were further troubles because he obtained the lease of a house in Cheltenham, and he wanted her to come and live there. There was a dispute. He thought she was unreasonable in not coming, and she thought she had good reason for putting off coming, and, to show the state of tension in March, 1947, I refer to the fact that the husband consulted solicitors, who wrote a letter to the wife saying that the husband had got a house in Cheltenham, that he had repeatedly written asking her to join him with their son, and that, while she was not legally bound to live with her husband, there was a moral obligation on her part to join him at the home which he had provided and to perform her duties as a wife. In the following month the wife, accompanied by her aunt, went with the child to the house. She stayed there until July, 1947, when it was arranged that she should go for a three weeks' holiday with her mother. I refer to that, because in the petition it was pleaded that she was driven away in July, 1947, in particular, by the unkind observation when it was necessary for her to be X-rayed because of chest trouble that he, the husband, would love to see her in a sanatorium and that she was neurotic and not fit to live with him. That allegation fell to the ground, because that was not the position. On Aug. 11, 1947, the husband received from the wife's solicitors a letter, complaining of the unhappy differences which had arisen between them, and complaining of the insufficient money on which she had had to live and the small contribution, namely, £1 a week, which the husband had made towards the maintenance of the home, and complaining of statements that he had made when he had visited her in Wales. On Aug. 14 he replied:

"Thanks for letter of 11.8.47. Most of the statements therein are travesties of the truth and would not be supported by facts that could be ascertained. My wife is aware that I am willing to maintain her at Cheltenham. She was informed last March by my solicitor that I could not keep her if she insisted on living with her mother."

On Aug. 18, 1947, the wife issued a summons in a court of summary jurisdiction on the ground of desertion, and that summons was due to be heard on Aug. 29, 1947. The husband determined to fight the summons. He instructed solicitors to help him, and he was told that the probation officer had been asked to intervene to see if he could effect a reconciliation, and I think the husband was told by the solicitors he must see the probation officer before he attempted to fight the case. The summons was adjourned generally, and never came before the court again, but an order of an interim nature was made directing the husband to make payments for the maintenance of his wife and child until the final determination of the case. The husband resented that, because, he says, he had already written out cheques, and there was no necessity for any order to be made. His attitude throughout was that he had not deserted his wife, and he was not prepared to submit to any order of any sort or kind on that basis. That was his attitude then, and it is so now.

On Oct. 14, 1947, the wife came back for three days and that was the last time that they were together. That return was, no doubt, brought about with the help of the solicitors and the probation officer. The husband described those last few days as pandemonium. They did not settle down again, and on Oct. 17, 1947, the wife left and went back to her mother. The commissioner expressed himself as satisfied that the wife ran from the house because she was terrified of her husband's attitude. After the wife left on Oct. 17 the husband consulted solicitors, and on Oct. 20 a letter, which has not been produced, was written to the wife's solicitors, with a view to the wife returning. On Oct. 21 the wife issued a second summons alleging desertion, and on Oct. 22 the husband's solicitors wrote a letter to the wife's solicitors saying:

"Dear Sir, We have your letter of yesterday's date. The facts as stated therein are not admitted. Our client is anxious that his wife should return to live with him and as she knows the house is open to her. We enclose a cheque from our client in respect of the maintenance of your client and the child, and to assist her in the payment of the travelling expenses."

The letter of Oct. 22 does not appear to have been answered, and the wife's case, as put by her solicitor, was that the husband's conduct during this period in October was such as to show that his expressed wish for the wife to return was not a genuine one.

The wife proceeded with her summons for desertion, which was heard on Dec. 12, 1947, by the justices, and resulted in an order being made in her favour.

The husband said that thereafter, when his wife came for her belongings, he asked her to return, and she refused. That was denied by her. She did not deal with any other specific request which he made to her to return. The commissioner found inferentially, if not expressly, that the husband's requests to the wife to return were not genuine, and, accordingly, he found that the husband had driven the wife from the house, and so was guilty of desertion. In my judgment, that decision cannot stand. The case of driving away made out by the wife was substantially different from that pleaded, both in substance and also in time. There was no evidence of privation, on which the commissioner relied in part. Apart from this, there was no other grave and weighty matter relied on as amounting to constructive desertion unless it consisted of cruelty. No cruelty was alleged in terms, and the serious allegation of threatening to choke the wife was not referred to at all in the petition, and, moreover, there was no corroboration of that charge.

I want to make it as clear as I can that when the case sought to be made is in the nature of a case of cruelty, it is not possible to build up a case of constructive desertion by what is really a case of unproved cruelty. That, of course, does not cover the whole area of constructive desertion, for grave and weighty matters might be alleged which are quite different in kind and quite as serious, if not more serious, than cruelty. One has in mind the well-known case of Russell v. Russell (1), where false charges were made, persisted in, and not withdrawn, or, of course, one can take the simple case of constructive desertion where there is an order or direction by one spouse to the other to leave. If that order is obeyed and the direction is followed and not withdrawn, then, again, desertion may run. This case was never made out on those lines. On that basis the finding cannot stand. If it should be said that there was a case of cruelty, and the matter, although not specifically raised, was dealt with between the parties, and, therefore, that the remedy open to the husband in this court is to obtain an order for a new trial, my answer is that in this case that is not the right way in which to proceed. A serious charge like a charge of cruelty which is, after all, the substantive case which the wife was trying to make, ought to be pleaded as such and dealt with as such, and no injustice could possibly be done to her, because if she has a case of cruelty, any finding of this court that she has not made out a case of desertion does not operate as an estoppel in any cruelty proceedings which she may, if so advised, bring in the future. No charge of cruelty has been disposed of either in the court below or in this court. For these reasons, I think that the appeal should be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: This is yet another case in which the doctrine of constructive desertion has been allowed to run wild. A wife leaves the home, refuses to return to it, and then promptly charges her husband with constructive desertion. He asks her to come back, but she refuses. There are three letters of Aug. 14, 1947, Oct. 20 and 22, 1947, in which he made it clear that he wanted her to return, and she would not. No one can doubt that he was ready to take her back if she returned, but yet he has been held guilty of desertion. Her only justification for not returning is, as she said, his previous conduct. If he had previously treated her with cruelty, so much so that there was a reasonable apprehension of injury to her if she went back, she would, of course, be justified in refusing to go back, but, if his conduct was less than cruelty recognised by law, I do not think she was justified. There may be conduct different from cruelty—not less than it—which gives her reasonable cause for staying away, as in Russell v. Russell ([1895] P. 334), but even such conduct does not automatically make him guilty of desertion. To make the husband guilty of constructive desertion, there must be an intention by him to bring the matrimonial consortium to an end. Any other view would mean that, under the guise of constructive desertion, there would be introduced new heads for divorce not authorised by the statute.

In the circumstances of this case, the husband's conduct was either cruelty or it was not. It was not something different from cruelty. For the wife to justify her refusal to return, the only thing she could rely on would be the husband's cruelty, and in such a case cruelty must be pleaded and proved. Just as in a civil action fraud must be distinctly alleged and as distinctly proved, so in this class of action cruelty must be distinctly alleged and as distinctly proved. In this case the particular allegations which the commissioner sets out in his judgment were not alleged in the petition, and no application to amend was ever made. I do not think the wife should be allowed, in those circumstances, to rely on new charges of cruelty which were never alleged. If her case had been that the request to her to return was not genuine in the sense that the husband never really wanted her to come back, that would be a different matter. In such a case, as we said in Barnard v. Barnard (2), the best way of seeing whether the offer is genuine is for the wife to accept it and see whether the husband will take her in, but the wife did not suggest here that the offer was not genuine in that sense. There is no doubt that the husband wanted her back. She only said she was justified in not going back because of his previous cruelty. That ought to be alleged and proved, and it was not even alleged. Her proper course would be to charge cruelty. It is open to her, no doubt, to bring another petition charging cruelty, but I certainly would not wish to encourage it. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

DICKSON v. FLACK.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Havers, J.), November 11, 12, 13, 17, 18, December 19, 1952.]

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Cutter of vertical spindle moulding machine—
"Most efficient guard—Protection from contact with cutters or from flying broken parts of machine—Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922
(S.R. & O., 1922, No. 1196), reg. 17.

A vertical spindle moulder in a factory was fitted with a Shaw guard. It was found as a fact that, to protect the operator from coming into contact with a cutter when the machine was being operated on a small section of straight wood, a guard of the Shaw guard type was the most effective, but that a cage guard would be more effective to protect him from broken pieces of the machine flying out. If both dangers had to be taken into account, since the former danger was by far the greater, the Shaw guard was the more effective. If the machine was being operated merely to make a test of the balance of the cutters, the danger of the operator coming into contact with the cutters was still very great, whereas the danger of being injured by a fragment of a broken part of the machine was remote. The plaintiff was injured by a piece of the machine which flew out while he was operating it in the defendant's factory to test the balance of the cutters before working on a section of straight wood. In an action by him for damages for breach of statutory duty,

HELD: the object of reg. 17 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, was to prevent an employee from coming into contact with the cutters; therefore, the "most efficient guard" required by the regulation to be provided was the most efficient guard for that purpose having regard to the nature of the work being performed; and, accordingly, the plaintiff had not proved a breach of the regulation.

ACTION for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff was a woodworking machinist of fifty-three years' experience and was employed by the defendant, a builder, being in charge of the joiner's shop occupied by the defendant for the purposes of his building contracts.

E He advised the defendant on the purchase, repair, state and condition of machines and on when any parts required repair or replacement, and he determined what type of machine should be used for particular work and whether any machine was safe to use. The ten or eleven machines in his charge included two vertical spindle moulders, one of which, a re-conditioned machine, was twenty-five to thirty years old and mechanically in a very fair condition.

F The motive power was electric with flat-belt transmission, the power controls being of press-button type and conforming to the regulations. The spindle head piece unit received and carried an interchangeable square cutter block with a groove, dovetail fashion, running lengthways on four sides. The grooves received cutter bolts and were the means, with washers and nuts, of securing the cutter to the block.

G On Mar. 29, 1950, the plaintiff had to set up the machine for the purpose of running a window sill in connection with a shop front, the piece of wood being a straight piece five inches wide, three inches thick and five feet, six inches long. He put two cutters on the cutter block, and, according to his evidence, tightened them up by the nut with a spanner, and started the machine to make a test run in order to ascertain whether the cutters were properly balanced before operating the machine on the wood. While the machine was working a bolt broke, one of the cutters flew off and either a nut or a nut and one portion of the bolt struck the plaintiff in his left eye and injured him. The machine at the time was fitted with a Shaw guard (spring guard (Shaw's patent) as shown in safety pamphlet No. 8, Fencing and other Precautions, Woodworking Machinery, 1928 ed., p. 54, fig. 69, issued by the Home Secretary).

H The plaintiff contended that it was the defendant's duty to provide a safe system of work, inter alia, by guarding the machine in accordance with s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and reg. 17 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, and that he was negligent in providing a machine which was dangerous and defective, in failing to provide a safe machine, in failing to inspect the machine, and in failing to provide an efficient guard to prevent injury to the plaintiff from flying pieces of metal, contrary to the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922. The defendant denied that s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, applied to the machine, and he also denied negligence and any breach of duty under the Act or the regulations, and that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by any such alleged negligence or breach of statutory duty. The defendant died between the date of the issue of the writ and trial and his personal representatives had been substituted as defendants by an amendment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19. HAVERS, J., stated the facts, and, referring to the question of what was an appropriate guard, continued: I have come to the conclusion that the paragraph referred to on p. 7 of the safety pamphlet (Safety Hints on the Use of Woodworking Machinery: Form No. 279, 1947 ed., issued by Ministry of Labour and National Service) represents the true position. It is in these terms:

"Work done on the spindle moulding machine varies so much that no single guard can be relied upon to give the operator security on every job. Many satisfactory guards are available, but the best guard for one job does not necessarily give complete protection for other kinds of work."

That statement seems to me to be amply justified by the evidence which has been called. I find that the type of guard to be used is determined by the particular job which the operator has to perform, and I think it is for this reason that reg. 17 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, does not specifically describe the exact type of guard for vertical spindle moulding machines as it does in the case of similar machines, but uses more general language as follows:

"The cutter of every vertical spindle moulding machine shall when practicable be provided with the most efficient guard having regard to the nature of the work which is being performed."

Regulation 18 provides:

"For such work as cannot be performed with an efficient guard for the cutter, the wood being moulded at a vertical spindle moulding machine, shall, if practicable, be held in a jig or holder of such construction as to reduce as far as possible the risk of accident to the worker."

I find, therefore, that, where a machine of this type is going to operate on a small section of straight wood, the Shaw guard, or a guard of similar type, is the most effective guard, first, because it completely closes the aperture on the operator's side, and, secondly, because it exerts pressure on the wood and enables the operator to keep his hands away. I find also that it is a common practice in the trade to use this type of guard, the Shaw guard, when operating on a small section of straight wood. For curved work, on the other hand, the cage guard would be more suitable and more efficient. The cage guard could be used for a small section of straight wood, but, in my opinion, it would not be so effective.

In making these findings I have considered the effectiveness of the guard solely from the point of view of protecting the operator from coming into contact with a cutter. If, however, I have to consider effectiveness also from

A the point of view of protecting the operator from broken pieces of the machine flying out, then I find as follows. The Shaw guard, for the work which was about to be done, while the most effective guard to protect against what I will call danger 1, i.e., protecting the operator from coming into contact with the cutters, gives little, if any, protection against broken pieces of the machine flying out, which I will describe as danger 2. On the other hand, the cage guard, or a guard of a similar type, while not so effective to protect the operator against danger 1 during the work in question, would, in my view, be more effective to protect him against danger 2. If I have to take both dangers into account and assess the risk from each, I find that danger 1 is a far greater danger than danger 2, and I find that the Shaw guard is most effective for the work which was contemplated. I do not feel able to express any opinion whether any guard would be completely effective to protect the operator from a flying cutter. I do not know what sort of guard would be required to prevent a cutter, fitted in the way these cutters are, from flying off a machine going at 4,500 revolutions a minute. I think a cage guard would give some chance and would protect the operator from flying pieces if a part of the machine broke, such as a nut or a bolt.

C At the time of this accident the machine was not on load. It was merely being operated for a test which was being made for the balance of the cutters. It seems to me that there is little if anything to choose between the Shaw guard and the cage guard in such circumstances. It is not necessary to exert pressure as there is no wood on which the machine is being operated, and this advantage of the Shaw guard over the cage guard, therefore, disappears. From the point of view of convenience, the Shaw guard is more suitable as the operator may require to adjust the cutters, and also, as soon as the test for balance is over, the practice is then to make a test run on the wood, and for that I think the Shaw guard would be the most effective guard. Also, of course, the advantage remains of its completely covering up the aperture on the operator's side. While the machine is running purely for the purpose of making a test of the balance of the cutters, therefore, I am not satisfied that the Shaw guard is not the most effective to protect the operator from coming into contact with the cutters. If, however, I have got to take the possibility of the danger from both the two sources into account, namely, the risk of flying fragments being ejected from the machine and the danger of the operator coming into contact with the cutters, then the danger of the operator coming into contact with the cutters is still very great even if a test for balance only is being made, whereas the danger from being injured by a fragment of a broken part of the machine seems to me to be very remote. For these reasons, I am not satisfied that the Shaw guard is not the most effective guard in the circumstances.

E
F I turn now to consider s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922. In Miller v. William Boothman & Sons, Ltd. (1) the Court of Appeal held that the Woodworking Regulations modified the absolute obligation imposed on the occupier of a factory under s. 14 (1) by substituting a code for the duty under that section. In view of that decision, which, of course, binds me, counsel for the plaintiff conceded that he could not rest his case on s. 14 (1) of the Act, but must rely on the regulation, though he reserved the right to argue that Miller v. William Boothman & Sons, Ltd. (1) was wrongly decided in the event of this case reaching the House of Lords. That case was considered by the House of Lords in a later appeal [Nicholls v. Austin (Leyton), Ltd. (2)], but their Lordships arrived at their conclusion on another ground and expressed neither approval nor disapproval of the decision.

G Hindle v. Birtwistle (3) concerned a flying spindle. The occupier of a cotton factory was summoned under s. 5 (3) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, as amended by s. 6 (2) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891 (by which all dangerous parts of the machinery in a factory must be securely fenced or otherwise rendered safe), for neglecting to fence the shuttles of his looms. It appeared that shuttles occasionally in the process of weaving flew out from the bed on which they slid to and fro (called the shuttle-race) in circumstances which rendered them dangerous to any persons who happened to be in the line of flight. The flying out of the shuttles might be caused by the negligence of the weaver in charge of the machine, or by reason of some foreign substance getting accidentally into the shuttle-race, or by defect in the yarn. It was held that the obligation to fence under the section was not confined to machinery which was dangerous in itself in the ordinary course of careful working, but that the shuttles, even though not in themselves defective, were "dangerous parts of the machinery" if any of the above-mentioned causes of their flying out of the shuttle-race were likely to occur with any degree of frequency. The case came before the Divisional Court on a Case stated by the recorder of Blackburn and WILLS, J., said ([1897] 1 Q.B. 195):

"This case is one of considerable importance, but the enactment seems to be plain and intelligible, and I feel no difficulty in construing it. The learned recorder has supplied us with the keynote of his judgment in one sentence, in which he says that 'the manufacturer is only responsible for machinery which is in itself dangerous in the ordinary course of careful working'. He seems to think that no machinery can be said to be dangerous unless it is dangerous in itself, however carefully worked. I entirely disagree with such an interpretation, and think that it would limit most materially a very beneficial Act of Parliament. It seems to me that machinery or parts of machinery is and are dangerous if in the ordinary course of human affairs danger may be reasonably anticipated from the use of them without protection. No doubt it would be impossible to say that because an accident had happened once therefore the machinery was dangerous. On the other hand, it is equally out of the question to say that machinery cannot be dangerous unless it is so in the course of careful working. In considering whether machinery is dangerous, the contingency of carelessness on the part of the workman in charge of it, and the frequency with which that contingency is likely to arise, are matters that must be taken into consideration. It is entirely a question of degree. As the recorder has not dealt with the matter from that point of view, the case must go back to him for re-consideration."

WRIGHT, J., said (ibid., 196):

"It seems to me that the chances that the workmen will be negligent, that foreign material will get in, or that the yarn may be of bad quality, must all be taken into consideration. The mere fact that the shuttle will sometimes fly out, and that when it flies out it is dangerous, is not enough. It is a question of degree and of fact in all cases whether the tendency to fly out is a tendency to fly out often enough to satisfy a reasonable interpretation of the word 'dangerous'."

Harrison v. Metropolitan Plywood Co. (4) involved the interpretation of reg. 17 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, which I have here to interpret. The headnote reads ([1946] 1 All E.R. 243):

"A part of the blade of a vertical spindle moulding machine, at the defendants' factory, broke away and the plaintiff, who was at work as a press operator at the next machine, was injured by one of the pieces which flew out of the holder. The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants for, inter alia, the alleged breach of their statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 14, and the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, reg. 17, which requires the provision, for that type of machine, of 'the most efficient guard' having regard to the nature of the work being performed.

It was contended on behalf of the defendants (i) that they had complied with the regulations, and (ii) if they had not, the plaintiff had no remedy for breach of the regulations because the provisions of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 14, were ousted by the regulations, which were for the protection only of the worker at a particular machine. The ring guard (said to be the 'usual' form of guard for that type of machine) employed at the time was a guard only against certain dangers to which the worker at the machine would be exposed, and there was a known form of cage guard, the subject of an illustration in a Home Office safety pamphlet, which would have fenced the major part of the circle round the vertical spindle with a wire-mesh screen without interfering with work on the machine:—
Held: (i) the guard employed at the time of the accident was not 'the most efficient guard' and there had been a breach of the regulations. (ii) the modification effected by the regulations was a modification of the standard of fencing and not an elimination of certain classes of workers in the factory from a right to such protection as the modified fencing would afford, and therefore the plaintiff had a right to maintain an action for damages resulting to him from a breach of the statutory regulations."

C HILBERY, J., said (ibid., 246):

"The question that then remains is whether or not the plaintiff has established a breach of these regulations. Regulation 17 requires the provision for the machine in question of the most efficient guard having regard to the nature of the work being performed. It was proved that there was a known form of cage guard which would have fenced the major part of the circumference of a circle round the vertical spindle with a wire-mesh screen, and that the work in hand could have been performed with that guard in position. Such a guard is in fact the subject of an illustration in the safety pamphlet No. 8 issued by the Home Office. It was further clear from the evidence that the so-called ring guard employed at the time was only a guard against certain dangers to which the worker at the machine would be exposed if it were not there; but there was no evidence that it was 'the most efficient guard'. When asked whether it was, the expert called for the defendants replied that it was a 'usual' form of guard for such a machine. On the evidence on balance I think it is just established that the plaintiff probably would not have sustained his injury if the regulation had been complied with."

That case is a direct decision by HILBERY, J., on reg. 17, but it is less helpful than it might be because the point taken by counsel for the defendant here was not taken before HILBERY, J., and, secondly, because when it was delivered the decision of the House of Lords in Nicholls v. Austin (Leyton), Ltd. (2) had not been given.

G The headnote in Nicholls' case (2) reads ([1946] 2 All E.R. 92):

"The appellant, while employed in the respondents' factory at a wood-working machine known as a straight line edger, was injured by a piece or sliver of wood which flew out of the machine and struck her left hand. The machine consisted of a circular saw, fitted on a table and driven by an electric motor. The front edge of the saw was about two feet from the front of the table at which the operator stood. The wood to be worked was conveyed from the front of the table, which was three feet, two inches, from the floor level, towards the cutting edge of the saw, by a mechanical conveyor, driven by a separate gearing, and by rollers which assisted the conveyor. There was a metal hood over the whole of the rollers, conveyors and circular saw. In front of the machine there was a self-adjusting guard in the form of a row of metal fingers, which rested on the top of the ingoing wood. There was a space of about four inches between the bottom edge of the wood and the surface of the table, which might be reduced by the depth of the ingoing slab. At the time of the accident the appellant was engaged in feeding wooden slabs about twelve to fifteen inches long, about nine inches in width and two inches in depth, which were being cut into strips. The appellant's hand was struck by an off-cut from the left hand side of the slab which flew out, probably through the space at the left hand side of the machine between the bottom of the hood and the surface of the table. In an action for damages in respect of personal injuries the main case of the appellant rested on an alleged breach by the respondents of a statutory duty imposed on them by the Factories Act, 1937, s. 14, in that they failed to fence the saw so as to prevent the danger of material which was being operated on being ejected by the machine and causing injury. Alternatively the appellant sought to impose liability on the respondents, at common law, in respect of their negligence in supplying improper plant, by supplying a machine which was dangerous and unsafe. The Secretary of State had made no regulations under the last paragraph of s. 14 requiring the fencing of materials or articles which were dangerous while in motion in the machine:—Held: (i) the obligation imposed by the Factories Act, 1937, s. 14, to fence securely every dangerous part of any machinery was an obligation so to screen or shield the dangerous part as to prevent the body of the operator from coming into contact with it, an obligation which in this case had been amply fulfilled; the obligation did not also extend to fencing the dangerous part so as to prevent any part of the material on which the machine was working from flying off and striking the operator, that matter depending solely on the making of regulations by the Secretary of State under the last paragraph of the section. (ii) there was no evidence of breach by the respondents of their common law duty to the appellant.”

LORD THANKERTON, who delivered the leading opinion, summarised the matter in this way (ibid., 95):

“My Lords, on consideration of the terms of s. 14, I am of opinion that there is a simpler answer to the contention of the appellant, namely, that the obligation to fence imposed by sub-s. (1) is an obligation to provide a guard against contact with any dangerous part of a machine, and that it does not impose any obligation to guard against dangerous materials or articles ejected from the machine in motion, that matter depending solely on the making of regulations by the Secretary of State under the discretionary power conferred on him by the last paragraph of the section. This view appears to be amply confirmed by the language used.”

He deals with the other sub-section and continues (ibid.):

“I will only add that if sub-s. (1) was intended to include fencing against the ejection of materials or articles, I would not expect to have two separate provisions for the making of regulations, or to have the second one in a separate general paragraph at the end of the section, instead of in a sub-section of its own, for the last paragraph of the section is clearly not part of sub-s. (3). It being admitted that no regulations have been made under the last paragraph of s. 14, I am of opinion that there is no obligation imposed by s. 14 upon the respondents as regards these flying bits of wood, and, therefore, they are not in breach of any statutory obligation, and the appellant's main contention fails.”

Then he said that he was not going to express any opinion on Miller's case (1). LORD MACMILLAN came to the same conclusion. He said (ibid., 96):

“They observed and indeed more than observed all the requirements of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations under the Act for the fencing of circular saws. But the fencing did not prevent a fragment of wood flying off while the saw was working. Was it the statutory duty of the respondents so to fence the saw as to prevent this possibility? In my opinion, the statute imposes no such duty."

He referred to the power to make regulations under s. 14 (3), and continued (ibid.):

A "No such regulations have been made and in the absence of any such regulations there is no statutory duty to fence materials or articles which are dangerous while in motion in a machine."

LORD WRIGHT arrived at the same conclusion. LORD SIMONDS said (ibid., 98):

"The fence is intended to keep the worker out, not to keep the machine or its product in."

B Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. (5) was a decision on the interpretation of s. 13 (1) of the Act. The headnote reads ([1948] 2 All E.R. 386):

C "On a true construction of s. 13 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, the words: 'Every part of the transmission machinery shall be securely fenced' mean that every part of the transmission machinery shall be so fenced as to prevent any person employed or working on the premises from moving into contact with it, and not that every part of the transmission machinery shall be so fenced as to protect any person employed or working on the premises from injury due to flying parts of broken machinery. In the course of his duties a machinist, employed by a firm of engineers, operated a lathe in his employers' boiler shop. Immediately in front of the lathe at which he was standing and about 6½ feet away, the motor for driving the main shaft of the shop was placed and over this motor at a height of twenty-five feet the main driving shaft was situated. This shaft was operated from the motor by means of a balata belt, nine inches wide and ¼ inch thick, which ascended on the side remote from the position in which the workman was working, passed over a pulley attached to the driving shaft, and was pulled down on the side nearest to him by the motor. The belt did not ascend vertically, but sloped away at an angle from the spot in which the lathe was fixed. The motor, belt, shaft and pulley formed part of the transmission machinery within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937. There was round the motor a fence five feet high, but between the top of that fence and the overhead driving shaft the belt was unprotected. While the workman was working at his lathe the belt broke, lashed out over the fence, and struck him, causing serious injury:—Held: the employers had not been guilty of a breach of s. 13 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and were not liable to the workman under that sub-section.

F LORD PORTER said (ibid., 390):

G "In my opinion, it is not necessary for your Lordships to consider in respect of any of these cases how far the facts support the decision. The principle is plain. Any risk arising from the working of a dangerous machine must be guarded against under s. 14 and any danger emanating from the working of transmission machinery must likewise be guarded against under s. 13. The working of transmission machinery is deemed to be dangerous; other machines need not be fenced unless they or some part are, in fact, dangerous. But in neither case does the Act aim at protection against breakage. In the present instance it was, no doubt, the duty of the employers to fence the transmission machinery. That part, however, which a workman could enter on was securely fenced and the belt was in such a position as to be as safe as it would be if securely fenced unless it broke. Had it been in such a position that the workman could come into contact with it, it would not have been so safe, and in that case it would have been necessary to fence it. Fencing, in my opinion, means the erection of a barricade to prevent any employee from making contact with the machine, not an enclosure to prevent broken machinery from flying out."

LORD DU PARCQ agreed with the opinion of LORD PORTER and of LORD NORMAND, and added (ibid., 391):

"I wish to add, however, that, while I agree with LORD NORMAND that the words 'securely fenced' must be given the same meaning in each of the three sections (s. 12, s. 13 and s. 14), I think that they may well mean 'so fenced as to give security from such dangers as may be reasonably expected.' If machines exist, or are hereafter invented and used, which are dangerous because fragments or loose parts of the machinery are sometimes ejected from them, then I am not prepared to say that s. 14 does not require such machines to be fenced for the purpose of protecting workmen against that danger. If the dictum of my noble and learned friend LORD SIMONDS in Nicholls v. Austin (Leyton), Ltd. (2) ([1946] 2 All E.R. 92, 98) is to be understood as meaning that such a machine need not be fenced, I respectfully doubt its accuracy, and must reserve my opinion on it."

LORD JOWITT said he did not dissent from the views of the other Law Lords and went on (ibid., 387):

"... I should desire to leave open for further consideration the question which LORD DU PARCQ raises in his opinion."

The decision of HILBERY, J., in Harrison v. Metropolitan Plywood Co. (4) is referred to by several of the learned Law Lords in their opinions, but none of them expressed any opinion as to its correctness because in their view it was a decision on a regulation in different language from the section they were considering. LORD NORMAND took that view. He said (ibid., 393):

"In Harrison v. Metropolitan Plywood Co. (4) the workman, who was injured when a piece of the cutter of a spindle moulding machine broke away, flew out of its holder and struck him, was held entitled to recover damages because the employers had been in breach of an obligation to fence under a regulation the wording of which is not identical with that of the Act. The point taken by the employers in the present case that there is no obligation to fence against parts of a machine which break and fly off was not taken. It is not necessary to consider whether that case was rightly decided, and I have already reserved my opinion on the effect of s. 14 in relation to cases resembling it."

The Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, were made in pursuance of s. 79 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and were preserved by s. 159 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937. They are deemed to be made and have effect as if made under s. 60 (1) of that Act. They apply to certain particular types of machine. "Woodworking machine" is defined in the definitions clause as:

"a circular saw, plain band saw, planing machine, vertical spindle moulding machine or chain mortising machine operating on wood."

The first nine regulations are of a general character applying to all these wood-working machines. Regulation 10 deals with a circular saw and prescribes in detail the way in which a circular saw is to be fenced. Regulation 11 provides that where a circular saw is fed by hand, a suitable push-stick must be kept available. Regulation 12 prescribes with some particularity the way in which a plain band saw is to be guarded. Regulation 13 deals with a planing machine and reg. 15 prescribes the type of guard to be used for a planing machine. Regulation 16 deals with the feed roller of planing machines. In reg. 17 the difference in the language employed is very marked. It does not prescribe in any detail the type of guard which is to be used for a vertical spindle moulding machine. It uses much more general language, as follows:

"The cutter of every vertical spindle moulding machine shall when practicable be provided with the most efficient guard having regard to the nature of the work which is being performed."

A Regulation 18 which I have read, deals with cases where work cannot be performed with an efficient guard for the cutter. Regulation 19 deals with the suitable spike or push-stick for this type of machinery. Regulation 20 deals with the chain of a chain mortising machine, and says that it "shall be provided with a guard which shall enclose the cutters as far as practicable."

B Regulation 21 provides generally that:

"The guards and other appliances required by these regulations shall be maintained in an efficient state and shall be constantly kept in position while the machinery is in motion, except when, owing to the nature of the work being done, the use of the guards or appliances is rendered impracticable. The guards shall be so adjusted as to enable the work to be carried on without unnecessary risk."

Regulation 22 prescribes that:

"Regulations 10, 12, 15 and 16 shall not apply to any woodworking machine in respect of which it can be shown that other safeguards are provided and maintained which render the machine equally safe as it would be if guarded in the manner prescribed by these regulations."

Regulation 23 imposes a duty on the persons employed on the woodworking machines to "use and maintain" these guards and other appliances.

Harrison v. Metropolitan Plywood Co. (4) is the only decision on reg. 17. I pay the greatest respect to the decision of HILBERY, J., and, if the point now taken by counsel for the defendant had been taken before him and he had also had the advantage of reading the subsequent decisions of the House of Lords in Nicholls v. Austin (Leyton), Ltd. (2) and Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. (5), I should have felt inclined to follow him. But, as the point was not taken, the decision is not of the weight which it would otherwise bear, and I feel, therefore, that I am bound to make up my own mind on this question.

To comply with a regulation which specifies in detail the guard which has to be used on a particular machine, it seems clear that that specific guard and nothing else must be provided, subject only to what is said in reg. 22. If, notwithstanding that the specific type of guard is fitted, a fragment or part of a machine flies out and injures the operator, it seems to me that he will have no right of action on the ground of a breach of the regulation. Nor would he under the section because of the decision in Miller v. William Boothman & Sons, Ltd. (1). Where the regulations do not specify in detail the particular guard to be provided, but use more general language, as in reg. 17, viz.:

"that the cutter is to be provided with the most efficient guard having regard to the nature of the work that is being performed," if there is any ambiguity, I think I am entitled to have regard to the general object of s. 14 (1) of the Act as interpreted by the House of Lords. The regulation specifies the cutters as being the part of the machine to be provided with a guard. It does not require either the machine as a whole or the spindle or any other part of it which may throw off a detached or broken part to be provided with a guard. The conclusion, therefore, at which I have arrived is that the object of reg. 17 is to prevent any employee from making contact with the cutters. In considering, therefore, what is the most efficient guard I have to decide what is the most efficient guard for the purpose of preventing any employee from making contact with the cutters, having regard to the nature of the work which is being performed. On that interpretation, and in the light of the facts that I have found, I hold that a breach of reg. 17 has not been proved. It follows also that I am not satisfied that the plaintiff's accident and injury were caused by a breach of that regulation.

[HIS LORDSHIP found on the evidence that the machine was not in a defective condition and that nothing would have been revealed by any inspection of the machine and continued:] The plaintiff has also failed to satisfy me that the defendant did not provide a proper system of working, and in those circumstances I am not satisfied that the defendant was guilty of any negligence at common law or that this accident and the plaintiff's injuries resulted from any such negligence. The action, therefore, fails and there must be judgment for the defendant. [HIS LORDSHIP assessed the damages of the plaintiff at £2,660 13s., and gave judgment for the defendant with costs].

Judgment for the defendant.

SLATER v. SLATER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Morris, L.JJ.), November 11, 12, 13, 14, December 17, 1952.]

Nullity—Approbation of unconsummated marriage—Knowledge of facts and law—Treatment by way of artificial insemination—Adoption of child by spouses.

The parties were married in 1945, but the marriage was never consummated owing to the husband's incapacity. In April, 1949, the wife underwent treatment by way of artificial insemination from a donor other than the husband. In the same month the parties took to live with them a boy aged two years with a view to adopting him. On Aug. 4, 1949, the parties filed in the county court a petition for the adoption of the child, in which it was asserted that the wife was married to the husband in January, 1945, and on Sept. 19, 1949, an adoption order was duly made. On Sept. 16, 1949, the artificial insemination treatment ceased. On Oct. 24, 1949, the wife was admitted to hospital as a voluntary patient suffering from a nervous breakdown. On Nov. 24, 1949, the wife had an interview with the medical superintendent and told him that she was then contemplating "divorcing" her husband for non-consummation. On Nov. 26, 1949, the wife left hospital and returned to her husband. In February, 1950, the wife went on holiday to Gibraltar and returned to the husband in June, 1950. In February, 1951, the wife took legal advice and was informed that, if she could prove the husband's impotence, there was available to her the remedy of a decree of nullity. On the wife's petition for a decree of nullity,

HELD: on Nov. 24, 1949, the wife was aware that the husband was incapable of consummating the marriage, and was aware, though her knowledge was hazy, that the law provided a remedy, but she had not that degree of knowledge before that date, i.e., either during the time of the treatment by way of artificial insemination or at the date of adoption of the child, and, accordingly, neither of those events amounted to approbation of the marriage; there was nothing in the wife's conduct in staying in the matrimonial home after Nov. 24, 1949, whereby she approbated the marriage; and, therefore, she was entitled to a decree.

W. v. W. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 858), distinguished.

Semble: if the wife had had sufficient knowledge of the facts and the law when she had the insemination treatment and adopted the child, either of those events might have amounted to approbation of the marriage.

APPEAL by the wife against an order of KARMINSKI, J., made on July 17, 1952, dismissing her petition for a decree of nullity on the ground that, although the marriage had not been consummated owing to the incapacity of the husband, she had approbated the marriage and was not entitled to the relief sought.

C The parties were married in January, 1945. The husband was then a serving soldier, and, after a short honeymoon, they lived together whenever he had leave, until his demobilisation in 1946. The husband had an accident when a small child which resulted in the failure of the genital organs to develop in the normal way at puberty. Attempts were made to consummate the marriage, but in the spring of 1948, the parties consulted a woman doctor who stated that the wife still bore all the signs of virginity. In November, 1948, the parties started negotiations with the Church of England Children's Society with a view to the adoption of a child, and in April, 1949, they took to live with them a boy aged two years. Also in April, 1949, the wife began a course of treatment, administered by the woman doctor, by way of artificial insemination from a donor other than the husband. On Aug. 4, 1949, the parties filed in the Lambeth County Court a petition, as required by the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, for the adoption of the child who was living with them, and in that petition it was asserted that the wife was married to the husband in January, 1945. On Sept. 16, 1949, the treatment by way of artificial insemination ceased, the wife not having become pregnant. On Sept. 19, 1949, an order was made by the learned judge at Lambeth County Court, allowing the adoption. On Oct. 24, 1949, the wife was admitted to hospital as a voluntary patient, suffering from a nervous disorder. On Nov. 24, 1949, she had an interview with the medical superintendent, and discussed her matrimonial affairs. She told him that she was then contemplating "divorcing" her husband for non-consummation. On Nov. 26, 1949, the wife returned to the husband and there was some discussion between them as to what she called divorce. In February, 1950, the wife went on a holiday to Gibraltar and stayed away until June, 1950. On her return she again suggested a divorce for mental cruelty or non-consummation. In February, 1951, the wife consulted a solicitor who told her that, if she could prove impotence on the part of the husband, there was the remedy of a decree of nullity. In March, 1951, the husband was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment, and from prison he wrote letters imploring her to keep the marriage alive. On July 12, 1951, the wife filed a petition for a decree of nullity on the ground of the husband's incapacity.

KARMINSKI, J., in his judgment, stated that he was satisfied (i) that the marriage had not been consummated, and (ii) that the failure to consummate it was due to the incapacity of the husband, at any rate, in respect of the wife, but, he continued, the real issue was whether or not the wife, by her conduct, had approbated the marriage. On this point the learned judge said he was satisfied that at the time of the interview with the woman doctor in 1948 the wife had full knowledge of the husband's incapacity and that consummation of the marriage by him was virtually impossible, and that, in view of the wife's conversation with the medical superintendent on Nov. 24, 1949, he (HIS LORDSHIP) had come to the conclusion that at any rate by the autumn of 1949 the wife was aware that the husband was incapable of consummating the marriage, and was aware, though her knowledge was hazy, that the law provided an adequate remedy for her if she chose to avail herself of it, but that she deliberately chose to go on living with the husband and the adopted child and to make her life on that basis and on no other. KARMINSKI, J., therefore, held that the wife had approbated the marriage and dismissed her petition. The wife now appealed.

C. N. Shawcross, Q.C., and D. Henderson for the wife.
Ashe Lincoln, Q.C., and T. Dewar for the husband.

Cur. adv. vult.

SINGLETON, L.J., read a judgment in which he said: The wife sought a decree of nullity on the ground that at the time of the ceremony of marriage the husband was, and had ever since been, incapable of consummating the marriage. KARMINSKI, J., was satisfied that incapacity was proved, indeed, there was no dispute on that head, but he arrived at the conclusion that the wife by her actions had approbated the marriage, and that, therefore, she was not entitled to the relief sought. The wife appeals to this court against the decision of the learned judge.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The picture I see is that of a sick woman who had done what she could to make a success of her marriage, but had begun to realise that the position was bad from the point of view of her health, though she was still anxious to do what was right towards the husband and the child whom they had adopted. She knew that the law provided a remedy, though her knowledge was hazy. The marriage had, as the judge said, become unhappy and distasteful to her, and the disgrace of her husband's conviction of dishonesty was the culminating matter which induced her to take the steps she took. It may well be that, but for that dishonesty, she would have put up with the position a little longer. I do not think that that affects the justice of the case. I am unable to find that anything which happened after Nov. 24, 1949, can be said to amount to approbation of the marriage, nor do I think that it ought to be regarded as adding to that which had gone before. It ought not to be counted against the wife that when she came out of hospital after a nervous breakdown she endeavoured to live with her husband, before and after she went to Gibraltar, and to look after the adopted child: see Clifford v. Clifford (1) and the words of TUCKER, L.J. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 397, 398). All the circumstances must be examined to determine whether there has been approbation of the marriage so that it is inequitable or against public policy that the petition should be granted. The matters on which most reliance was placed were the adoption of the child and the artificial insemination treatment of the wife. Both those took place before the wife had knowledge that she had any remedy. So far as I can see, there is nothing which occurred after she had that (somewhat hazy) knowledge which counts either way. True, the judge said:

"She deliberately chose to go on with this particular husband and with the adopted child", but I cannot see that a woman who in such circumstances stays in the matrimonial home must thereby be said to have approbated the marriage. There is nothing in her conduct after Nov. 24, 1949, which makes it inequitable that she should be granted relief.

A In the course of a judgment delivered in Tindall v. Tindall (2) I read some passages from the speeches in G. v. M. (3). No good purpose would be served by repeating those citations here. It is sufficient to say that LORD SELBORNE, L.C., made it clear that before there can be approbation which would deprive a petitioner of the remedy which he, or she, otherwise would have, there must be knowledge of the facts and of the law. In W. v. W. (4) SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., JENKINS, L.J., and HODSON, L.J., all refer to and lay emphasis on that factor. The petitioner in that case was a meteorologist and an officer in the Royal Air Force. After he realised his wife's incapacity to consummate the marriage, there had been, on his suggestion, the adoption of two children, the first of which had died before the adoption of the second. The court was of opinion that the petitioner knew both the facts and the law, and that, in view of all the circumstances, there was approbation of the marriage, and the petitioner was held not to be entitled to a decree of nullity. That decision is binding on us. It was submitted, however, that the present case is distinguishable in that there is a finding by the judge that the petitioner did not know the law at the time of the adoption of the child. This may be thought to be a fine, or a subtle, distinction, but, none the less, it is a real one. If, as the judge found, the wife did not know that she had a remedy for the wrong done to her, the adoption of the child did not amount to approbation of the marriage, nor had anything else up to November, 1949, any such effect. That which happened afterwards must be looked at in view of what had gone before, but, even so, I do not regard it as giving ground for refusal of relief. There are few reported cases in which it has been held that the petitioner in a nullity suit was deprived of the relief which might have been granted to her because of the doctrine of approbation. I do not think that this is such a case. B KARMINSKI, J., took great trouble, and he set out his findings of fact admirably. It would appear that he felt he must decide in the way he did because of the decision in W. v. W. (4), but, in my opinion, this case is, on its facts, distinguishable from that case. I do not consider that approbation of the marriage on the part of the wife was shown. I would allow the appeal and grant to the wife the decree which she seeks.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I have had the opportunity of reading and considering the judgment of my Lord which has just been delivered. It contains all that I would have wished to say for myself, both on the facts of the case and the law which is applicable thereto, and, recognising, as I do, the importance of the decision and yet feeling that the judgment of my Lord so completely covers all the material matters, I do not desire to add a separate judgment of my own. I am, therefore, content to say that I am entirely of the same opinion, and, in my view, this appeal should be allowed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I also have had an opportunity of reading and considering the judgment which SINGLETON, L.J., has delivered, and I am in full agreement with it.

Appeal allowed. Decree nisi in favour of the wife.

BECKETT v. NEWALLS INSULATION CO., LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton and Morris, L.JJ.), November 27, 28, December 1, 1952.]

Negligence—Dangerous goods—Gas—Cylinder introduced into ship by contractor—Leakage—Explosion—Liability of contractor.

The plaintiff was a plasterer's labourer employed by an insulation company. In May, 1950, the insulation company were doing some plastering in a ship in which a refrigeration company were constructing refrigeration chambers. For use in their work the refrigeration company took into the ship a cylinder containing calor gas. On the cylinder were a valve and a regulator, and, if either of them was securely shut, no gas could escape. If a mixture of the gas and the right proportion of air came into contact with a naked flame, it was likely to explode. On the evening of Friday, May 26, when the refrigeration company's men ceased work, their foreman put the cylinder in the outer room of the refrigeration chambers. The refrigeration company's men were not returning to the ship until the following Tuesday, but their foreman knew that the insulation company's men would be working there during the week-end. On Saturday and Sunday the plaintiff and E., another workman employed by the insulation company, did plastering work in the refrigeration chambers. On Sunday, after they had finished their work in the inner room, they started on the outer room, and, finding the cylinder in the way, E. moved it into the inner room. On Monday no work was done in the ship. On Tuesday morning, when the plaintiff went to continue his work in the refrigeration chambers, he found them in darkness as the electric light bulbs had been removed. Thinking that there might be a bulb in the inner room, he went into it and lit a match. There was an explosion owing to an escape of gas from the cylinder, and he was injured. The cylinder was not damaged and it was not known how the gas escaped. There was no negligence on the part of E. when he moved the cylinder. ✓

HELD: the refrigeration company, having taken into the ship an article which was so constructed that gas might escape from it if the regulator or valve were not securely turned, were under a duty to take special precautions; their foreman, in leaving the gas cylinder in the refrigeration chamber when he knew that other persons might be working there and that the cylinder might have to be moved, and in giving no warning of the danger of moving it and no instructions how it should be moved, did not take the care which a reasonable man would have taken in the circumstances; and, therefore, the refrigeration company were responsible for the explosion and were liable to the plaintiff in damages. ✓

B APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of STABLE, J., dated June 9, 1952, in an action for damages for negligence.

The plaintiff, who was twenty years of age at the time of the accident, was a plasterer's labourer employed by the first defendants, Newalls Insulation Co., Ltd. (referred to hereafter as the insulation company). In May, 1950, the second defendants, Lightfoot Refrigeration Co., Ltd. (referred to hereafter as the refrigeration company) were installing refrigeration insulation in a ship, the Gyrotoma, which was being fitted out at Sunderland, and the insulation company were doing some plastering work in the chambers of the ship in which the refrigeration insulation was in course of construction. For the purpose of their work, the refrigeration company's workmen took into the ship a cylinder containing calor gas which they used for brazing. According to the evidence, this was the safest kind of gas, but it was likely to explode if a mixture of the gas and the right proportion of air came into contact with a naked flame. On top of the cylinder was a valve which, if it was securely turned, would stop any escape of gas. When required for use, the gas passed through a regulator into a cable which was attached to the container. If the regulator was properly adjusted there could be no escape of gas even if the valve were open. The valve could be covered by a cap, which screwed on tightly and on the top of which was a handle by means of which the cylinder could be carried. If the cap was on, the regulator was taken off the cylinder. According to the evidence, there was no cap on the valve when the cylinder was taken into the ship.

The refrigeration chambers consisted of two rooms, the outer being the vegetable room and the inner the meat room. The dimensions of the meat room were nine feet six inches by six feet, it was about six feet high, and the only door to it was from the vegetable room. On the evening of Friday, May 26, 1950, when the refrigeration company's men ceased work, Spencer, their foreman engineer, took the cable off the cylinder and put the cylinder, with their other tackle, in a corner of the vegetable room. It being the Whitsun week-end, the refrigeration company's men were not returning to the ship till Tuesday morning, but Spencer knew that the insulation company's men would be working there during the week-end. On Saturday and Sunday the plaintiff and one Edmunds, who was also employed by the insulation company and was senior to the plaintiff, were working on the plastering in the refrigeration chambers. By about noon on Sunday they had finished their work in the meat room and started in the vegetable room. Finding that the tackle left by the refrigeration company's men was in their way, Edmunds moved it into the meat room. No work was done in the refrigeration chambers on Monday. On Tuesday, when the plaintiff went to continue his work, the refrigeration chambers were in darkness as the electric light bulbs had been removed on Saturday, and he and Edmunds had used candles on Sunday. Thinking that there might be some bulbs in the meat room, he went into it, and, as it was completely dark there, he struck a match. There was an explosion owing to an escape of gas from the cylinder, the plaintiff was blown into the vegetable room and was severely burnt. The cylinder was not damaged in the explosion and there was no evidence how the gas escaped.

In an action against both defendants the plaintiff alleged that the insulation company were negligent in the way Edmunds handled the gas cylinder, and, alternatively, that the refrigeration company were negligent in that, inter alia, (a) they left the cylinder in the chamber in a defective and dangerous condition so that gas might escape from it, (b) they left it where it might have to be handled by others with the valve exposed and without a proper protective cap or other locking device fitted on it so that anyone handling it would be likely to take hold of the valve itself and turn it with the result that gas would be permitted to escape, and (c) they failed to give any adequate warning of the danger of taking hold of the valve to other persons who might have occasion to handle or approach the cylinder. By their defence the insulation company denied negligence and alleged that the accident was caused, or contributed to, by the negligence of the refrigeration company. The refrigeration company also denied negligence and alleged that the accident was caused by the negligence of the plaintiff and Edmunds in the way in which they had handled the cylinder. STABLE, J., held that no case was proved against either of the defendants and dismissed the action. At the request of counsel, he provisionally assessed the damages to which the plaintiff would have been entitled, had he succeeded, at £615. The plaintiff appealed from the decision of the learned judge. By consent of the parties the appeal was heard by two lords justices only.

Veale, Q.C., and J. H. Robson for the plaintiff.

Hylton-Foster, Q.C., and Waller for the first defendants, Newalls Insulation Co., Ltd.

Marven Everett, Q.C., and N. Harper for the second defendants, Lightfoot Refrigeration Co., Ltd.

SINGLETON, L.J., stated the facts, and said: The case for the plaintiff, as put forward in this court, was that the second defendants, the refrigeration company, were dealing with something of a dangerous character, to wit, gas, and they did not use sufficient care in the way they left the container. Counsel for the plaintiff referred us to some words of LORD WRIGHT in Northwestern Utilities, Ltd. v. London Guarantee & Accident Co., Ltd. (1), where the learned Law Lord dealt with dangerous things in general, and said ([1936] A.C. 118):

"That gas is a dangerous thing within the rules applicable to things dangerous in themselves is beyond question. Thus the appellants who are carrying in their mains the inflammable and explosive gas are prima facie within the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (2), affirming Fletcher v. Rylands (2): that is to say, that though they are doing nothing wrongful in carrying the dangerous thing so long as they keep it in their pipes, they come prima facie within the rule of strict liability if the gas escapes: the gas constitutes an extraordinary danger created by the appellants for their own purposes, and the rule established by Rylands v. Fletcher (2) requires that they act at their peril and must pay for damage caused by the gas if it escapes, even without any negligence on their part. The rule is not limited to cases where the defendant has been carrying or accumulating the dangerous thing on his own land: it applies equally in a case like the present where the appellants were carrying the gas in mains laid in the property of the city (that is in the sub-soil) in exercise of a franchise to do so: Charing Cross Electricity Supply Co. v. Hydraulic Power Co. (3)."

LORD WRIGHT repeated the question put by LORD DUNEDIN ([1909] A.C. 647) in Dominion Natural Gas Co., Ltd. v. Collins & Perkins (4):

"... have the defendants been able to show affirmatively that the true cause of the accident was the conscious act of another volition, i.e., the tampering with the machines by the railway company's workmen?"

and went on to say ([1936] A.C. 120):

"It is not here intended to enumerate all the defences which might be available to a defendant in this class of action: but the two defences mentioned are both material in this case."

A [HIS LORDSHIP read passages from the judgment of STABLE, J., and referred, in particular, to a passage where the learned judge said: "I think it is imposing a fantastic standard to say that the regulator should have been dismantled and a cap fitted over the tap [of the cylinder]," and continued:] With all respect to the judge, I think that that must depend on whether or not it is easy for the tap or for the regulator, or for both, to be moved inadvertently when one is moving the container. STABLE, J., went on to say:

B "After all, that would not have obviated the possibility of trouble. To have completely obviated the possibility of trouble, the cylinder would have had to have been locked up somewhere where nobody could have touched it. Having regard to the evidence that these cylinders are in universal use in private houses, in caravans, and in motor boats all over the country, and that domestic gas is a feature of a vast number of dwellings, with switches, which let the supply of gas off and on, exposed C to a mischievous or inadvertent act, to hold that a duty is imposed, in relation to one of these cylinders, to put it where nobody can possibly get at it would be stating the duty too highly. In my view, it was a perfectly reasonable thing to leave the cylinder where it was ready for use when the men came to work on the Tuesday, with the gas properly and effectively turned off."

D That, again, I venture to point out, must depend on the risk involved in the legitimate moving of the container itself. In regard to Edmund's responsibility for the explosion, STABLE, J., said:

E "It is, I think, agreed (and, if it is not agreed, I am perfectly satisfied) that Mr. Edmunds, in removing the cylinder from the floor of this chamber where they were going to work . . . was acting perfectly properly, and nobody could have suggested that he was not. It is possible that in shifting this cylinder he may—I say 'he may'—have inadvertently twisted the tap and perhaps the regulator—although it is extremely difficult to see how he could twist the regulator inadvertently—and brought about an escape of gas."

F I agree with the learned judge that it is extremely difficult to see how anyone moving the container (which is not a very big thing) could inadvertently turn on the tap and also move the regulator so that it was in a position to allow the escape of gas. For both things to have happened inadvertently seems to me to amount almost to an impossibility.

G Counsel for the plaintiff referred to the words of LORD MACMILLAN in M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson (5), as showing that in circumstances of this kind the persons who placed the dangerous gas there were practically subject to a guarantee of safety. He also referred us to the words of GODDARD, L.J. ([1939] 3 All E.R. 53) in Hanson v. Wearmouth Coal Co., Ltd. & Sunderland Gas Co. (6) and of TUCKER, L.J. ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1061) in Ball v. London County Council (7). The judgment of STABLE, J., amounts to this. Here is a man who, at his place H of work, suffers an accident of a most unusual kind, an accident which, prima facie, would not have happened without someone's negligence. The learned judge found that there was no negligence on the part of Edmunds, the only person who is said to have moved the container after it was placed in the vegetable room by the refrigeration company's foreman. He said that Edmunds might have moved the tap, and, perhaps, the regulator, inadvertently, though it was extremely difficult to see how he could twist the regulator inadvertently, and he, the judge, was by no means satisfied that Edmunds had done so.

He found, too, that, when dealing with a cylinder containing calor gas, what the refrigeration company's foreman did was quite reasonable, that it was imposing a fantastic standard to say that the regulator should have been dismantled and a cap fitted over the tap, and that it was a perfectly reasonable thing to leave the cylinder, with the gas properly and effectively turned off, where it was ready for use when the men came to work on Tuesday. I think, from that, it follows that the judge found that the gas was properly and effectively turned off. If all those findings are right, it is extraordinarily difficult, if not impossible, to understand how this accident came about. There was no suggestion that any other persons went to that part of the ship at the week-end, and no allegation of any unauthorised interference by any party outside. Therefore, one is faced, on the findings, with an accident of such a kind that one would think it was quite impossible it could happen if the container were in order and if the gas were properly turned off by the valve and the regulator, and in the absence of any interference with either.

It is necessary to consider the case somewhat closely, and in so doing I bear in mind the submissions made to us by counsel for the refrigeration company. In asking the court to uphold the judgment of STABLE, J., he referred us to the words of LORD MOULTON ([1913] A.C. 282) in Rickards v. Lothian (8), and to what was said in the House of Lords in Read v. J. Lyons & Co., Ltd. (9). In Read v. J. Lyons & Co., Ltd. (9) there was no allegation of negligence, but counsel for the refrigeration company used the report to draw our attention to the submissions of Sir Hartley Shawcross, then Attorney-General, who appeared for the respondents in that case. The following passage from the argument appears to me to summarise the law neatly and accurately:

"This case is not within the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher (2), which is really founded on the idea that the defendant did what he should not have done. It depends on negligence, though the greater the danger, the greater the care required of him. In the authorities the application of the standard of things called dangerous in themselves has no logic about it. The same thing has been held dangerous in itself in some circumstances but not in others: see SALMOND'S LAW OF TORTS, 10th ed., p. 518. The true question is not whether a thing is dangerous in itself but whether, by reason of some extraneous circumstances it may become dangerous. There is really no category of dangerous things; there are only some things which require more and some which require less care . . ."

That argument is in much the same terms as the opening paragraph of ch. XXI of WINFIELD ON THE LAW OF TORT, 5th ed. (p. 543), a chapter on dangerous chattels, where the learned author says:

"There is no doubt that the law as to liability for dangerous chattels is treated in legal literature and practice as a separate compartment of the law of tort, but it is not easy to explain why it is so or in what respect it is a species of 'strict' liability. In theory the law of negligence as a tort might be regarded as adequate to cover it. It is true that the law expects of a man a great deal more care in carrying a pound of dynamite than a pound of butter, or in keeping a bottle of poison than a bottle of lemonade. But that is only another way of saying that what is a reasonable amount of care in one set of circumstances is not so in another set of circumstances, and reasonable care is the sole test of negligence. And, passing to the decided cases of dangerous chattels, we have been unable to trace anything in the reports that is inconsistent with the view that the law of negligence is all that is needful for the purpose."

The learned author then refers to Dixon v. Bell (10) and sets out the words of LORD DUNEDIN ([1909] A.C. 646) in Dominion Natural Gas Co., Ltd. v. Collins & Perkins (4).

I propose to consider this case purely on the allegation of negligence which is made against the refrigeration company. I do not think that any case was proved against the insulation company. It was not argued in this court that there was any negligence on the part of the plaintiff himself. The only other employee of the insulation company who was concerned was Edmunds. There was no negligence on his part and none on the part of his employers. The case against the refrigeration company is different. They introduced on to the premises a cylinder containing calor gas which, if it escaped, might bring about an explosion, as it did. They left it on Friday night without any cap covering the valve. Their foreman, Spencer, removed the cable, and, according to his evidence, saw that the regulator was set right and that the tap was turned off, a practice which, he said, he had always followed. The contention of the refrigeration company was that the escape of gas was due to some interference. They did not suggest that there was any interference from outside, but they now seek to say that the escape was caused either by the act of Edmunds or in some other way which is left unexplained. Counsel for the refrigeration company said that the insulation company might be responsible, or, possibly, both the companies might be liable, in that it must have been the act of Edmunds that brought about this escape of gas.

I cannot see that on the evidence. Furthermore, the degree of care required from the refrigeration company, who introduced the gas cylinder, is to be measured by the danger involved in that which they brought into the ship. The law expects of a man a great deal more care in carrying a pound of dynamite than a pound of butter. The law expects greater care if there is introduced on to an enclosed space in a ship a cylinder containing gas which may escape if precautions are not taken. One precaution that could have been taken was to put on the cap, and, if that had been done, no movement of the cylinder would have interfered with the valve. Another precaution which might have been taken would have been to leave the cylinder in a safe place. The refrigeration company's foreman knew that the insulation company's men would be working in the ship during the week-end, but he left the cylinder in the vegetable room, not considering whether the men might be working there, or whether it would be necessary for them to move it. In the circumstances it would have been reasonable to inquire whether anyone was going to work there. If by the mere movement of the cylinder there was a chance that something in the apparatus might be moved so that there could be an escape of gas, it would have been reasonable to warn people not to touch or move it. If an article is so constructed that, when it is moved, a regulator, or valve can be affected so that an escape of gas may occur, it seems to me that the person who puts that article in a position where it may have to be moved, and does not give any warning of the danger of moving it, or of how it should be moved, is not exercising the care which he ought to exercise in regard to such an article. Negligence is a failure to take that care which a reasonable man would take in the circumstances. A reasonable man who has to leave something of that kind must take more care than Spencer, the refrigeration company's foreman, took. In my judgment, the refrigeration company did not take the care which they ought to have done in the circumstances, and, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages against them. I would allow this appeal and enter judgment for the plaintiff against the refrigeration company for the sum of £615 provisionally assessed by the learned judge.

MORRIS, L.J.: I have reached the same conclusion. In approaching this case it is necessary to have in mind the nature of the article with which the inquiry is concerned, the place where the article was left, the time and date when it was left, and all the other relevant circumstances. In his speech in Read v. J. Lyons & Co., Ltd. (9), LORD MACMILLAN said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 476):

"In an address characterised by much painstaking research counsel for the appellant sought to convince your Lordships that there is a category of things and operations dangerous in themselves and that those who harbour such things or carry on such operations in their premises are liable apart from negligence for any personal injuries occasioned by these dangerous things or operations. I think that he succeeded in showing that in the case of dangerous things and operations the law has recognised that a special responsibility exists to take care, but I do not think that it has ever been laid down that there is absolute liability apart from negligence where persons are injured in consequence of the use of such things or the conduct of such operations. In truth it is a matter of degree. Every activity in which man engages is fraught with some possible element of danger to others. Experience shows that even from acts apparently innocuous injury to others may result. The more dangerous the act the greater is the care that must be taken in performing it. This relates itself to the principle in the modern law of torts that liability exists only for consequences which a reasonable man would have foreseen. One who engages in obviously dangerous operations must be taken to know that if he does not take special precautions injury to others may very well result."

The evidence showed that, if there were an escape from the container, there might be an explosive mixture of air and gas, and, if someone struck a match when the gas was leaking into the air, it would explode if there was an explosive mixture. The explosive mixture was a range between 1.8 and 8.41 per cent. calor gas to air. That was the nature of the gas which might escape from the cylinder which was left by Spencer, the refrigeration company's foreman, in the vegetable room. It is important also to see the dimensions of that place. The approach to the meat room is from the vegetable room. The inner dimensions of the meat room appear to be nine feet six inches by about six feet, and the height of the chamber is some six feet. There was a door leading from that inner meat room to the vegetable room, and then a door from the vegetable room which led to the outside air. When the plaintiff went on Tuesday morning he found the door of the vegetable room closed. There appears to have been no evidence whether the door between the vegetable room and the meat room was closed. The next circumstance is the time when Spencer left the calor gas cylinder. He left it on the Friday, with knowledge that he would not be returning until Tuesday and that others would be working there on Saturday and Sunday. In the circumstances, it seems to me that Spencer was leaving an article from which gas might escape if the tap was not fully turned. He was leaving it in a confined space, knowing that others would be there on later days, that there would be an interval before anyone came, and that it might be necessary for it to be moved. There is nothing to suggest that Edmunds did anything wrong in moving the cylinder, and, therefore, he was not guilty of any negligent act. I cannot see any sufficient or satisfactory evidence that any unauthorised person was present in the ship. That matter rests really on theory or speculation.

Having regard to all those features of the case, and there being the undoubted fact that there was at some time an escape of gas, and that, when the plaintiff went on the Tuesday morning to the inner chamber, the meat room, he acted without any negligence, any suggestion of contributory negligence on his part having been withdrawn during the hearing, the question arises whether it is shown that there was negligence on the part of someone for whom the refrigeration company are responsible. It is plain that Spencer could have done things in a different way. He might have moved the cylinder altogether from the chamber and placed it in some store. That was, perhaps, a course that would not have occurred to him, and I am not saying that it was one that should necessarily have been adopted. He certainly might have put the cap on it. He says that no cap was supplied to him, but those who employed him could have supplied a cap for fitting on the cylinder. In my judgment, the refrigeration company are responsible, as the evidence leads me to the conclusion that either there was some escape of gas from the Friday afternoon onwards, or that the cylinder was left in such a state that when it was moved, and necessarily moved by someone who moved it without negligence, it would thereafter be in a condition in which there would or might be an escape of gas. On that basis, in my judgment, the facts lead to the conclusion that there was no liability in the insulation company, but that there was liability in the refrigeration company. I, therefore, agree that the appeal must be allowed to the extent mentioned by my Lord.

Appeal allowed against the second defendants.

GETREIDE-IMPORT-GESELLSCHAFT m.b.H. v. CONTIMAR S. A. COMPANIA INDUSTRIAL COMERCIAL Y-MARITIMA.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.), December 11, 12, 1952.]

Arbitration—Ouster of jurisdiction of court—Term of contract that award condition precedent to proceedings—Dispute as to right of appeal against award—Action for declaration as to right—Competency—Service of notice of appeal—London Corn Trade Association contract—Foreign party “considered as ordinarily resident” in London—Validity of service at office abroad—Power of court to order provision making award condition precedent to bringing action to be of no effect—Exercise of discretion—Arbitration Act, 1950 (c. 27), s. 25 (4).

A contract for the sale of goods incorporated the terms of a London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., standard form of contract, which required all disputes arising out of the contract to be referred to arbitration, prohibited the bringing of any action in respect of any such dispute until it had been settled by arbitrators, or, on appeal, by the committee of appeal, and made the obtaining of an award “a condition precedent to the right of either contracting party to sue the other in respect of any claim arising out of this contract”. Notice of appeal against an award was required to be given to the secretary of the association and to the other party to the dispute within fourteen consecutive days from the date of the award. Notices were required “to be given in writing, and sent by post to, or left at, the place where the person, firm, or company to whom they are addressed is carrying on or (by reason of the provisions of the contract) is to be considered as carrying on business, and shall be deemed to have been received not later than twenty-four hours after the same are so sent or left.” Another clause, under which for the purpose of proceedings the making and performance of the contract were deemed to be in England and exclusive jurisdiction as to disputes was conferred on English courts and arbitrators appointed in England (except as to the enforcement of an award), provided that any party “residing or carrying on business elsewhere than in England or Wales, shall, for the purposes of proceedings at law or in arbitration, be considered as ordinarily resident or carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd.”

On Aug. 11, 1952, the sellers of the goods, against whom an award on an arbitration under the contract had been made on July 30, 1952, sent notice claiming an appeal against the award to the association, who notified the buyers at their head office in Duisburg, Germany, by a letter which was received by the buyers on Aug. 13. On Aug. 12 the sellers posted notice that the appeal had been claimed to the buyers at their branch office at Frankfurt-am-Main, but in error addressed it to "Friedrich-Ebert-Strasse 27, Frankfurt A.M." instead of to "Niedenau 59, Frankfurt," and the notice was not delivered until after Aug. 13. In an action by the buyers for a declaration that the award was valid and subsisting and final and conclusive and that the sellers had no right to appeal, HELD: (i) (a) although, if addressed simply to the buyers at Frankfurt-am-Main, the sellers' notice of the appeal to them, being posted more than twenty-four hours before the expiration of the time for appeal, would have been valid under the clause deeming it to have been received within twenty-four hours, that clause validated only a notice sent with the proper address and not one with an address so misleading that the chances of receiving it in the ordinary course of post were remote, and, therefore, the notice was out of time; (b) in sending the notification of the appeal to the buyers the secretary of the association was not acting as agent for the sellers; but (c) the rule that the buyers were to be considered as carrying on business at the association's office in England allowed, but did not require, notices given to them to be served at that office and was a provision for the benefit of a party serving notice of which he need not avail himself, and, therefore, a notice served directly at the office of the buyers abroad, if otherwise good, would have been valid.

(ii) the action was brought in substance to enforce the award, which was, not something arising out of the contract, but something resulting from the arbitration proceedings, and, therefore, the obtaining of an award on the issue of the sellers' right to appeal was not a condition precedent to the bringing of the action and the court was not precluded from granting a declaration that there was no right of appeal.

(iii) if the effect of the contract had been that an award was a condition precedent to the bringing of the action, in all the circumstances the court, if it had power to do so in the exercise of its discretion under s. 25 (4) of the Arbitration Act, 1950, would order that condition to cease to have effect.

(iv) the sellers, therefore, had failed to comply with a condition as to serving notice of appeal and were not entitled to prosecute the appeal.

ACTION for declarations and an injunction.

The plaintiffs carried on business at Duisburg, Germany, with a branch office at Frankfurt-am-Main, and the defendants carried on business at Buenos Aires. On Nov. 17, 1950, through the agency of one Franz Hagen, in Hamburg, acting for the two parties, the plaintiffs, as buyers, and the defendants, as sellers, entered into a contract for the sale of a quantity of River Plate wheat. The contract was made subject to the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., contract No. 41, rye terms, London arbitration, which contained the following terms:

A (A) "Buyer and seller agree that, for the purpose of proceedings, either legal or by arbitration, this contract shall be deemed to have been made in England, and to be performed there, any correspondence in reference to the offer, the acceptance, the place of payment or otherwise notwithstanding, and the courts of England or arbitrators appointed in England, as the case may be, shall, except for the purpose of enforcing any award made in pursuance of the arbitration clause hereof, have exclusive jurisdiction over all disputes which may arise under this contract. Such disputes B shall be settled according to the law of England whatever the domicile, residence, or place of business of the parties to this contract may be or become. Any party to this contract residing or carrying on business elsewhere than in England or Wales, shall, for the purposes of proceedings at law or in arbitration, be considered as ordinarily resident or carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., and C if in Scotland, he shall be held to have prorogated jurisdiction against himself to the English courts, or if in Northern Ireland to have submitted to the jurisdiction, and to be bound by the decision of the English courts".

D (B) "All disputes from time to time arising out of this contract, including any question of law appearing in the proceedings, whether arising between the parties hereto, or between one of the parties hereto and the trustee in bankruptcy of the other party, shall be referred to arbitration, according to the arbitration rule indorsed hereon, and this stipulation may be a rule of any of the Divisions of His Majesty's High Court of Justice in Northern Ireland, on the application of either contracting party, for the purpose of enforcing an award against a party residing or carrying on business in Northern Ireland. Neither buyer, seller, trustee in bankruptcy, nor any E other person claiming under either of them, shall bring any action against the other of them in respect of any such dispute until such dispute has been settled by arbitrators, or by the committee of appeal, as the case may be, and it is expressly agreed that the obtaining an award from either tribunal, as the case may be, shall be a condition precedent to the right of either contracting party to sue the other in respect of any claim arising F out of this contract . . . The arbitration to be held in London".

G (C) "In case any party to an award shall be dissatisfied with the award a right of appeal shall lie to the committee of appeal elected for that purpose in accordance with the rules and regulations of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., in force at the date of the contract, provided the following conditions are complied with . . . (b) Notice claiming appeal is given to the secretary of the association within fourteen consecutive days from the date of the award . . . (c) Within the said fourteen consecutive days, notice that the appeal has been claimed is given by the appellant direct to his seller or buyer, as the case may be".

A further clause of the rule provided:

H (D) "Notices under this rule to be given in writing, and sent by post to, or left at, the place where the person, firm, or company to whom they are addressed is carrying on or (by reason of the provisions of the contract) is to be considered as carrying on business, and shall be deemed to have been received not later than twenty-four hours after the same are so sent or left."

A claim made by the buyers against the sellers in respect of the performance of the contract was submitted to arbitration. The arbitrators disagreed and appointed an umpire, and on July 30, 1952, the umpire made his award, finding the sellers in default under the contract and granting the buyers a substantial sum by way of damages. On Aug. 11, in pursuance of their right of appeal under the contract, the sellers, through their agents, Joseph Pyke & Sons (Liverpool), Ltd., notified the secretary of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., by letter that they claimed an appeal against the award and enclosed the appropriate amount for the fees of the appeal. On Aug. 12 the secretary of the association sent a letter to the buyers at Duisburg, notifying them and giving particulars of the appeal. The buyers received that letter on Aug. 13. On Aug. 12 the sellers sent from Buenos Aires to the buyers at Frankfurt-am-Main a letter notifying them that the sellers had, on Aug. 11, given notice of appeal against the award to the association. Owing to confusion of the name of the buyers with that of another company, the letter was addressed to the buyers at "Friedrich-Ebert-Strasse 27, Frankfurt A.M." instead of "Niedenau 59, Frankfurt A.M.", and, in consequence, it did not reach them at their Frankfurt or Duisburg office until after the time had expired for giving notice of appeal under the contract. A

The buyers claimed a declaration that the award was valid and final and conclusive as between the parties, that the sellers had no right to prosecute an appeal from the award, and that the appeal committee had no power to hear or entertain any such appeal or to vary or reverse the award. They also claimed an injunction which in the event was not asked for. They contended that the notice of the appeal sent by the sellers to them was not addressed to any address at which they carried on or were considered to be carrying on business and was not received within the correct time, and that it should have been sent to the office of the association at which the buyers were deemed to carry on business under cl. (A) of the terms incorporated in the contract. The sellers submitted that under cl. (D) the notice was deemed to be received not later than twenty-four hours after being sent, and, therefore, it was received within the fourteen days of the award; that the notification sent by the secretary of the association to the buyers was a valid notice sent on their behalf; and that the right to maintain the action was excluded by cl. (B), under which the dispute as to the right of appeal should first have been the subject of an award. The buyers denied that cl. (B) applied, contending that this dispute did not arise out of the contract, and, since it related to matters of jurisdiction, was within the jurisdiction of the court, and they asked, alternatively, for the clause to be ordered to cease to have effect for the purpose of the dispute under s. 25 (4) of the Arbitration Act, 1950. B C D E F

SELLERS, J., stated the facts, said that, the question submitted to arbitration not being one of law which could be referred to the court, but one on the merits relating to the contract of sale, the right of appeal from the award arose only from the contract, and continued: The question arises of the combined effect of rules (A), (B), (C) (c), and (D) on the time within which the notice had to be given. The provision that the notice shall be deemed to have been received not later than twenty-four hours after it was sent or left is not without its ambiguities and difficulties. To be effective, the notice should have been actually received by the buyers within the fourteen days of the date of the award specified, i.e., as I think it was agreed and I certainly find, before midnight of Aug. 13. If it was left instead of being posted, one would have thought that it could have been left at any time up to midnight. If it was posted, the provision would seem to indicate that posting twenty-four hours before the time of expiry of the fourteen days, i.e., up to midnight on Aug. 12, would be a good compliance with the notice, whether or not the document was actually delivered on the following day, because it was to be deemed G H to have been received during the following twenty-four hours. The notice given to the secretary of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., was clearly in time. The sellers' letter to the buyers did not reach the buyers before the material date, but it was posted on Aug. 12, and, if the posting of it can be regarded as sufficient, i.e., if it can be deemed to have been received within twenty-four hours afterwards, it will have complied with the rules. If the notice had been sent to the buyers simply at Frankfurt-am-Main, I should have been prepared to find that that would have sufficed and that the provision deeming it to have been received within twenty-four hours would have been effective, since the buyers are a well known company who could have been discovered in Frankfurt and that would have been an adequate address. But I have come to the conclusion that I cannot regard this letter as an adequate notice. The deeming clause for receipt within twenty-four hours can, I think, only cover a notice sent with the proper address. A notice cannot be redeemed from every fault. An address may be a little inadequate, but not wrong and misleading so that its chances of being received in the ordinary course of post are remote.

The sellers also contended that the letter sent by the association on Aug. 12 and received by the buyers on Aug. 13 constituted a sufficient compliance with the rule, on the ground that it was written by the secretary as agent for the sellers, following receipt of the notification from Messrs. Pyke of the appeal. The buyers say that it was not a notice given by the sellers direct to them, or, indeed, given by the sellers at all. Attractive in some ways as the argument is, I do not feel that I can find that, when he sent this letter, the secretary was either acting as or purporting to act as the agent of the sellers. The letter appears to be in common form, intimating to the other party and to the arbitrators that the notice of appeal has been given. It does not fall within any provision in the rules, and there is no indication that the sellers in any way ratified it, except when amending their pleadings in court. I do not think that can be regarded as a compliance with condition (C) (c), which must be complied with in addition to the condition as to notice to the association.

The buyers contended that there was in any case a fundamental error in these letters, in that they were addressed, the one merely to a branch of the buyers in Frankfurt and the other to their main office in Duisburg, when the contract required that they should be addressed to the buyers at the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., in London. That submission is derived from cl. (D) requiring notices under the rule to be "in writing, and sent by post to, or left at, the place where the . . . company to whom they are addressed is carrying on or . . . is to be considered as carrying on business". It is said that the place where the buyers, a German company, are to be considered as carrying on business is at the office of the association in London, by virtue of the provisions relating to jurisdiction in cl. (A), which provides that any party who resides outside England and Wales shall, for the purposes of proceedings at law or arbitration, be considered to be ordinarily resident or carrying on business at that address. That clause refers substantially to the law of the contract, which is to be that of England, and the forum of a dispute, which is to be either the courts of England or arbitration in England. That is emphasised by the further provision that those who are outside England and those who may be in Scotland or in Ireland shall be treated as being resident in England. Counsel has submitted that the effect of these provisions is that where a party wishes to give notice of appeal to a party who is to be considered as carrying on business in London at the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd.'s office he must give the notice to that party at that address. I can see no reason for that and it does not seem to me desirable that it should be enforced if it can be avoided. Nothing can be more satisfactory in the interests of everybody than for the party seeking an appeal to be able to give notice direct to the actual place of business of the other party. It would be unreasonable to say that a notice so given is wrong and that it ought to have been sent to the office of the association without, apparently, there being any regular recognised procedure for their transmitting it directly to the party concerned. I do not so construe this contract. It may be difficult, as a matter of construction to substitute the word "may" for "shall" at the end of clause (A) where it is provided:

"Any party to this contract residing or carrying on business elsewhere than in England or Wales, shall, for the purposes of proceedings at law or in arbitration, be considered as ordinarily resident or carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd.", but the wording would seem to lend some support for that construction. I do not think that that is altogether an easy construction, but I am prepared to hold that, in view of the latter part of cl. (D) with regard to notice in writing, there are two alternatives. The appellant can give notice either at the address where the other party is carrying on business, or he can avail himself of the provision that the party is to be considered as ordinarily resident at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., and give notice there if he so desires. If I am wrong in that construction, it seems to me that this is a provision which exists for the benefit of a party who has to give a notice to a foreign party who may be inaccessible. I should hold, therefore, in any event, that it is a provision which could be waived by the appellants if they wished, and that they could give their notice direct to the other party. I would not entertain a submission that such a direct notice was not a fulfilment of the conditions because it was not sent to the office of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd.

I am not, therefore, in a position to find that the notice required by cl. (C) (c) has been given, so that the grounds which alone entitled the sellers to pursue an appeal have not been established. Counsel for the sellers submits that, nevertheless, I cannot give effect to that view because the arbitration provisions in the contract require that there should be an award on the matter in issue before me as a condition precedent to the buyers having a right to bring it before the court, or, in other words, that there is a Scott v. Avery (1) clause which ousts the jurisdiction of the court and to which I must give effect by holding that this proceeding is misconceived. [HIS LORDSHIP read cl. (B) and continued:] The claim in this action is for two declarations that the award of July 30, 1952, is a valid award and is final and conclusive between the parties, and that the appeal tribunal of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., has no right to hear the appeal. In substance, I find that this action brought by the buyers is to enforce the award. They ask for a declaration, but the award has been obtained and it is binding unless it is to be subject to an appeal, there being no other complaint against it. The award is not something which arises out of the contract. It is something which has been achieved by the arbitration proceedings and gives a separate and distinct right to the party in whose favour it is given. I think that is a sufficient answer to the sellers' technical claim that this matter cannot be considered by this court because it is a dispute arising out of the contract and so is subject to arbitration between the parties. The arbitration clause in its terms only makes it a condition precedent to the right of either contracting party to sue the other in respect of a claim arising out of contract, and I do not regard this as a claim arising out of the contract.

Counsel for the buyers also raised the broader point that what was in issue here was not a matter for arbitration at all, on the ground that the jurisdiction of the appeal tribunal is in question and that the law is clear that arbitrators or an arbitration tribunal cannot decide their own jurisdiction. That is a matter essentially for the court. I was referred to the decision of the House of Lords in Heyman v. Darwins, Ltd. (2), to some remarks of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in Produce Brokers Co., Ltd. v. Olympia Oil & Cake Co., Ltd. (3)

([1916] 1 A.C. 327, 328), and to Attorney-General for Manitoba v. Kelly (4), a case before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. In the last case LORD PARMOOR said ([1922] 1 A.C. 276):

- A “Whenever there is a difference of opinion between the parties as to the authority conferred on an umpire under an agreed submission, the decision rests ultimately with the court and not with the umpire: Produce Brokers Co., Ltd. v. Olympia Oil & Cake Co., Ltd. (3). It would be impossible to allow an umpire to arrogate to himself jurisdiction over a question which, on the true construction of the submission, was not referred to him. An umpire cannot widen the area of his jurisdiction by holding, contrary to the fact, that the matter which he affects to decide is within the submission of the parties.”
- B Then he seeks to apply that to the facts of that case. In Hirji Mulji v. Cheong Yue S.S. Co., Ltd. (5) LORD SUMNER refers ([1926] A.C. 504) to May v. Mills (6). That is a formidable array of authority to support the proposition of learned counsel that, where, as here, a question of jurisdiction arises, the matter is essentially one for the court and not for the arbitrator, and if the appeal tribunal were being called on here to adjudicate on its own jurisdiction, I think that
- C submission would be unanswerable and that the question would be a matter for the court, but the position here is rather different. The arbitration has taken place on the merits and an award has been given. The contract alone provides the circumstances of an appeal and sets out the requirements. It is not the appeal tribunal which, on the submission of the sellers, would have to decide whether it had jurisdiction or not—i.e., whether all these requirements have been complied with—but the arbitrators appointed in accordance with the provisions of the contract. But it does not seem to me that that is of much practical importance because, if either party wish to say that this is a matter which must go for arbitration, their appropriate course would be to apply to the court to stay the action which had been brought. If they applied for a stay, the court would have to adjudicate on the matter in its discretion, and, subject to the Scott v. Avery (1) clause, decide whether it was an appropriate case in which to grant a stay or not. The issues that would come to the court, if the arbitrators were to decide this matter, would be entirely issues on questions of law. I apprehend that the court would be reluctant to grant a stay because, if I made an order now that this court had no jurisdiction to hear this action or could not give effect to its decision because of the arbitration clause, the
- F matter would go to the arbitrators, whose findings, being so wrapped up with law, if not entirely a question of law, would come back to the court for decision. If that was the position, evidently the court would not normally grant a stay where it had a discretion. Taking the view that I do that this condition precedent clause only applies to a claim and not to such an issue as this, it would be in the discretion of the court to say whether effect should be given
- G to the arbitration clause or not. But there do seem to be observations which support the view that arbitration would prevail where a contract made it abundantly clear that matters going to jurisdiction should be referred to arbitration. On the other hand, the authorities to which I have referred make it clear that, unless there is the clearest agreement that the parties had intended to refer matters of jurisdiction to an arbitrator, the jurisdiction of the court
- H prevails.

Reference was also made to the power of the court to treat as non-existent a clause providing that an award is a condition precedent to a right to sue or to recover, and reliance was placed on s. 25 (4) of the Arbitration Act, 1950, which provides:

“Where it is provided (whether by means of a provision in the arbitration agreement or otherwise) that an award under an arbitration agreement shall be a condition precedent to the bringing of an action with respect to any matter to which the agreement applies, the High Court, if it orders (whether under this section or under any other enactment) that the agreement shall cease to have effect as regards any particular dispute, may further order that the provision making an award a condition precedent to the bringing of an action shall also cease to have effect as regards that dispute."

Although the buyers would wish to rely on that clause only if I had found that the condition precedent clause assisted the sellers, I will indicate what my discretion would have been if I had felt empowered to apply that section. In Dennehy v. Bellamy (7) the corresponding clause in the Arbitration Act, 1934 (s. 3 (4)) was considered in relation to a claim under an insurance policy in which the plaintiff relied on the effect of the Third Parties (Rights against Insurers) Act, 1930. The Court of Appeal made certain observations which were wide in their terms and may have at some time to be considered in relation to the section as a whole in other circumstances. I am inclined to think that the power of the court to make an order under that section is not unlimited, but would arise only in the circumstances set out in RUSSELL ON ARBITRATION, 15th ed., p. 80, i.e.:

- "1. Where the authority of an arbitrator or arbitrators or umpire is revoked by leave of the court. This would seem to cover any case where either the Scott v. Avery (1) clause is contained in a submission proper, and leave is given to revoke this, or it is contained in an agreement to submit and leave is given to revoke a submission made pursuant to the agreement.
2. Where the whole arbitral tribunal is removed by the court: i.e., for misconduct or delay.
3. Where the dispute involves charges of fraud."

If the discretion is limited to these matters, I would not have a discretion in the present case to make the clause ineffective, but another view may be taken of that. How to exercise the discretion would be a matter of difficulty because the buyers are taking advantage of a very slight mistake committed by the sellers without any prejudice resulting to them (the buyers), because they had full knowledge of this appeal within the fourteen days. Therefore, the court would not readily grant them any indulgence. On the other hand, if the condition precedent clause was retained, the matter would, apparently, have to be adjudicated on by the arbitrators and would eventually come back to the court. That would be very unsatisfactory, and in itself would be strong ground for exercising discretion in the other way. I think on the whole that I would exercise a discretion if I had it under s. 25 (4) and let the matter be decided once and for all by the court. Indeed, it may be that counsel for the buyers is right in his submission that, notwithstanding the rather complicated circumstances of this contract and the matter arising after an award and relevant to an appeal, the cases are strong enough to entitle the court to deal with this matter to the exclusion of the arbitrators, it being a matter of jurisdiction.

In those circumstances, I find that the buyers are entitled to their declaration that the award is valid and is final and conclusive, and I am prepared to grant the second declaration that in the circumstances the sellers have no right to prosecute an appeal from the award to the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd.'s appeal committee.

Declarations accordingly.

FLOYD v. BUSH.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Pearson, JJ.), January 15, 1953.]

Street Traffic—"Motor vehicle"—Dual purpose vehicle—Bicycle fitted with auxiliary engine—Use as pedal cycle—No removal of essential parts of engine—Need of third-party insurance and driving licence—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 1, s. 4 (1), s. 35 (1).

The respondent was charged with using on a road a motor vehicle in relation to the user of which there was no policy of insurance and with driving a motor vehicle, not being the holder of a licence, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1) and s. 4 (1) respectively. The vehicle in question was a pedal cycle fitted with an auxiliary motor which was in efficient working order.

HELD: in view of the fact that the motor was in working order, the cycle was a "motor vehicle" within the meaning of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and, therefore, the respondent was guilty of the offences with which he was charged.

CASE STATED by Lancaster justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Liverpool the appellant, Robert Cecil Floyd, preferred informations against the respondent, Charles Robin Bush, charging that he (i) did use a motor vehicle on a road without there being in force in relation to the user of the vehicle by him a policy of insurance in respect of third-party risks, contrary to s. 35 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930; (ii) did drive a motor vehicle without holding a licence, contrary to s. 4 (1) of the Act; (iii) did take and drive away a motor assisted pedal cycle without the consent of the owner, contrary to s. 28 (1) of the Act.

It was proved that the respondent took and rode away a motor assisted pedal cycle without the owner's consent, that he held no driving licence, and that he had no policy of insurance covering the cycle. It was also proved that he made no attempt to start or to use the engine of the cycle, but pedalled it along the highway for a mile and a half. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the cycle was a "motor vehicle" within s. 1 of the Act and that Lawrence v. Howlett (1) could be distinguished. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the cycle was not a "motor vehicle" within the Act and that Lawrence v. Howlett (1) applied. The justices dismissed the informations.

Nicklin for the appellant.

Pain for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Lancaster before whom the respondent was charged with three offences. The vehicle in question is one of those bicycles which have an auxiliary motor fitted to them so that they can be used either as a motor cycle or as a pedal cycle. The respondent had taken away this cycle without the consent of the owner, and when he was stopped he was pedalling it. Apparently, he had pedalled it for a mile and a half, but he had not started the motor. The justices, having considered Lawrence v. Howlett (1), were of opinion "that the said motor assisted pedal cycle, as being used at the material time, was not a mechanically propelled vehicle within the meaning of s. 1 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930", and they dismissed the informations.

In my opinion, they were wrong in so doing. I do not think they thoroughly appreciated the decision in Lawrence v. Howlett (1). That case gave this court a great deal of trouble. We came to our conclusion with some hesitation, and GORMAN, J., in his judgment, said it was an exceptional case and must not in any way be extended beyond its particular facts. That case also was concerned with one of these dual purpose vehicles, but the motor had been dismantled and

"... certain vital parts, namely, the cylinder, piston and connecting rod, had been removed by the appellant, though there was some petrol in the tank."

In other words, he dismantled his motor so that, in the opinion of the court, it was no longer a mechanically propelled vehicle, that is to say, a vehicle which was capable of being propelled by mechanical power. But in the present case I think we are bound to assume from the way the Case is stated that this was a cycle in which the auxiliary motor was in working order. We are entitled to assume that because the justices appear to have applied their minds, not to the question whether the vehicle could have been mechanically propelled, as it obviously could have been, but to whether at the moment when the respondent was stopped he was using it as a motor cycle or, as they put it, as a pedal cycle. The definition of motor cycles in the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 2 (1) (f), is

"... mechanically propelled vehicles ... with less than four wheels and the weight of which unladen does not exceed eight hundredweight."

I think the only sensible construction of "mechanically propelled vehicles" is vehicles constructed so that they can be mechanically propelled, and I think it would be going far beyond Lawrence v. Howlett (1) if we were to hold that one of these vehicles, when possessing an efficient motor, was not a mechanically propelled vehicle.

For these reasons, I think that Lawrence v. Howlett (1) does not apply. I would also call attention to the fact that this court decided in Shimmell v. Fisher (2), that any movement of a car without the consent of the owner is enough to bring the person who moves it within the ambit of s. 28 (1), which makes it an offence to take and drive away a motor vehicle without the consent of the owner. It does not matter whether he drives it for one hundred yards or for miles. If he is driving the car, that is to say, causing the car to be moved without the consent of the owner, he is committing an offence. It may be that in certain cases, if he was prosecuted for doing it, the justices would say it was a trivial matter and would give an absolute discharge, but that is not the sort of case we are dealing with here. Here is a man who, without any right, has taken a vehicle capable of being used as a motor cycle and equipped to be used as a motor cycle without the consent of the owner. He has driven it along the road, and I say he has driven it because he caused it to move, and whether he caused it to move by pedalling or starting the motor seems to me to be immaterial. At the material time the vehicle was provided with a motor and could be used as a motor cycle. For these reasons, I think the case must go back to the justices with an intimation that all three offences have been proved.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: I agree. There is no finding by the justices that this vehicle had in any sense ceased to have the engine by which it could be mechanically propelled still in existence. The justices seem to have become confused by considering the particular use to which the vehicle was being put by the alternative method of propulsion and to have thought that, on that being shown, the machine ceased to be a mechanically propelled vehicle. Speaking for myself, but for the decision to which the justices have come, I should have thought this was a self-evident case.

PEARSON, J.: I agree.

CLARKE v. CHERRY.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Pearson, JJ.), January 14, 1953.]

Street Traffic—Licence—Goods vehicle—Carriage of goods for trade or business—

Van used by window cleaner—Carriage of ladders, buckets, and articles for cleaning—Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933 (c. 53), s. 1 (1) (b), s. 2 (4), s. 36 (1).

The respondent, a window cleaner, was using on a road for the purposes of his trade a motor van in respect of which he did not hold a C licence. He carried buckets, washing cloths, and leathers inside the van, and he had adapted the van so that he could carry ladders on the top, attached to a permanent fixture. He was charged with having unlawfully used the van without a licence, contrary to s. 1 (1) (b) of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933. The justices found that the articles carried in the van were solely and exclusively the tools of his trade and were not goods carried for sale, and that, therefore, the van was not being used for the carriage of goods for or in connection with any trade or business within the meaning of s. 1 (1) (b), and they dismissed the information.

HELD: the buckets, washing cloths, and leathers were "goods" within the meaning of s. 36 (1) of the Act of 1933; under s. 1 (2) a "goods vehicle" meant a motor vehicle constructed or adapted for use for the carriage of goods; and, therefore, within s. 1 (1) (b) the respondent's van was a "goods vehicle" used for the carriage of goods; the carriage was for or in connection with a trade or business carried on by him; and, accordingly, he required a C licence under s. 2 (4) to entitle him so to use the vehicle.

FOR THE ROAD AND RAIL TRAFFIC ACT, 1933, s. 1 (1), s. 2 (4), and s. 36 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 24, pp. 675, 678 and 707.

CASE STATED by Lincolnshire justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Sleaford on Aug. 18, 1952, the appellant, Cecil Clarke, a police officer, preferred an information against the respondent, Arthur Herbert Ernest Cherry, charging that, on May 27, 1952, contrary to s. 1 (1) (b) of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, he unlawfully used a goods vehicle, namely, a motor van, for the carriage of goods for or in connection with a certain trade or business carried on by him, otherwise than under a licence granted under Part I of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933. It was proved or admitted that the respondent, who was engaged in the trade or business of a window cleaner, was the owner of a motor van. On May 27, 1952, he was using the motor van at High Street, Martin, in connection with his trade or business, it having been adapted by the addition of a permanent fixture to carry ladders used in connection with the trade or business. Buckets, washing cloths and leathers, also used in connection with the trade or business, were being carried inside the motor van, and on the top thereof two ladders were carried, attached to the fixture. He was not in possession of a carrier's licence as required by s. 1 (1) (b) of the Act.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that the motor van was a goods vehicle as defined by s. 1 (2) of the Act, that it was being used for or in connection with a trade or business carried on by the person using it, and that, therefore, the respondent was guilty of an offence under s. 1 (1) (b). It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the ladders, buckets and other articles could not be classed as "goods" because they were not for sale, and, consequently, it was not necessary that the respondent should be in possession of a carrier's licence. The justices dismissed the information and the appellant appealed.

Swanwick for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Lincoln before whom the respondent, who carries on business as a window cleaner, was charged with unlawfully using a goods vehicle for the carriage of goods for or in connection with a certain trade or business carried on by him otherwise than under a licence granted under Part I of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933. The respondent has a Jowett van which he uses for carrying his buckets, washing cloths and leathers, and, in addition to that, he has placed a fixture on the roof of the van so that he can carry two ladders on it. The justices dismissed the information because they found that the motor van was used exclusively for carrying the tools of the respondent's trade and not goods carried for sale, and so they held that the motor van was not being used for the carriage of goods for or in connection with any trade or business within the meaning of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, s. 1 (1) (b).

I am not surprised that the justices tried to find a way to avoid a conviction in a case of this sort, but I am afraid that they cannot do it by reading into the statute words which are not there. The statute does not say anything about the goods carried being goods for sale. It says (s. 36 (1)) : "' Goods ' includes goods or burden of any description", and it would seem that buckets, washing leathers, and ladders are goods within that definition. Section 1 (1) provides:

" Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, no person shall use a goods vehicle on a road for the carriage of goods—(a) for hire or reward; or (b) for or in connection with any trade or business carried on by him, except under a licence."

And, under s. 1 (2), a goods vehicle means a motor vehicle constructed or adapted for use for the carriage of goods. The respondent, therefore, required a C licence to entitle him to carry goods for or in connection with any trade or business carried on by him. The case must go back to the justices with an intimation that an offence within s. 1 (1) (b) has been committed, but, of course, it is open to them to give a conditional discharge to the respondent if they think it right to do so.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: I agree, and for the same reasons.

BOYER AND OTHERS v. WARBEY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), October 9, 10, 13, 14, 17, November 3, 1952.]

Rent Restriction—Termination of statutory tenancy—Premises vacated by tenant—Failure to give notice—Liability for rent—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 15 (1).

Rent Restriction—Statutory tenant—Retention of possession after end of contractual tenancy—Agreement by contractual tenant to pay on expiration of tenancy “£40 towards re-decoration”—Incorporation of agreement in statutory tenancy—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 15 (1).

By a written agreement dated Mar. 7, 1945, A. let an unfurnished flat to B. for three years from Feb. 8, 1945, at a rent of £175 per annum. On Jan. 30, 1948, B., with the consent of A., assigned the remaining nine days of the term to C., who, on the expiration of the term, remained in possession as statutory tenant. On Aug. 30, 1951, C. vacated the flat without notice to A., and on Sept. 29, 1951, he sent the keys to A., who did not accept a surrender of the tenancy. A. re-let the flat as from Nov. 21, 1951.

HELD: C., having failed to give A. the notice required by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 15 (1), remained liable to pay rent (either as such or as damages for breach of his statutory obligation) to A. until Nov. 21, 1951, when C.'s tenancy came to an end by operation of law.

The agreement of Mar. 7, 1945, provided by cl. 2 that the tenant agreed to make good any damage done to the interior of the flat, and by cl. 7: “Provided always and the tenant for herself and her assigns hereby agrees with [the landlord and his assigns] that she the tenant will on her or their quitting the said premises at the end of the term hereby granted (but without prejudice to the provisions, agreements and conditions hereinbefore contained) pay to [the landlord or his assigns] immediately after the expiration or determination of the tenancy whenever it shall happen the full sum of £40 towards the re-decoration of the said suite of rooms or flat, which sum shall be accepted by [the landlord] in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims against the tenant for repairs to or decoration of the said premises subject to and without prejudice to the liability of the tenant to make good any damage caused by unfair wear and tear of the said premises”. A. claimed £40 from C.

HELD: the £40 was not a penalty; (SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., dissentiente) the agreement to pay £40 touched and concerned the thing demised, and, therefore, ran with the land so as to bind C. as soon as he entered into possession, notwithstanding that the agreement was under hand only; and, on the determination of the contractual tenancy, the agreement to pay £40 was incorporated in the statutory tenancy.

APPEAL by the tenant against an order, dated June 26, 1952, of His Honour JUDGE REID, sitting at West London County Court.

By an agreement under hand dated Mar. 7, 1945, the landlords granted to a Mrs. Crossley the tenancy of a flat for a term of three years from Feb. 8, 1945, at a rent of £175 per annum, later increased to £200 5s. 2d. owing to increases in the rates. On Jan. 30, 1948, Mrs. Crossley, with the consent of the landlords, assigned the remainder of the term to one, Warbey (herein called "the tenant"). On Aug. 30, 1951, the tenant left the flat, and on Sept. 29, 1951, he sent the keys to the landlords without giving the notice required by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 15 (1). The landlords re-let the premises from Nov. 21, 1951. The landlords claimed (i) £78 11s. 11d. being one quarter's rent to Sept. 29, 1951 (£50 1s. 4d.) and fifty-two days' rent to Nov. 20, 1951 (£28 10s. 7d.), on the ground that this sum was rent owed by the tenant by reason of his failure to give notice of his giving up possession as required by s. 15 (1); and (ii) £40 which, it was alleged, became payable by the tenant on his leaving the premises under the agreement of 1945. The county court judge gave judgment for the landlords.

A preliminary point relating to the question whether certain arguments were open to the tenant is reported [1952] 2 All E.R. 976.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 3. The following judgments were read.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. (having stated the facts): The main point by the tenant is that the giving up by him of possession automatically ended the statutory tenancy, and for that proposition reliance is placed on the well-known case in this court of Brown v. Brash & Ambrose (1). According to him, on the happening of that event, rent as such ceased, and if he had, as is now conceded that he had, failed to comply with the statutory obligation to give three months' notice imposed by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 15 (1), all he did was to commit a breach of the statutory obligation, for which he would be liable for damages, and, being so liable, the landlords must, on general principles, mitigate the damages, which they failed to do. Having regard to the fact that there is no reference to this matter of mitigation in the judgment of the county court judge and no material finding of fact, counsel for the tenant candidly admits that he could not now ask for more than a reference back of this point on the ground that there was some evidence of failure on the landlords' part to mitigate the damages.

What is the precise effect of a statutory tenant's "giving up possession", without more? The effect of Brown v. Brash (1) is stated in Mr. MEGARRY'S book, THE RENT ACTS, 6th ed., pp. 176, 177, where it is said:

"It has been said that 'There are, we think, only two ways by which a tenant whose contractual tenancy has come to an end can lose the protection of the Acts. One is . . . by giving up possession. The other is by an order against the tenant for recovery of possession'."

A But the mere fact that a tenant absents himself from the premises is not necessarily enough, since he may come back the next day. On the other hand, if the landlords re-enter in fact, may there not have been a surrender or its equivalent, so as to end the tenant's liability for rent or for damages, or for whatever it be properly called, notwithstanding the absence of any notice on the tenant's part? The point, however, does not, I think, arise here, because at all material times the tenant appears to have claimed, albeit intermittently, that as regards these premises he had a right under the contract, and (particularly having regard to the nature of the tenant's claim), I think it clear that there was nothing equivalent to surrender until Nov. 21, 1951, the date of the subsequent letting, apart from the effect of two letters of Oct. 11, 1951, and Oct. 16, 1951. From what I have said it follows that the tenant is liable for this first item of £78 11s. 11d., apart from the questions, first, on the two letters I have just mentioned, and secondly, on this matter of mitigation, if open. On the latter matter I am, however, satisfied that no sufficient case is, in any event, shown for any reference back. Parliament has incorporated into the Act the conception of "rent" payments and the words of s. 15 (1), so far as material, are to be noted: "A tenant . . . shall be entitled to give up possession . . . only on giving such notice . . ." It may, therefore, well be that an obligation to pay "rent" continues in the case of a statutory tenant in the same way as it does in the case of a contractual tenant who has an estate. Nor am I satisfied (though I am not expressing any view one way or the other) that the effect of failure to give notice and, therefore, of a breach of the statutory obligation, is to give rise merely to a claim for damages. [HIS LORDSHIP considered the two letters, found that they did not alter his conclusion, and continued:]

E I, therefore, think that the appeal fails on the first head or branch of the claim, but, if it has involved some matters of difficulty, the second matter, to my mind, is more difficult still. I must first refer to three clauses of the agreement of Mar. 7, 1945. Clause 2 contained the tenant's obligations as to repair. It provided that the tenant agreed

F "to make good any damage which may be done to the interior of the said premises and keep the water closets free, unstopped and in proper acting order and to renew and reinstate any cracked or broken stoves, fire grates or any part or parts thereof, or sashlines requiring renewal and as often as need or occasion shall require to thoroughly sweep and cleanse all chimneys and flues and clean all the windows and glass in or belonging to the said flat and also to reinstate and repair any broken windows or glass, and to keep all locks and fastenings perfect and generally to keep the interior of the said flat, rooms and premises, and all stoves, bells, cupboards, fixtures and things thereto belonging in as good repair and condition as the same are now respectively in and will so leave the same at the end of the tenancy."

H That comprehends a great many words which, I should assume, were taken from some book of precedents, perhaps without any particular reflection as to their applicability to the particular matter in hand. Clause 7, which is the principal ground of difficulty, is framed in the following obscure language :

"Provided always and the tenant for herself and her assigns hereby agrees with the landlords and their assigns that she the tenant will on her or their quitting the said premises at the end of the term hereby granted (but without prejudice to the provisions, agreements and conditions hereinbefore contained) pay to the landlords or their assigns immediately after the expiration or determination of the tenancy whenever it shall happen the full sum of £40 towards the re-decoration of the said suite of rooms or flat, which sum shall be accepted by the landlords in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims against the tenant for repairs to or decoration of the said premises subject to and without prejudice to the liability of the tenant to make good any damage caused by unfair wear and tear of the said premises."

Clause 10 contained a provision that, if the rent restriction legislation were varied in a particular way, then the landlord was given a right to serve a notice terminating the agreement and a notice of increase of the rent to a permitted figure, and then the clause ends:

"and in such a case a new tenancy shall be deemed to be constituted for a term equal to the unexpired portion of the three years hereinbefore referred to at the increased rent . . ."

It is to be noted, therefore, that in no circumstances, as I read it, was any expiration beyond the fixed term of three years in contemplation.

The question arises out of the first part of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 15 (1):

"A tenant who by virtue of the provisions of this Act retains possession of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies shall, so long as he retains possession, observe and be entitled to the benefit of all the terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy, so far as the same are consistent with the provisions of this Act, and shall be entitled . . ."

The question is: Was the tenant liable to pay the £40 stipulated for by cl. 7 of the lease when he, in fact, left the premises in the autumn of 1951, being then a statutory tenant? It was first said on the tenant's part (and it was so pleaded) that this sum of £40 was a "penalty", and, therefore, its payment would not be enforced by the courts. By that pleading, I understand, is meant that the sum in question was in the nature of a fine exacted on the happening of some event, or, more particularly, the breach of some obligation. In my judgment, this sum was not a "penalty", as I understand the word. The obligation was to pay the sum of £40 "towards re-decoration", and it has not been suggested before us that the sum of £40 was an exorbitant figure. But it has also been argued before us that the obligation is not of a nature which could or would be carried over into the statutory tenancy.

When the appeal was first before this court, the argument proceeded on the basis that the obligation did bind the tenant when he became contractual assignee, so that as contractual assignee he would have been bound to pay the sum if the event occurred on which, according to the meaning, whatever it might be, of the relevant clause, it became payable. After the argument had concluded it seemed to us that the hypothesis that it did bind an assignee of the original tenant was open to some doubt, and the case was, therefore, restored for further argument, for, if the tenant could not have been bound to pay the £40 as assignee, it was obviously difficult to see how the obligation could be carried over into the statutory tenancy.

On the question whether the tenant was bound by this obligation as a contractual assignee, I assume (notwithstanding an observation in WOODFALL'S LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT, 24th ed., p. 551) that it does not matter that there was here only an agreement under hand and not a lease by deed, since the tenant took possession in fact under the agreement. The law seems to be that a mere covenant by a lessee to pay a sum of money to the lessor will not prima facie "touch and concern" the land, and, therefore, will not run with the land, but such a covenant may be part and parcel of or bound up with other covenants, for example, a covenant to repair, so as to produce the opposite result. The covenants will then be "inextricably bound together": see, for example, Moss' Empires, Ltd. v. Olympia (Liverpool), Ltd. (2), and also Lord Howard De

A Walden v. Barber (3), where the obligation in question was said to be "an annexe to the general covenant"; see also the general discussion of the cases in SMITH'S LEADING CASES (13th ed., vol. 1, p. 51, and Re Hunter's Lease (4), decided by UTHWATT, J., where it was laid down that the question affecting such covenants is the same whether the covenants are covenants by a lessor or by a lessee. Thus, if there were a covenant to repair and decorate and deliver up repaired and decorated, with a proviso that payment of the sum of £x (being a reasonable sum) should be paid (if demanded) in lieu and satisfaction of the latter part of the covenant, I should assume that the whole covenant would run with the land, and, undoubtedly, such a covenant would be convenient and, I think, sensible, but, as later appears, I am unable, for my part, to construe the present covenant so favourably to the landlords.

B If I am wrong so far, then the landlords' difficulties, in my judgment, are still by no means at an end. The character of the statutory tenancy, I have already said, is a very special one. It has earned many epithets, including "monstrum horrendum", and, perhaps, it has never been fully thought out by Parliament. It is clear, however, that purely personal covenants cannot persist into a statutory tenancy, for ex concessis the contract is finished (though, of course, the contracting party may still be sued as such). It is also clear that C covenants to deliver up possession are inconsistent with a statutory tenancy, from which it would appear to me to follow that covenants to pay money "inextricably bound up with" covenants to deliver up possession would cease with the latter. There are other difficulties, including (i) one statutory tenant may succeed another, e.g., under s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, and (ii) such a covenant, D if it does persist into the statutory tenancy, would, presumably, become immediately enforceable if an order were made by the court under, for example, para. (h) of sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933. I, therefore, feel the gravest doubt whether, on the most favourable construction of cl. 7 possible to the landlord, it could survive into the statutory tenancy. But, in any case, what does the covenant in cl. 7 mean? It bristles, E to my mind, with difficulty and obscurity. [HIS LORDSHIP considered the construction of cl. 7, and continued:] For my part, I am not prepared to re-draft this muddled cl. 7 so as to create in favour of the landlords a provision which other people might think convenient or sensible and which might survive into the statutory tenancy. In face of all the many difficulties on this head of claim, I would conclude the matter on the broad ground that the landlords have failed F to discharge the onus of satisfying me that the tenant owes him £40, and I would allow this part of the appeal. I have dealt at length and with some diffidence with this aspect of the matter because I regret to find that my conclusion differs not only from that of the trial judge, but also from that of both my brethren. Having regard to their view, the whole appeal must be dismissed.

G DENNING, L.J.: By an agreement under hand dated Mar. 7, 1945, Mrs. Boyer and others let to Mrs. Crossley a flat in Kensington for three years from Feb. 8, 1945, at a rent of £175 a year. The agreement contained a clause by which the tenant agreed to repair and another clause by which she agreed that when she left at the end of the three years she would pay £40 towards re-decoration. Shortly before the three years expired, Mrs. Crossley assigned the last nine days of the term to Mr. Warbey and he entered into possession of the flat. The term H expired on Feb. 8, 1948, and thereafter Mr. Warbey stayed as a statutory tenant. In August, 1951, he bought another house and wanted to leave the flat, but he did not give the requisite three months' notice to quit. He left the flat on Aug. 30, 1951, and sent the keys to the landlords on Sept. 29, 1951, but the landlords did not accept a surrender of the tenancy. They tried to re-let the flat, and eventually succeeded in re-letting it as from Nov. 21, 1951.

The first question is whether the landlords are entitled to rent up to the time they re-let. I think they are. As a statutory tenant, Mr. Warbey was not entitled to give up possession except on giving not less than three months' notice to quit: see s. 15 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920; and that means a valid notice: see King's College, Cambridge v. Kershman (5). He did not give any valid notice. He went out of possession, it is true, and thereupon the landlords would have been entitled to recover possession, if they had so wished, but they did not so wish. They were not bound to accept possession whenever he chose to offer it. They were entitled to hold him to the tenancy until he gave a valid three months' notice to quit. Very sensibly, they did try to re-let, and, as soon as they re-let, the statutory tenancy came to an end by surrender by operation of law, but, until it came to an end by valid notice to quit or by surrender, they were entitled to hold the tenant liable for rent.

The second question is whether the tenant is liable to pay £40 towards re-decoration. This raises several matters on which my views are as follows:

(i) The agreement to pay £40 was not a penalty. It was a very convenient provision whereby the parties agreed that the original tenant, Mrs. Crossley, should pay a lump sum of £40 instead of paying damages for fair wear and tear. The reason for such a provision is fairly plain. When an outgoing tenant leaves the premises, he does not in practice do any decorative repairs, even though the tenancy agreement says he should do. He usually pays the landlord an agreed sum instead of doing the decorations. This suits both sides. It suits the outgoing tenant because he avoids the cost of a survey to ascertain the dilapidations. It suits the landlord because he has to re-decorate before a new tenant goes in, and the sum will help towards the cost. Such being the practice, the parties in the present case simply agreed the sum in advance. They agreed in advance that a sum of £40 should be payable by the tenant at the end of the term for everything except "unfair wear and tear", leaving unfair wear and tear, if any, to be assessed and paid for separately. I see nothing wrong, but everything to the good, in so doing. The parties know in advance exactly where they stand. The sum is not a penalty, but an agreed payment in lieu of damages. I have had the benefit of reading what ROMER, L.J., has to say on this point and I entirely agree with it.

(ii) The agreement to pay £40 does, in my opinion, touch and concern the thing demised. It concerns the re-decoration of the flat. It is true that the landlords are not bound in law to apply the £40 towards re-decoration, but they will, as a matter of practice, so apply it. The case falls within the authority of Vernon v. Smith (6), Lord Howard De Walden v. Barber (3), and Moss' Empires, Ltd. v. Olympia (Liverpool), Ltd. (2).

(iii) Seeing that the agreement touched and concerned the thing demised, it ran with the land so as to bind the assignee, Mr. Warbey, as soon as he entered into possession. I know that before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, it was said that the doctrine of covenants running with the land only applied to covenants under seal and not to agreements under hand: see Elliott v. Johnson (7), but since the fusion of law and equity, the position is different. The distinction between agreements under hand and covenants under seal has been largely obliterated. There is no valid reason nowadays why the doctrine of covenants running with the land—or with the reversion—should not apply equally to agreements under hand as to covenants under seal, and I think we should so hold, not only in the case of agreements for more than three years which need the interposition of equity to perfect them, but also in the case of agreements for three years or less which do not.

(iv) When the term of three years came to an end, the tenant remained on as statutory tenant, subject to all the terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy "so far as the same are consistent with the provisions of the Act". In my opinion, the agreement to pay £40 was incorporated into the statutory tenancy. I see nothing in the clause which is inconsistent with the provisions of the Act except, possibly, the words "at the end of the term". This phrase is, I think, synonymous with the phrase "at the end of the tenancy". The clause itself uses the two phrases interchangeably. The clause could not and did not operate "at the end of the term" of three years, because the tenant did not then quit the premises. But why should it not operate at the end of the statutory tenancy when he does quit? I see no reason why not. If the clause did not operate at the end of the statutory tenancy, it would mean that the tenant would escape payment of the £40 altogether and, what is more, he would not have the benefit of it. It seems to me clear that, if the tenant stays on by right, either on a contractual holding over or as a statutory tenant, he is liable, on quitting the premises, to pay the £40. In the result, I find myself in agreement with the county court judge on all points, and I would dismiss the appeal.

B ROMER, L.J.: In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed. With regard to the sum of £78 11s. 11d. awarded to the landlords in respect of arrears of rent due down to Nov. 20, 1951, I have little to add to what my brethren have said. The tenant argued before us that any sum that might be recoverable from him after he abandoned possession of his flat could be regarded, not as rent, but as damages for breach of his obligation to give three months' notice to quit. I am not satisfied that he did not continue liable for rent as such. The point is, however, immaterial, for the amount of damages payable by him for failing to give the proper notice would be quantified by the amount of rent that he would have had to pay if he had continued in possession, and the tenant's argument to the effect that the landlords could have mitigated the damages seems to me to be without foundation. It was sought to base the argument on the footing that the landlords ought, at the earliest opportunity, to have re-let the flat at a rackrent, as they had done before, instead of waiting until they could find a tenant who was willing to pay a capital premium but a lower rent. A tenant who goes out of possession without giving due notice has no right to dictate to his landlord how he shall deal with his property, and why the landlords here should have disposed of the flat in a manner disadvantageous to themselves merely in order to save the tenant from the full consequences of his wrongful act, I am at a loss to conceive.

The next point to consider is as to the sum of £40 which the original tenant, Mrs. Crossley, agreed to pay on her quitting the premises at the end of the term of three years granted by the tenancy agreement. Before considering whether this prima facie liability devolved on the tenant as the assign from Mrs. Crossley, it is necessary to inquire whether it would have been binding on Mrs. Crossley herself or whether, as the tenant contends, it was unenforceable as being a penalty or as being a payment which was of the nature of a penalty. In support of the contention that the landlords could not, in law, have recovered this sum from Mrs. Crossley, it was argued that under cl. 7 of the agreement she became bound to pay the £40 in discharge, or part discharge, of her covenants to repair under cl. 2 notwithstanding that her liability for the due performance of all those covenants was expressly reserved, and from this it would necessarily follow that, as she was to remain liable under the whole of her repairing covenants, then, if she had to pay the landlords an additional £40 in respect of the same subject-matter, that sum can only be regarded as a penalty. I would agree that, if in a lease a lessee covenants to repair and the lease then provides that, at the end of the tenancy, the lessee is to pay full damages for any breaches of the covenant together with an additional sum of £x in respect of the same breaches, then this sum could not be recovered as well as the damages, for it would, in effect, be a penalty and the promise to pay it would not be enforced by the courts. On the other hand, if the £x can fairly be regarded as compounding the tenant's liability under a specified part of the repairing covenant, it would not, if reasonable in amount, be irrecoverable as being a penalty, for damages could only be recovered for failure to perform the remainder of the covenant. The question whether or not the sum now in issue falls within the one aspect of the matter or the other seems to me to be one of construction of cl. 2 and cl. 7 of the tenancy agreement. This question is far from easy of solution because of the extreme obscurity of the language in which cl. 7 is couched. It is, however, clear that the parties mutually intended that the tenant should pay £40 on quitting at the end of the tenancy, and, in my opinion, the subject-matter of the payment is ascertainable with a reasonable degree of certainty. A

Clause 2 imposes on the tenant a threefold obligation. First, he is to use and occupy the premises in a fair and tenantable manner. Secondly, he undertakes a general obligation to make good any damage which might be done to the interior of the premises and generally to keep the interior and all stoves, bells, cupboards, fixtures and things thereto belonging in as good repair and condition as the same were at the beginning of the tenancy and so to leave the same at the end thereof. Thirdly, the tenant is to perform certain specified acts of reparation or renewal in relation to a number of varied articles which are therein enumerated. In addition to noting these three heads of obligation, two points call for comment. The first is that there is no exemption from liability in respect of what is commonly called "fair wear and tear". This omission is not surprising, for it is, in fact, to general depreciation of this character that the second obligation is, in my opinion, directed. The tenant is to be liable even for the fair wear and tear that might normally be expected to occur during a period of three years' occupation. The second point is that the general depreciation to which I have referred does not expressly exclude matters of decoration and I can find no sufficient warrant for excluding them by implication. The interior of a flat at the end of a tenancy (whatever care a tenant may take) is not in as good condition as it was at the beginning if, for example, the parts of it that were painted or distempered have been subjected over a period of three years to ordinary usage and to the fogs and smuts of the London air. Accordingly, in approaching cl. 7, I do so on the footing that the lessee, at the end of the lease, was to be responsible for depreciation due to fair wear and tear of the flat, including deterioration in the condition of the interior decorations. In so doing, it seems to me that the clue to the parties' intention in cl. 7 lies in the use of the word "unfair" in the phrase "unfair wear and tear of the said premises" which appears in the last line of the clause. In my judgment, this word, although an unusual one to find in a lease or tenancy agreement, confines the ambit of the "wear and tear" in relation to which it is used to wear and tear other than that which is attributable to ordinary user. B

Accordingly, as I think, the concluding part of the clause—

"subject to and without prejudice to the liability of the tenant to make good any damage caused by unfair wear and tear of the said premises"

—leads to the following results: (i) Notwithstanding anything contained in the earlier part of the clause, the tenant's liability for wear and tear other than ordinary wear and tear is preserved; (ii) any outstanding liability in respect of fair wear and tear is impliedly released; and (iii) if regard be paid to that sentence alone, the lessors receive no compensation in respect of such release. Turning, then, to the earlier part of the clause and bearing in mind these effects of the concluding sentence, one finds that, on quitting at the end of the demised term, the lessee will, "but without prejudice to the provisions agreements and conditions hereinbefore contained" (which, in my judgment, include those contained in cl. 2), G

"pay to the landlords or their assigns immediately after the expiration or determination of the tenancy whenever it shall happen the full sum of £40 towards the re-decoration of the said suite of rooms or flat, which sum shall be accepted by the landlords in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims against the tenant for repairs to or decoration of the said premises".

In my judgment, this £40 fills in the gap which is left in the concluding provision by reason of the omission, which I have already mentioned, to compensate the lessors for impliedly releasing the lessee from outstanding liability for fair wear and tear. The sum of £40 is to be paid and is to be accepted by the landlords in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims against the tenant in respect of such general and inevitable deterioration of the interior of the flat, including decoration, as is attributable to ordinary user. On this interpretation, an effect can be reasonably given to the whole of the clause. On the tenant quitting the flat at the end of the term, the tenant is to pay the landlords £40 in final satisfaction of her liability under what I have earlier described as her second obligation under cl. 2. The payment of that sum, however, is to be without prejudice to her liability under the first and third obligations imposed by cl. 2 which (and which alone) remain binding on her. As, therefore, the £40 is payable in satisfaction of a particular part of her liabilities under cl. 2 (and the judge held that sum to be a reasonable amount) and she remains answerable only for the rest, the argument to the effect that that sum was a penalty fails, in my view, for want of the necessary foundation to support it.

On the view above expressed that the agreement to pay the £40 would have been binding on Mrs. Crossley had she continued in possession, I am of opinion, for the reasons stated in the judgment of DENNING, L.J., that the covenant ran with the land so as to bind the tenant as assignee of the term and that it continued to operate as a term of his statutory tenancy. As to the latter point, I would add that a contrary decision might operate very hardly on a landlord at the instance of an unconscientious tenant, for a covenant to pay a sum of money in respect of dilapidations at the end of a contractual tenancy which imposed no express obligation to repair could be readily avoided by the tenant remaining on as statutory tenant and giving notice to quit immediately afterwards. The tenant cannot, in my opinion, escape liability on the ground that cl. 7 provided that the sum was only payable on the tenant quitting "at the end of the term granted" by the agreement. That phrase meant no more than quitting on the expiration of the tenancy, as is shown a few lines later on in cl. 7 itself, and compare, for example, cl. 2 and cl. 10 of the agreement, in each of which the word "tenancy" is used as the equivalent of "the term hereby granted".

D
A bank, which had its head office in Moscow and a branch office in Petrograd, but no branch office in England, was dissolved, according to Russian law, on or about Dec. 14, 1917, by a decree of that date of the Soviet government by which the bank, in common with other banks, was nationalised, its assets and liabilities being taken over by the State Bank. Between March, 1930, and May, 1932, when a winding-up order was made in England in respect of the bank, W., an expert in Russian law, assisted in various legal proceedings relating to the bank, and, largely owing to his advice with regard to a claim made in respect of assets of the bank by the Deutsche Bank, that claim was finally defeated. W. claimed in the winding-up of the bank in respect of his expenses and for a sum by way of remuneration. The liquidator rejected his proof and his rejection was upheld by the court. The liquidator then applied for leave to pay to W. £420 ex gratia in respect of his claim. Distribution to creditors had not been made, and it was anticipated that they would receive 10s. in the pound.

HELD: in ordinary circumstances the application would be premature, but W. had been of great assistance in the winding-up, and his help might be of value to the liquidator in future, and, therefore, the payment would be authorised on W.'s undertaking to continue to serve as a member of the committee of inspection unless prevented by ill health or other unavoidable cause or until excused from service by the court.

E
MOTION by the liquidator of the Banque des Marchands de Moscou to discharge an order made by the registrar dismissing an application for leave to make an ex gratia payment to Mark Wilenkin.

F
The decision of VAISEY, J., rejecting the proof of the said Mark Wilenkin in the winding-up, is reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 1269. His LORDSHIP suggested that the question of a gratuitous payment to the said Mark Wilenkin should be considered by the registrar. On the application being made to him, the registrar expressed the view that it was premature and that the proper course was to postpone any such payment until the views of the creditors had been ascertained.

Raymond Walton for the liquidator.

G
VAISEY, J.: This is an application by the liquidator in the winding-up of the Banque des Marchands de Moscou (Kroupetschesky) for leave to pay to Mr. Mark Wilenkin the sum of £420, or such other sum as this court should direct, as and by way of an ex gratia payment in respect of that gentleman's claim as set out in his proof of debt sworn more than twenty years ago—on Sept. 23, 1932.

H
The facts on which this application is based are sufficiently set out in the judgment which I delivered in regard to Mr. Wilenkin's legal claims and other matters on Feb. 28, 1952 ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1269), and I need not repeat or enlarge on what I there said, only observing that Mr. Wilenkin's claim to have his proof admitted was rejected by me and the liquidator was satisfied that, if it came to a matter of gratuitous payment, £850 would not be incommensurate with the services rendered for which the claim was put forward. If I had admitted Mr. Wilenkin's proof he would, of course, have had to come in with the other creditors and would have had to wait until the time had arrived for a distribution among the creditors. It is anticipated that the amount which the creditors are likely to receive is something in the nature of 10s. in the pound.

A At the hearing in February, 1952, I suggested that, if it was a case of gratuitous payment, it should be dealt with by the registrar, who, when asked to sanction the payment which I am now asked to sanction, expressed the view, and I think the view was well founded, that it was a premature application, the application being in substance to pay approximately fifty per cent. of the £850, not as of right but by way of gratuitous payment. The registrar suggested that the proper course would be to wait and see what the creditors thought because, after all, the proof had been rejected and it was their money which was to be depleted for the purpose of making this proposed ex gratia payment. I agree with, and I think in normal circumstances I should have upheld, the decision of the learned registrar, but it does seem to me that here B we are dealing with a personal problem. Mr. Wilenkin, who became qualified as an advocate in Russia many years ago, has, undoubtedly, been of great assistance in this winding-up, and, indeed, it is suggested that, but for his activities, this matter would never have progressed at all. He laid the foundation for it. However, I am looking not only at the past. It must be remembered C that the liquidator has told me that he considers £850 a fair sum, and I have also to look to the future. I have to realise, and I think it is beyond question, that Mr. Wilenkin's help may be of value in the future as it has been of value to the liquidator in the past. I think that if my decision on this application is not going to be made (and I do not intend it to be made) the basis for future claims—claims for ex gratia or other payments—I am justified in allowing this D payment to be made, but I shall only make it on Mr. Wilenkin's undertaking to continue to serve as a member of the committee of inspection unless prevented by ill health or other unavoidable cause or until he is excused further service by the court. I think an undertaking of that kind will secure to the liquidator, so far as it is possible to secure anything in the nature of a contract of personal service, the continuance of Mr. Wilenkin's valuable assistance.

E On that undertaking being given to the court, and it is an undertaking which I am sure Mr. Wilenkin will observe not only in the letter, but also in the spirit, I will authorise the liquidator to pay Mr. Wilenkin £420 by way of an ex gratia payment, such payment to be made against Mr. Wilenkin's receipt in writing acknowledging the payment to have been made in full satisfaction of all his claims for remuneration or compensation or expenses in connection with the liquidation down to the present date. If a receipt is signed by him in that form, F and if he gives an undertaking in the way in which I have suggested, I will authorise the payment to be made and the liquidator's costs should be the liquidator's costs in the winding-up.

Order accordingly.

CARPENTER v. CAMPBELL AND ANOTHER.

Street Traffic—Licence—Goods vehicle—Offence—Prosecution of driver as well as owner—Undesirability—Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933 (c. 53), s. 1 (1)—Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949 (c. 89), s. 13 (1).

Where a motor vehicle is used at a time when it is not properly licensed the owner alone should be prosecuted for an offence against the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, or the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949. Although it is technically correct for a summons to be issued against the driver of the unlicensed vehicle, this course tends to be oppressive and is undesirable where the driver is the employee of the owner and not responsible for the licensing of the vehicle.

FOR THE VEHICLES (EXCISE) ACT, 1949, s. 13, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 21, p. 1444; and FOR THE ROAD AND RAIL TRAFFIC ACT, 1933, s. 1, see ibid., Vol. 24, p. 675.

CASE STATED by Devon justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Honiton on July 9, 1952, the appellant, William John Carpenter, preferred an information against the first respondent, James Campbell, that he did use a goods vehicle without the appropriate licence, contrary to s. 13 (1) of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, and two further informations against the second respondents, C. D. L. Construction Co., Ltd., (i) that they did use the same vehicle without a proper licence contrary to s. 13 (1) of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, and (ii) that they did use the said vehicle for the carriage of goods in connection with a business carried on by them without a licence granted under Part I of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, contrary to s. 1 (1) of that Act.

It was proved or admitted that the second respondents were the owners of goods vehicles, namely, a lorry and a flat-bottomed four-wheeled trailer attached, which, on Apr. 7, 1952, were each laden, the lorry with a compressor, timber and rubber hose and the trailer with another compressor, two pneumatic drills, and rubber air hose, none of which was built in or permanently attached to the trailer; that there was exhibited in the lorry a road fund C licence showing that the sum of £35 had been paid, being the appropriate duty payable in respect of the lorry; that the first respondent was an employee of the second respondents and was engaged as a driver in charge of the lorry and trailer; that the second respondents were under contract with the Post Office authorities to lay telephone cables, which necessitated breaking up the highway and thereafter filling in and leaving the same in a safe state, and that the load on the trailer was being conveyed from Honiton, where the second respondents were engaged in laying cables, to Axminster for similar works; and that the compressor, pneumatic drills, and rubber air hose on the trailer were used to dig trenches for the purpose of laying the cables.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant (i) that the road fund C licence exhibited in the lorry did not cover the trailer attached thereto, the appropriate duty being £35 for the lorry and £15 for the trailer, and (ii) that the trailer was used for a purpose other than in connection with the construction, maintenance, or repair of roads in that it was not properly constructed for such purpose and was not licensed. It was contended on behalf of the respondents (i) that the first respondent was the servant and acting under the directions of the second respondents, and (ii) that the second respondents could rely on the Road and Rail Traffic Act (Exemption) Regulations, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 1641), reg. 2 (e), on the ground that the trailer was carrying goods used for the breaking up of the road and thereafter for the "construction . . . or repair of roads", so that no licence was required, and, further, that the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, s. 7 (1) (h), relating to the conveyance of road construction machinery applied, and that no additional duty was payable. The justices dismissed the informations.

W. M. F. Hudson for the appellant.

The respondents did not appear.

A LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This case must go back to the justices with an intimation that their decision was wrong, and that it is their duty to convict on both summonses, but the court desires to express its strong disapproval that for an offence of this sort the lorry driver was summoned. The duty to take out the proper licences in respect of vehicles is the duty of the employers, who own the vehicles. This is a well-known company engaged in construction work for the Post Office, and, whether by accident or design, they had not taken out the proper licences, and so made themselves liable to certain excise penalties, but what possible reason—good, bad or indifferent—there was for summoning the lorry driver, I cannot conceive. To multiply summonses in this way and to serve them on the driver, who is no more responsible for the fact that the licence has not been taken out than I am, is an abuse and it is oppressive, and, although we cannot say that, within the technical words, he did not “use” the vehicle, it is most undesirable that he should have been summoned. In sending this case back to the justices to convict the company, we are going to direct them to give an absolute discharge to the driver, and I hope that persons who are responsible for these prosecutions will not in similar cases multiply summonses in this way, but will serve the people responsible and not the people who are not responsible. To indicate our disapproval of what has been done we shall not grant any costs in this case.

CARNILL v. EDWARDS AND OTHERS.

Criminal Law—Vagrancy—Prostitution—Wandering in a public highway—Indecent behaviour in stationary motor car—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (c. 83), s. 3.

A man who was driving a motor car in the centre of Sheffield picked up two prostitutes and drove them to some waste land off a lane in the suburbs of Sheffield, where he stopped and acts of indecency took place in the car. The two prostitutes were acquitted by justices on a charge of wandering in a public highway and behaving in an indecent manner, contrary to s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824.

HELD: at the time when the women committed the acts of indecency they were in the car and could not be said to be wandering in a public highway, and, therefore, they were rightly acquitted.

FOR THE VAGRANCY ACT, 1824, s. 3, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 18, p. 202.

CASE STATED by Sheffield justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Sheffield on June 27, 1952, the appellant, George Alfred Carnill, a superintendent of police, preferred an information against the respondents, Eunice Edwards, Renée Craig, and Albert Aldene Bramall, charging that on Apr. 23, 1952, the respondents Edwards and Craig, being common prostitutes wandering in the public highway, behaved in an indecent manner in a public highway, called Claywheels Lane, contrary to s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and that the respondent Bramall on the same day unlawfully aided, abetted, counselled or procured the respondents Edwards and Craig in the commission of the said acts of indecency, contrary to s. 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848.

By the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 3:

" . . . every common prostitute wandering in the public streets or public highways, or in any place of public resort, and behaving in a riotous or indecent manner . . . shall be deemed an idle and disorderly person . . . "

It was proved or admitted that Edwards and Craig were common prostitutes. On the evening of Apr. 23, 1952, they got into Bramall's motor car in Cambridge Street, in the centre of Sheffield, and were driven by him to Claywheels Lane, a lane in the suburbs of Sheffield, which was not much frequented at that time of the night, arriving there shortly before 11.20 p.m. There, the respondent Bramall drove the car off the roadway for about six yards to waste land at the side of the lane. Acts of indecency took place between Bramall and the two female respondents in the motor car. These acts were not observable except by a person who shone a torch on to the motor car, as did the appellant.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that Edwards and Craig were common prostitutes wandering in a public highway and behaving indecently within the meaning of s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, even though, at the material time, they were in a motor vehicle and that Bramall aided and abetted them in the commission of those offences. It was contended on behalf of Edwards and Craig that as, in fact, they had entered the motor car in Cambridge Street and had journeyed direct to Claywheels Lane and the car had then left the lane and stopped on spare land adjacent thereto, the word "wander" (which must be interpreted "rambling here and there"), being an essential part of the charge, could not apply, since the journey was a fixed one throughout and the two respondents had never alighted from the motor car until ordered to do so by the police after the alleged commission of the acts of indecency. The justices dismissed the information and the appellant appealed.

Leslie for the appellant.

Cumming-Bruce for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the city of Sheffield, before whom three people, two prostitutes and a man, were charged under the Vagrancy Act, 1824. The two women, who were common prostitutes, were charged with wandering in Claywheels Lane and committing an indecent act, and the man was charged with aiding and abetting.

In my opinion, the justices came to a proper decision. I cannot see how it can be said, if a woman accepts an invitation and gets into a motor car, that when she gets to her destination, she is wandering in the street. She is not wandering in the street; she is sitting in the motor car. The justices, therefore, seem to have dismissed this case properly, but I am not sure that I follow their grounds. Their finding was:

“We being of opinion that in the circumstances of the case the prostitutes could not be held to be wandering in a specific street within the meaning of s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, dismissed the said informations.”

If they had said: “We were of opinion that the prostitutes could not be said to be wandering in Claywheels Lane”, I should have agreed, because they were not. They were sitting in a motor car in Claywheels Lane. My only doubt was whether the justices thought a woman must wander in a specific street, but I do not think they did because the section talks about a common prostitute wandering “in the public streets or public highways”, and it does not matter whether she wanders up and down one street or more than one. What, I think, the justices meant to find, and what commends itself to the court, is that in the case of the specific street mentioned in the information, these women were not wandering at all. For these reasons I think that the justices came to a correct determination in point of law and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: I think the justices have arrived at the right conclusion for the wrong reasons.

SPICER v. WARBEY.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Pearson, JJ.), January 16, 1953.]

Case Stated (by Justices)—Amendment—Delay in application—Need of affidavit in support of application—Need to submit draft of Case to respondent.

On July 7, 1952, justices dismissed an information preferred by the appellant against the respondent charging him with the dangerous driving of a motor vehicle, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1). On Sept. 22, 1952, on the application of the appellant, the justices stated a Case, a copy of which was received by the respondent on Sept. 30, 1952. At the hearing of the appeal on Jan. 16, 1953, the respondent complained that the Case was drafted by the appellant, that the draft was not submitted to him before being signed by the justices, and that it omitted essential findings of facts. There was no affidavit by the respondent to support these allegations.

HELD: there was no obligation on the clerk to the justices to submit to the respondent the draft of the Case which had been prepared by the appellant if the justices were satisfied that the facts were fully stated in accordance with their findings; if the respondent thought that the facts, as found by the justices, had not been properly stated in the Case, he should have made an application, supported by an affidavit, to the Divisional Court without delay, asking that the Case might be sent back to the justices for amendment; and, having regard to the delay on the part of the respondent and the absence of an affidavit in support of his allegations, the court would not send the Case back for amendment.

AS TO CASE STATED BY JUSTICES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 21, p. 727, para. 1257; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 33, p. 417, Nos. 1278-1280.

CASE STATED by Hertfordshire justices.

On July 7, 1952, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Hatfield, an information was preferred by the appellant, a superintendent of police, charging the respondent with an offence against the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1), in that, on May 10, 1952, he drove a motor vehicle in Hatfield in a manner dangerous to the public. The justices dismissed the information, and, on Sept. 22, 1952, on an application by the appellant, stated a Case, a copy of which was received by the respondent on Sept. 30, 1952. At the hearing of the Case, the respondent complained that certain facts had been omitted from it.

R. M. O. Havers for the appellant.

H. H. V. Forbes for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Hertford before whom the respondent was charged with driving a motor vehicle in Green Lanes, Hatfield, on May 10, 1952, in a manner dangerous to the public, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1). The information was heard and dismissed on July 7, 1952, and the Case was stated on Sept. 22, 1952. Counsel for the respondent now complains that the Case is not properly stated. He says that the clerk to the justices asked the prosecution to draft the Case and did not submit the draft to the respondent for revision. I do not think that there was any obligation on the clerk to submit the draft to the respondent, although it is done in many cases. If the justices see that the facts are properly and fully stated in accordance with their findings, I do not think that any further revision of the Case is necessary.

If, however, a respondent thinks that certain facts found by the justices—and not merely evidence which was submitted to them—have been omitted from the Case, he can apply to this court for a re-statement of the Case on stating in an affidavit the findings of fact which, in his opinion, have been omitted. The court will then consider whether it should send the Case back to the justices, asking them to re-state it if the facts, which are alleged to have been found by them and omitted from the Case, were, in fact, found by them. But a copy of this Case has been in the possession of the respondent or his advisers since Sept. 30, 1952, and there has been no affidavit by him alleging that any fact found by the justices has not been stated in the Case. We are concerned, not with the evidence given in the case, but with the facts found by the justices, and, unless we are

A satisfied that the justices did find, or must have found, certain facts which they have not put into the Case, we should not send it back to them for amendment. As the Case has been in the hands of the respondent's advisers all these months, we cannot now send it back to the justices for amendment merely on a statement on behalf of the respondent that certain facts have been omitted. It was the

B respondent's duty to act promptly in the matter, and, in the circumstances, the court will not send the Case back for amendment. [After reviewing the facts found by the justices, HIS LORDSHIP held that their finding that the respondent was not guilty of dangerous driving was a perverse finding which the court would not support, and that the Case should be remitted to the justices with an intimation that, on the facts found by them, it was their duty to convict the respondent.]

PERRY v. GARNER.

E Pests—Rats and mice—Destruction—Notice to owner of land—Validity—Instruction to carry out “poison treatment or other work of no less effectual character”—Prevention of Damage by Pests Act, 1949 (c. 55), s. 4 (1).

The respondent was charged under s. 5 (2) of the Prevention of Damage by Pests Act, 1949, with failing to take the steps required by a notice served on him by the local authority under s. 4 (1) of the Act for the

F destruction of rats on land owned and occupied by him. In the notice the following steps were set out for the destruction of the rats and for keeping the land free from rats: “Poison treatment of infested land, such measures to be carried out to the approval of the local authority, or other work, of a not less effectual character, to be executed for the destruction of the rats.”

G HELD: the notice, in prescribing, not only the poison treatment, but also the performance of “other work” (which was not particularised), did not require the respondent to take any “specified” steps within s. 4 (1), and, therefore, it was not a valid notice within the sub-section.

FOR THE PREVENTION OF DAMAGE BY PESTS ACT, 1949, s. 4 (1) and s. 5 (2), and the PUBLIC HEALTH ACT, 1936, s. 290 (3), (4) and (5), see HALSBURY'S

H STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 19, pp. 536, 537, and pp. 468, 469, respectively.

CASE STATED by Buckingham justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Princes Risborough the appellant, John Percival Perry, chief sanitary inspector of the Wycombe Rural District Council, preferred an information against the respondent, Charles Aubrey Garner, charging him that he failed to take the steps set out in a notice served by the rural district council of Wycombe and requiring him, as occupier of certain land, to take such steps as were specified in the notice for the destruction of rats on the land and for keeping the land free from rats, contrary to the Prevention of Damage by Pests Act, 1949, s. 5 (2).

It was proved or admitted that the respondent was the occupier of a field on which were a straw rick and the remnants of a corn rick. The appellant inspected the land on dates in December, 1951, and found severe infestation by rats. He informed the respondent of his duties and liabilities under the Prevention of Damage by Pests Act, 1949, both orally and by letter. In January, 1952, after threshing the corn rick and baling and taking away the straw from the straw rick, the appellant ignited the remains of both ricks, but the fire was put out by the fire brigade before the two ricks were completely destroyed. On Feb. 4 the notice mentioned above was served on the respondent. It expired on Feb. 20, and during the intervening period the respondent did not carry out any poison treatment. On Feb. 20 the appellant visited the land and found evidence of infestation by rats, and there was further evidence of infestation on dates up to Mar. 14.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the respondent had failed to take any of the steps required by the notice within the time specified, and, therefore, an offence had been committed. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that it was dangerous to use poison on the land in question; that he had taken other no less effectual steps prior to the service of the notice; that the rat holes were old and disused; and that any rats seen on the land came from adjoining land for which he was not responsible. The justices dismissed the information.

Widgery for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Buckingham before whom the respondent was summoned for failing to take steps to destroy rats and to keep land free from rats, pursuant to a notice served under the Prevention of Damage by Pests Act, 1949.

The facts show that the local authority were satisfied that for some period these premises had been infested with rats, and I daresay they were right. They served a notice on the respondent requiring him to take certain steps, to which I will refer in a moment. He did not appeal against this notice, and he was subsequently prosecuted because, it was said, he had disregarded the notice that was served on him. Section 5 (2) of the Act provides that, if a person fails to take steps which the local authority can require him to take under s. 4, he shall be "liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding in the case of a first offence £50, and in the case of a second or any subsequent offence £100."

I do not think the actual point which the court has taken in this matter was argued below, but whether it was argued below or not, it is a point that arises on the face of the Case. The justices, having stated the facts proved before them, say:

"We, being of opinion that the prosecution had failed to discharge the onus of proof, dismissed the said information", and they ask us whether or not they were right in dismissing the information. The point that the court has taken in this matter is this. Section 4 provides:

"(1) If in the case of any land it appears to the local authority, whether in consequence of a notice given in respect of the land under the last foregoing section or otherwise, that steps should be taken for the destruction of rats or mice on the land or otherwise for keeping the land free from rats and mice, they may serve on the owner or occupier of the land a notice requiring him to take, within such reasonable period as may be specified in the notice, such reasonable steps for the purpose aforesaid as may be so specified . . .

(5) Sub-sections (3) to (5) of s. 290 of the Public Health Act, 1936 (which provide for an appeal to a court of summary jurisdiction against certain notices requiring the execution of works under that Act) shall apply to any notice served under this section requiring the carrying out of any structural works as they apply to any such notice as is mentioned in sub-s. (1) of that section . . .”

A That only applies to structural works and not to such a notice as this. Therefore, the owner must comply with the notice or else he commits an offence, and he has no means of appealing against the notice. The notice in this case requires the owner to take the following steps (for the destruction of rats on the said land and for keeping the said land free from rats), that is to say,

B “poison treatment of infested land, such measures to be carried out to the approval of the local authority, or other work, of a not less effectual character, to be executed for the destruction of the rats.”

C In the opinion of this court, that is not specifying the steps which are to be taken. It specifies a step which the owner may take and it tells him he may take other steps which they do not specify. The thing required to be done at once becomes unspecified because it says the owner is to do a particular thing or something else and the something else is left completely at large. I do not think, therefore, it can be said that this notice complies with the section. If it had confined itself to poison treatment, it would have complied with the section, but as it does not confine itself to poison treatment, but says that the owner is to put down poison or do something else which it does not specify, in my opinion, this is not a good notice under the Act. Accordingly, I think the prosecution fails
D in limine, and the justices were right in not convicting.

PRESCOTT v. LANCASHIRE UNITED TRANSPORT CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Morris, L.J.J.), December 16, 1952.]

Negligence—Omnibus—Passenger injured while alighting—Omnibus stopping short of request stop—No warning by conductor.

The plaintiff and her husband were travelling on the defendants' omnibus. The plaintiff's husband told the conductor that they wished to alight at the next request stop, and the conductor rang the bell and told him to wait until the bus stopped. Owing to road works and traffic conditions the bus stopped twenty or twenty-five yards short of the request stop, as the driver was waiting for an oncoming vehicle to pass. Unknown to the driver and conductor, but known to the plaintiff and her husband, it had for some time been customary for other buses to stop for passengers to alight at that point, on account of the road works, and the plaintiff and her husband, assuming that the bus had stopped for them to alight, proceeded to do so. As the plaintiff was alighting, the bus re-started as the road was then clear, and the plaintiff was thrown to the ground and injured. The conductor took no step to warn the plaintiff that the stop had not been reached.

HELD: the conductor had been negligent in not warning the plaintiff that the stop had not been reached or in not taking steps to ensure either that she be prevented from alighting or that the bus be prevented from re-starting, and, accordingly, the defendants were liable in damages.

APPEAL by the plaintiff, Mrs. Prescott, from an order of His Honour JUDGE RHODES, made at Leigh County Court, on Sept. 19, 1952, whereby he dismissed the plaintiff's claim against the defendants for damages for negligence.

Pigot for the plaintiff.

R. H. Forrest for the defendants.

SINGLETON, L.J. : I will ask MORRIS, L.J., to give the first judgment.

MORRIS, L.J. : This is an appeal from the judgment of His Honour JUDGE RHODES given at Leigh County Court in a remitted action in which the plaintiff, Mrs. Prescott, claimed damages against the owners of a motor omnibus in which she was travelling on the evening of Dec. 16, 1950. The plaintiff was with her husband, and they intended to alight at a stop in Church Street almost opposite to the Manor Arms Hotel. Owing to certain work which was being done in Church Street there were obstructions in the road, and those obstructions were marked by red lights. The bus was a single-decker bus, and it was full; the conductor said that all the seats were occupied and that five or eight people were standing. The bus was of the kind access to which, and egress from which, is by means of a door near the front. The case for the plaintiff was that, a signal to stop having been given, the bus did stop; that the plaintiff's husband alighted and did so in safety; and that the plaintiff was proceeding to follow her husband when the bus re-started and she was thrown to the ground and received injuries. Because of the work that was being done in Church Street, it had happened that buses approaching the stop almost opposite the Manor Arms Hotel had over a period of time stopped somewhat short of the official stopping place. That circumstance was known to the plaintiff and to her husband. It was, however, in fact, not known to the driver and the conductor on this particular bus.

It was the case for the defendants that the bus never stopped at all. It was

A said that the bus slowed down and was being driven at a very moderate speed, described as a crawl, but that it never came to a stop. That was a very important issue on the facts, and the learned judge resolved that issue by deciding that the bus did stop. There is no doubt that what happened was that the plaintiff's husband intimated that he and his wife wished to alight at the stop opposite the Manor Arms Hotel, and so informed the conductor. The conductor said in his evidence that after leaving the Red Lion, which was the last stop, he closed the door, and then he said that the plaintiff's husband told him that he was wanting to get off at the next stop, and the conductor said, "I rang the bell and told him to wait until the bus stopped." On the judge's findings, there is no doubt as to what did happen, and it was a most unfortunate occurrence. Because of the work that was being done on the road, and because of the obstruction, it was not possible, or not desirable, for two vehicles to pass at a certain place. As B the driver of the bus proceeded in the direction of the Manor Arms Hotel stop, some vehicle approached him and he, doubtless very wisely, thought it better to give way to the other vehicle, and in the result he stopped, and he stopped at a point some twenty to twenty-five yards from the official stop, and according to the plaintiff's husband when he stopped he was right into the kerb. In fact, he C had stopped because of the oncoming vehicle, and when the road was clear, without receiving any further bell, he went on and then stopped at the official stop. The driver said that he was not aware of any accident until he was informed when the bus stopped.

D It seems to me that once the crucial question of fact is decided as to whether the bus did or did not stop, that then the issue as to liability is made very much clearer in this case. In no sense, in my view, did the plaintiff do anything wrong. She, through her husband, had intimated her desire to get off the bus and asked that the bus should stop at the next stopping place, and she, with her husband, was told by the conductor, who rang the bell at their request, to wait until the bus stopped. The bus did stop; the husband got off; the wife proceeded to do so, not unnaturally; and then the bus proceeded to move on. The conductor, E being in a single-decker bus, doubtless had the difficulties that are inevitable when the bus is crowded, but the conductor does not say in his evidence that he did not know the position of the bus at the time of stopping; he, apparently, did not do anything in the way of calling out. He says that he knew that the door was closed before the bus left the Red Lion because he closed it, and thereafter having heard someone shout "Oh" he saw that the door was open; he, apparently, F had not noticed anyone opening the door.

F The learned judge, according to the notes of his judgment taken by counsel for both parties, having found very definitely that the bus stopped, went on to say, according to the note of counsel for the plaintiff, as follows: "The bus stopped and the plaintiff's husband made a genuine mistake." By that he means that the plaintiff's husband thought that that was the stop that was being used that day by the bus in lieu of the official stop, because other buses for some time, on account of the work being done, had chosen a stop some yards away from the official stop. The learned judge went on, according to counsel's note: G

"I cannot see the driver was in any way to blame. He was entrusting the safety of passengers to the conductor. It was a genuine mistake; the plaintiff has failed to show negligence."

H Then he went on to assess damages.

The learned judge does not appear, from the notes of the judgment which are before us, to have dealt with the allegation that there was negligence in the conductor. In my judgment, it is not shown that the driver in these circumstances did anything that he ought not to have done, or omitted to do anything that he should have done; but, in my judgment, it is shown that there was a failure on the part of the conductor. When the conductor said to the plaintiff's husband, "Wait until the bus stops", having been asked to ring the bell, that seemed a very clear invitation to the plaintiff and her husband to alight when the bus did stop. When the bus did stop and when it stopped short of the stopping place, the conductor, in my judgment, ought either to have warned the passengers, or ought to have communicated with the driver in some way. It would be easily possible to inform the driver that passengers were getting off the bus. The conductor ought, in my judgment, to have taken control. The conductor could clearly have seen that the plaintiff's husband had got off the bus. There were others waiting to get off. That could have been seen by the conductor. The plaintiff was following her husband. In my judgment, the conductor ought to have given a warning, or ought to have taken charge of the situation so as to ensure either that the plaintiff should be prevented from getting off the bus or that the bus should be prevented from going on while passengers were in the act of alighting.

We were referred by counsel for the plaintiff to a number of authorities. Many of the cases must depend on their own particular facts. One of the cases to which we were referred is the case of Mottram v. South Lancashire Transport Co. (1). In that case:

"The respondent was a passenger on one of the appellants' trolley buses. She was following another passenger off the bus at a request stop, at the time when the conductress was collecting fares on the upper deck of the bus. The other passenger rang the bell once and the bus slowed down, but just as he was getting off, thinking he was acting in the interest of everyone, he rang the bell twice as a signal for the bus to proceed. The respondent proceeded to alight after him, but, the bus picking up speed at that moment, she was thrown to the ground and injured. In an action for damages for such injuries, it was contended that the conductress was negligent in not coming to the platform as soon as she heard the bell ring once, so that she might supervise the re-starting of the bus," and it was held that there was no negligence on the part of the conductress.

In the course of his judgment, GODDARD, L.J., said this ([1942] 2 All E.R. 453):

"After the man had given the signal for the bus to stop, and if the bus had stopped, it would have been the duty of the conductress to see that no one else was getting off before giving the signal for the bus to start again. In this case the bus never did stop. Before it could stop, the officious passenger gave the signal for the bus to start again."

On the facts in the present case, once the bus did stop the plaintiff was acting quite properly in alighting; she was alighting pursuant to the invitation of the conductor to alight when the bus stopped, and the conductor should thereafter have seen what was happening. He should have given some warning; he should so have directed and controlled the whole situation that the bus would not proceed to move off while another passenger was alighting from it.

I consider, therefore, that on the finding of the learned judge the result should have followed that there was liability in the defendants, and that there should have been judgment against the defendants for the amount of the damages assessed by the learned judge.

LLOYD v. SINGLETON.

Street Traffic—Driving uninsured motor vehicle—Permitting motor vehicle to be used on road without policy of insurance being in force—Permission by person in charge of vehicle, not the owner—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (1).

The respondent was charged with permitting a person to use on a road a motor vehicle, in relation to the user of which by that person there was not in force a policy of insurance in respect of third-party risks, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1). The vehicle in question belonged to a company, by whom the respondent was employed, and there was in force in relation to it a policy of insurance in the name of the managing director of the company which covered persons who had his permission to drive. The respondent had been given full discretion himself to use the vehicle for his work or to allow other employees of the company to use it in the course of the company's business. The respondent permitted his brother, who was neither an employee of the company nor engaged on the company's business, to drive the vehicle.

HELD: the offence of permitting a person to use a motor vehicle contrary to s. 35 (1) could be committed by anyone who was in charge of the vehicle, and not only by the owner, and, therefore, on the facts stated the respondent was guilty of the offence charged.

CASE STATED by Southport justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Southport the appellant, William Herbert Lloyd, deputy chief constable of Southport, preferred an information against the respondent, Orme Fitzgerald Singleton, charging that on Sept. 9, 1951, the respondent did permit Charles Eric Singleton to use on a road a motor vehicle in relation to the user of which by the said Charles Eric Singleton there was no policy of insurance in force in respect of third-party risks, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1).

It was proved or admitted that on the night of Sept. 8/9 the respondent, who was feeling unwell, asked his brother, Charles Eric Singleton, to drive a motor vehicle, JTE 488, from Birkdale to the place where it was usually kept. On that journey the driver was stopped and could not produce a certificate of insurance covering his use of the vehicle. The vehicle was owned by a company called Axforde, Ltd., of which the respondent was the assistant general manager, and on Sept. 8 and 9 there was in force a policy of insurance in the name of Jack Rubin, managing director of Axforde, covering any person driving the vehicle with Rubin's permission. The respondent used the vehicle for his work and drove it with the permission of Rubin. He was in general charge and control of the vehicle, and had full discretion as to its use, provided it was being used in the company's business or by the company's employees. Charles Eric Singleton was not an employee of the company and had not been given permission to drive the car by Rubin.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that any person who had control of a motor vehicle was in a position to forbid or to permit another person to use the vehicle within the meaning of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1), and that certain obiter dicta in Goodbarne v. Buck (1) ([1940] 1 All E.R. 613) did not apply. Williamson v. O'Keefe (2) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 307) was also cited. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that dicta in Goodbarne v. Buck (1) applied.

The justices dismissed the information.

Boydell for the appellant.

Binney for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: It is clear that the justices came to a wrong decision, although I can well understand their difficulty because of a passage in a judgment of MACKINNON, L.J., which with I shall deal in a moment.

The charge against the respondent was permitting his brother to use a certain motor vehicle without an insurance policy being in force in relation to that user. The facts found by the justices show that this car belonged to a company called Axfords, Ltd. It was insured by a Mr. Rubin, who was the managing director of Axfords, Ltd. The respondent was the assistant manager, and he was allowed to drive the car on the company's business, and had full discretion as to permitting the use of the car and who was to drive the car so long as it was being used for the business of the company or another company of which Mr. Rubin was also managing director. So long as the car was being used by persons in the employment of the company on the company's business, it was a lawful user which the respondent was entitled to permit, and one which would be covered by the insurance policy. On the night in question the respondent seems to have been taken ill, and he asked his brother, who had nothing to do with the companies, to drive the car home. The brother had no policy of insurance, and Mr. Rubin's policy of insurance would not cover him because he was not employed by the company and was not driving on the service of the company.

The justices dismissed the charge because a dictum of MACKINNON, L.J., in Goodbarne v. Buck (1) was cited to them which, it is clear, the learned lord justice uttered per incuriam. It was only a dictum, and obviously he went further than he need have done and was not thinking of the particular circumstances that arose in the present case. In Goodbarne v. Buck (1) two brothers were engaged in a very disreputable transaction. W. E. Buck was short of money, and he borrowed some money from his brother, H. A. Buck. H. A. Buck lent his brother the money, no doubt to buy a car, but, when W. E. Buck had bought the car, it was his car and not H. A. Buck's car. W. E. Buck was driving the car and ran over and killed somebody. The dead person's representative sought to recover damages from H. A. Buck on the ground that he had permitted his brother to drive the car which would have been covered by a policy which he, H. A. Buck, had taken out. This policy had been taken out in the name of H. A. Buck when he was not the owner of the car, but W. E. Buck was, and the insurance company repudiated the policy, so the car was wholly uninsured. The reason why H. A. Buck was not liable in that case was because he was not the owner of the car, but his brother, who was driving the car, was the owner, and was driving his own car. Therefore, it could not be said that H. A. Buck was permitting his own brother to drive the car because it was his brother's and he could drive it without any permission. In giving judgment MACKINNON, L.J., said ([1940] 1 All E.R. 616):

"In order to make a person liable for permitting another person to use a motor vehicle, it is obvious that he must be in a position to forbid the other person to use the motor vehicle."

Everybody would agree with that, and, if the learned lord justice had stopped there, no difficulty would have arisen, but he said (ibid.):

“As at present advised, I can see no ground on which anybody can be in a position to forbid another person to use a motor vehicle except . . . where the person charged is the owner of the car.”

If this had been a reserved judgment, which it was not, no doubt either the
A learned lord justice or the other members of the court would have pointed out that, of course, the situation can arise which arose here, namely, that the car is entrusted by the owner to a driver authorised by him who has the care, management and control of the car, and that person is entitled to permit certain people to drive but not others. In the present case the respondent was entitled to permit employees of the companies to drive, but he was not entitled to
B permit any other persons to do so. In the course of the argument I put the illustration of a man, owning a car and employing a chauffeur, who leaves his car in the care of the chauffeur. If, when the master is not in the car, the chauffeur allows somebody else to drive it, the chauffeur is permitting the use of it. The master is not permitting the use of it because he does not know it is being used. He has given no authority to the chauffeur to allow other people
C to drive. In the ordinary way he would forbid the chauffeur to allow anybody else to drive, but, whether the chauffeur is actually forbidden or not, he is the person who permits the driving, and that case was not in the lord justice's mind when he uttered the dictum. When giving an ex tempore judgment, he did not think of all the various permutations which could arise.

In the present case, though I can well understand that the justices thought
D they were bound to follow that dictum, the court feels obliged to say that they do not agree with it. They do agree with what he said, that

In this case it is clear that the respondent was in a position to forbid his brother
E to drive, but instead of that he requested him to drive. This case must go back to the justices with an intimation that they did not come to a correct determination in point of law, and they must now consider the policy and come to a conclusion whether or not the car was insured.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: The Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1), F provides:

“Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, it shall not be lawful for any person to use, or to cause or permit any other person to use, a motor vehicle . . .”

which, to put it shortly, is uninsured against third party risks—in this case
G the respondent did permit somebody else to do this, and the sheet anchor of counsel for the respondent is some of the observations of MACKINNON, L.J., in Goodbarne v. Buck (1). Those observations were clearly obiter, and I concur in my Lord's view that they must have crept into that judgment, which is not a reserved judgment, per incuriam.

Counsel's other argument is that in this case what was done did not amount
H to “permission”, but he did not convince me. I agree with the judgment which has been proposed by my Lord.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Pearson, JJ.), January 19, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Appeal—Substitution of verdict—Substitution of verdict of guilty of offence of which appellant acquitted—Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (c. 23), s. 5 (2).

Where, on an indictment containing a count charging breaking and entering and stealing and another count charging receiving, the jury returned a verdict of not guilty of breaking and entering and larceny, but guilty of receiving, the Court of Criminal Appeal has no power, under s. 5 (2) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, to substitute a verdict of guilty of breaking and entering and larceny for that of guilty of receiving.

AS TO THE POWER OF THE COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL TO ALTER THE VERDICT OF A JURY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, p. 278, para. 405; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 14, pp. 548, 549, Nos. 6216-6232.

(2) R. v. Smith, (1923), 17 Cr. App. Rep. 133; 14 Digest 548, 6229.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellants, Charles Melvin and Clement Eden, were convicted at the Central Criminal Court on a count in an indictment which charged them with receiving stolen property. They were acquitted on a count charging breaking and entering.

At about 10.40 p.m. on Aug. 22, 1952, the police, who had received information that the offices of British European Airways at Ruislip had been broken and entered, were waiting at a yard close to King's Cross. A lorry drove up containing three men (two of whom were the appellants) and also three safes and certain housebreaking tools.

The ground of the appeal was that in the court below the case against the appellants had been put as one of breaking and entering and larceny and not as one of receiving, and that there had been no direction as to receiving.

J. C. G. Burge for the appellants.

E. Clarke for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. In the opinion of the court this appeal must succeed. In giving that decision the court gives it with the same reluctance that the court expressed in R. v. Evans (1). We cannot, in fact, distinguish this case from R. v. Evans, which, with all respect, we think was rightly decided.

The difficulty is that the case was put forward to the jury simply as being that these men were the people who had broken into the offices in question and had driven away with the property in possession of which they were found. Their defence was an alibi, certainly not of a very satisfactory character, and, if the jury had believed it, it is difficult to understand how they could even have found the appellants guilty of receiving. But, the case having been presented from first to last as a case in which the appellants were the actual thieves and the learned commissioner having summed up the case exceedingly well and carefully on that footing, for some reason or another the jury came back with a verdict of not guilty of breaking and entering, but guilty of receiving. No one had said anything about receiving from beginning to end. The learned commissioner had said a word in the course of his summing-up about the charge of receiving, but only for the purpose of telling the jury to disregard it.

The only question that arises is whether this court has power to substitute a verdict of guilty of breaking and entering and larceny which, if the jury had thought that the appellants were the criminals, was the verdict they ought to have found instead of the verdict which they did find. In our opinion, the court has no such power. Section 5 (2) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, provides:

- A "Where an appellant has been convicted of an offence and the jury could on the indictment have found him guilty of some other offence, and on the finding of the jury it appears to the Court of Criminal Appeal that the jury must have been satisfied of facts which proved him guilty of that other offence, the court may, instead of allowing or dismissing the appeal, substitute for the verdict found by the jury a verdict of guilty of that other offence, and pass such sentence in substitution for the sentence passed at the trial as may be warranted in law for that other offence, not being a sentence of greater severity."

- In our opinion, that sub-section would enable the court, for instance, in a case where a jury have returned a verdict of guilty of obtaining by false pretences and the evidence shows that it really should have been a verdict of guilty of larceny, to substitute the latter verdict for that relating to false pretences,
- C or, if a person has been found guilty of larceny as a bailee, it may be that he ought to have been convicted of fraudulent conversion. In R. v. Evans (1) we get an exactly parallel case to the present case. In that case there was a count for larceny and a count for receiving, and the jury acquitted of larceny, but convicted of receiving. The court said they could not substitute the alternative verdict because that would be to substitute for themselves a verdict
- D which the jury not only refused to find but which was one of acquittal. I think that must be the explanation of the decision in R. v. Smith (2) where the jury returned a verdict of receiving in a case in which the only possible verdict was one of stealing. The prisoner had been seen to steal the goods, and yet the jury found him guilty of receiving. We think that in that case, although LORD HEWART, C.J., referred to a verdict which the jury refused
- E to find, the jury had not found a verdict of not guilty on the larceny count in the indictment. They seem not to have found a verdict on that at all. I suppose they simply came back and said that they found the prisoner guilty of receiving. The court there did substitute a verdict of guilty of larceny.

- If we could substitute a verdict in the present case, we should undoubtedly do so because the court cannot feel any doubt as to the guilt of these men,
- F but, the jury having returned a verdict of not guilty of larceny and guilty of receiving, we are of opinion that, as the verdict relating to receiving cannot stand, we have no option to take any course but to quash the conviction, although we do so with great reluctance.

Appeal allowed.

MOTION to quash an indictment.

The defendants, Cyril Aubert Potter and Wilfred Burgon Gowers, were charged on an indictment with conspiracy, the particulars being:

between Mar. 20 and 25, 1949, in the West Riding division of the county of York conspired together and with one John George Saint to enter into an unlawful, corrupt and secret bargain with the said Saint whereby, in consideration of the firm of Wilfred B. Gowers and Co., chartered accountants, guaranteeing the payment to the said Saint of £900 in discharge of his claim for £1,200 as a debenture holder against the Rockingham Plate & Cutlery Co., Ltd., the said Saint agreed to support the scheme offered to the debenture holders of the said company whereunder they were to receive 8s. in the £ on their debentures."

Veale, Q.C., and R. W. Payne for the Crown.

Drabble for the defendant, Potter.

G. D. Roberts, Q.C., and Leslie for the defendant, Gowers.

Before the arraignment of the defendants their counsel moved to quash the indictment.

Roberts, Q.C.: The indictment should be quashed because the facts alleged in the particulars do not constitute any offence known to the law. There is no allegation of fraud or dishonesty or an intent to injure anyone or that anyone has been injured or lost money, or that there was an inequitable distribution of the company's assets, or that there was a public mischief or a perversion of public justice or any breach of public morality. It is alleged that a recalcitrant debenture holder was guaranteed an additional 7s. in the £ on his debentures, not from the company's assets but from an outside source, on condition that he agreed to support a scheme whereby all the debenture holders were to agree to a composition of 8s. in the £. It is not suggested that Saint received the money at the expense of any creditor or debenture holder of the company. There has been no prosecution remotely resembling this before. The classifications of conspiracy are set out in ARCHBOLD'S CRIMINAL PLEADING, EVIDENCE AND PRACTICE, 32nd ed., at pp. 1442 et seq. The indictment does not allege either the first or second class, namely, a conspiracy to commit any offence punishable by law or to cheat and defraud. As regards the third class, although there are many dicta in old books and cases to the effect that an agreement to do an unlawful act is a criminal conspiracy (e.g. R. v. Rowlands (1) where the dicta of LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., are far too wide), modern text-books and writers agree that such an agreement is not a criminal conspiracy unless it is fraudulent or done with intent to injure. The debenture holders could upset the agreement if they did not know of the money paid from the outside source, but an agreement to do merely an unenforceable or void act is not indictable. ARCHBOLD (op. cit.) states it is enough if the acts agreed to be done are wrongful, i.e., amount to a civil wrong, but, as regards the cases cited in support of this proposition, R. v. Warburton (2) was a case of fraud and in R. v. Whitaker (3), LAWRENCE, J. ([1914] 3 K.B. 1299) states that it is clear that where the tort is one of fraud or corruption an agreement to commit it is a crime at common law. Neither tort nor fraud is alleged here. It is alleged that the bargain was corrupt, but it does not say who was the corruptor and who was corrupted. Corruption is largely a creation of statute: see ARCHBOLD op. cit. pp. 1417-1440; and it is not suggested that there was any agent or any principal or that any agent was corrupted not to do his duty. It may be sought to support the indictment on the basis that a fraudulent preference is alleged in which case the act in fraud of the law is to prevent the distribution of the bankrupt's property rateably among all his creditors. A fraudulent preference may not involve moral blame: (Re Patrick & Lyon, Ltd. (4) [1933] Ch. 790), and the use of the word "fraudulent" is misleading because fraud is not a necessary ingredient and from the point of view of accuracy the phrase "voidable preference" is to be preferred: see WILLIAMS ON BANKRUPTCY, 16th ed., at p. 361. "Unlawful" has various meanings, but an agreement which is merely unlawful because it is void or unenforceable is not a conspiracy. The word does not mean "indictable": see Mogul S.S. Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (5) (23 Q.B.D. 626 and [1892] A.C. 39, 46, 51 and 58). (He also referred to HARRISON'S LAW OF CONSPIRACY (1924), at p. 96 and STROUD'S JUDICIAL DICTIONARY, 3rd ed., and WHARTON'S LAW LEXICON, 14th ed., at p. 239 sub. tit. "Conspiracy".) The present case clearly does not fall within either ARCHBOLD'S fourth or fifth class and the indictment discloses no offence known to the law. A

Drabble: The Bankruptcy Acts do not make a fraudulent preference criminal and it is not a common law fraud. If two partners agree inter se to break a contract entered into between themselves and another party, such an agreement is void, but they are not guilty of a tort or a crime. [CASSELS, J., referred to Mulcahy v. R. (6)]. This agreement was not unlawful save in the sense that it was unenforceable and voidable. (He referred to ROSCOE'S CRIMINAL EVIDENCE, 16th ed., sub. tit. "Conspiracy", and KENNY'S OUTLINES OF CRIMINAL LAW, 16th ed., at pp. 341, 342). B

Veale, Q.C.: The indictment alleges a conspiracy to do an unlawful act. If the word "fraud" had been used it would have been contended that I had to prove dishonesty as in a charge of false pretences. There is a long line of cases which describe this sort of conduct. Cockshott v. Bennett (7) (2 Term Rep. 765) states that such an agreement "is bottomed in fraud, which is a species of immorality". [CASSELS, J.: In that case the debtor entered into the bargain]. Jackson v. Lomas (8), Jackman v. Mitchell (9), Knight v. Hunt (10), Higgins v. Pitt (11), Mare v. Sandford (12), McKewan v. Sanderson (13), Re Milner. Ex p. Milner (14) and Re McHenry (15) ([1894] 3 Ch. 371, 375), are authorities for describing such an agreement as "a fraud", "a cheat", "bribery", "corrupt", "vicious", and "a matter in which the public are interested". A man who enters into a composition is not to be deceived as the creditors are influenced by the supposition that all of them are to suffer equally. In Knight v. Hunt (10) and in Re Milner (14) the consideration came from an outside source. Such an agreement is unlawful in the sense of being contrary to law, and it is also wrongful and harmful and, therefore, a conspiracy as defined by LORD BRAMPTON in Quinn v. Leathem (16) ([1901] A.C. 528). It is also an agreement to commit a criminal offence as tending to the public mischief: cf. Jackman v. Mitchell (9), Mare v. Sandford (12), R. v. Bassey (17) and R. v. Porter (18). It is also an agreement to commit a civil wrong: R. v. Whitaker (3) ([1914] 3 K.B. 1299). See also RUSSELL ON CRIME, 10th ed., vol. 2, p. 1822. C

Drabble replied.

CASSELS, J.: The court is being asked, before the defendants are arraigned on this indictment, to quash the indictment on the ground that it discloses no offence according to the law. I have listened to arguments on both sides and many authorities have been cited. In my opinion, this indictment does disclose an offence which is known to the law, namely, conspiracy. I, therefore, hold that I cannot accede to the application of the defendants to quash this indictment, and, therefore, the defendants must be arraigned on this indictment. G

DAWSON v. EUXINE SHIPPING CO., LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (McNair, J.), January 14, 15, 1953.]

Dock—Safe means of access to ship—Gangway—Docks Regulations, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 279), reg. 9.

A The plaintiff, a lighterman, while going to the wharf from a ship, the loading of which he was superintending, slipped on the gangway of the ship and injured his shoulder. In an action by him against the owners of the ship, for breach of statutory duty under reg. 9 of the Docks Regulations, 1934, which provides: "If a ship is lying at a wharf . . . for the purpose of loading . . . there shall be safe means of access for the use of persons employed at such times as they have to pass from the ship to the shore or from the shore to the ship as follows:—(a) Where reasonably practicable the ship's accommodation ladder or a gangway or a similar construction not less than twenty-two inches wide, properly secured, and fenced throughout on each side to a clear height of two feet nine inches by means of upper and lower rails, taut ropes or chains or by other equally safe means . . . (b) In other cases a ladder of sound material and adequate length which shall be properly secured to prevent slipping."

D HELD: the defendants did not escape the charge of breach of statutory duty merely by proof that they had provided a gangway which satisfied reg. 9 (a), for the obligation imposed by reg. 9 was that there should be "safe means of access" and the words of paras. (a) and (b) were not words of limitation, but prescribed what must be done in addition to the provision of a safe means of access; in fact, the gangway provided a safe means of access within the meaning of reg. 9; and, therefore, there was no breach of statutory duty by the defendants.

FOR THE DOCKS REGULATIONS, 1934, reg. 9, see HALSBURY'S STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, Vol. 8, p. 165.

E ACTION for damages for breach of statutory duty or breach of common law duty.

F The plaintiff, a licensed lighterman employed in the Port of London, was engaged in the loading of a ship at a wharf. It was his duty on board the ship to marshal the barges into the right position under the holds of the ship so that bags of sugar could be loaded in her, and generally to superintend the loading. On Feb. 22, 1951, during working hours, as he was leaving the ship to visit his employers' office on the wharf, he slipped on the gangway leading from the ship to the wharf and injured his right shoulder.

W. G. Wingate for the plaintiff.

Berryman, Q.C., and H. P. B. Dow for the defendants.

G McNAIR, J.: The plaintiff, who was a licensed lighterman in the Port of London and a freeman of the river, employed by Messrs. Silvertown Services, Ltd., brings this action against the defendants as owners of the s.s. Henzee, claiming that on Feb. 22, 1951, he suffered an accident when he slipped on a gangway leading from the ship's rail to the deck of Symonds Wharf, by reason whereof he tore a tendon of his right shoulder, with the result that he was unable to do any work at all from Feb. 23 until Oct. 1, 1951, and was rendered incapable

H ever thereafter of performing his work as a lighterman. The basis of his claim against the defendants is twofold. First, he relies on a breach of statutory duty, the duty being contained in reg. 9 of the Docks Regulations, 1934, made under s. 79 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. Alternatively, he alleges a breach of the common law duty owed by the defendants as occupiers of the Henzee towards him as an invitee. But, whichever way the claim is put, the real issue in the case, as it seems to me and as has been agreed by counsel, is as to the state of the cross treads of the gangway which at the material time ran from the deck of Symonds Wharf to the ship's rail at an angle of about forty-five degrees.

On Feb. 22, 1951, the plaintiff went on board the Henzee which was then loading outwards at Symonds Wharf. His duty on board was to marshal the barges which were bringing bagged sugar up to Symonds Wharf, and he was responsible for seeing that the barges were put in the right position under the holds which were being worked, attending to the ropes from time to time, and generally superintending the loading of the sugar from the barges into the ship—superintending in the sense that it was his responsibility to see whether the bags that came out from the barges were leaking and damaged before they reached the ship, in which case he would return them to the barge, and that it was his function to receive the receipts for the cargo from the ship's clerk. The actual physical operation of loading was performed by stevedores and shore cranes.

The first question which was raised was whether a lighterman so engaged was a "person employed" within the meaning of the definition in the Docks Regulations. It was submitted by counsel for the plaintiff that the plaintiff was such a person, and it is conceded (and I think clearly rightly conceded) by counsel for the defendants that the plaintiff did fall within that definition.

The accident occurred in this way. The plaintiff, who had been on the wharf at the beginning of the day's work, had gone on board by a gangway on one or two occasions during the early part of the morning, and he remained at the other side of the ship where the loading was going on until somewhere about 11.30 in the morning. He then had occasion to go ashore on his employers' business—in order to speak to the office, I think—and, when he came to the gangway, he found that it was, by reason of the fact that the tide was by that time about two and a half hours flood, down to the wharf at an angle of forty-five degrees. When he stepped on the gangway, he slipped. He held on with his right hand to a rope which ran down the right hand side of the gangway looking down and threw extra strain on the muscles and tendons of his right shoulder, and, although at the time he did not think that the injury was in any way serious (indeed, he was able to continue his work during that day), it turned out that he had damaged his shoulder severely and was off work in the way I have recounted. He went down to the bottom of the gangway, and in due course the accident was reported.

The first question is whether there has been a breach of reg. 9 of the Docks Regulations, which provides:

"If a ship is lying at a wharf . . . for the purpose of loading . . . there shall be safe means of access for the use of persons employed at such times as they have to pass from the ship to the shore or from the shore to the ship as follows:—(a) Where reasonably practicable the ship's accommodation ladder or a gangway or a similar construction not less than twenty-two inches wide, properly secured, and fenced throughout on each side to a clear height of two feet nine inches by means of upper and lower rails, taut ropes or chains or by other equally safe means . . . (b) In other cases a ladder of sound material and adequate length which shall be properly secured to prevent slipping."

The gangway in question, by reason of its dimensions, satisfied para. (a). It was twenty-four feet long and two feet, six inches, wide, and there were across the floor of the gangway cross treads, twelve inches apart, composed of battens which were said to be battens of hardwood one and a quarter inches square. Along either side of this gangway there were iron stanchions some three feet apart, and through a ring at the top of those iron stanchions there ran a rope, while through rings half way down there ran a second rope. The first question which was debated was whether, by satisfying para. (a), the defendants had wholly satisfied the obligation imposed on them by reg. 9. In my judgment, the submission made to that effect is not well founded. The obligation imposed by reg. 9 is that "there shall be safe means of access". True that it is followed by the words "as follows", and then there are set out paras. (a) and (b), but I think, applying a reasonable construction, that those words are not words of limitation, but are words which prescribe what has to be done in addition to the provision of a safe means of access. In other words, where reasonably practicable, a ship's accommodation ladder or a gangway of the dimensions set out must be provided, and, where that is not reasonably practicable—that is, "in other cases"—a ladder of sound material and adequate length must be provided. But, whichever of those paragraphs is applicable, the means of access must, in order to satisfy the regulation, be safe within the meaning of the regulation. I think that that construction follows from the ordinary reading of the words, and it conforms with the whole scheme of these regulations and similar regulations made under the Act. Of course, when considering whether a means of access is safe, one has to have regard to the persons for whose protection the provision is made. Accordingly, in my judgment, the defendants do not escape the charge of breach of statutory duty merely by proof that they had provided a gangway which satisfied para. (a) of reg. 9.

[His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence, found as a fact that the gangway was in a satisfactory condition, and continued:] I have come to a clear conclusion that this gangway did provide a safe means of access within the meaning of reg. 9 of the Docks Regulations. I am not saying that the treads were as new, but the gangway with the treads in the condition spoken to by Mr. Bolding (formerly chief officer of the Henzee) constituted a safe means of access for the persons for whom the regulations were made, namely, for persons employed in the processes of loading and unloading. That conclusion also disposes of the claim based on common law, because the obligation under the regulations, as I see it, is a higher obligation than that imposed at common law.

F Will—Lapse—Statutory exception from lapse—Death of beneficiary intestate—Distribution of interests saved from lapse—Time of ascertainment of persons entitled to interests on beneficiary's intestacy—Wills Act, 1837 (c. 26), s. 33.

G By her will, dated May 17, 1923, the testatrix gave a share of certain freehold properties and a share of her residuary estate to her daughter, A.D. In 1929 the daughter died, intestate, leaving her surviving her husband and a son. In 1939 the husband died, in 1940 the testatrix died, and in 1949 the daughter's son died before attaining the age of twenty-one. The interests given to the daughter by the will of the testatrix having been saved from lapse by the Wills Act, 1837, s. 33, the question arose whether the persons entitled to these interests on the daughter's intestacy were to be ascertained as at the date of her death in 1929 or on the footing that she survived the testatrix and died immediately after her.

H HELD: the sole object of the Wills Act, 1837, s. 33, was to give effect to the gift in a parent's will and prevent lapse and the section was not intended to alter the devolution of the beneficiary's estate by imputing to the beneficiary a fictitious date for his or her death, and, therefore, the persons entitled on the daughter's intestacy to the interests given to her by the will of the testatrix were to be ascertained as at the time of the daughter's death in 1929.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of the testatrix, Maria Dominica Depaoli, and of the Wills Act, 1837, s. 33, the bequests and devises given by the will to her daughter, Adelina Emilia Basioli, who died in the lifetime of the testatrix leaving a son who survived the testatrix, but died before attaining the age of twenty-one years, devolved on the daughter's intestacy in the same way as her original estate, viz., on the persons entitled under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, ascertained at her actual death, or whether the persons entitled to such bequests and devises on the daughter's intestacy were to be ascertained on the footing that she survived the testatrix and died immediately after her.

Wilfrid Hunt for the plaintiff, the administrator of the estates of the daughter and of her husband, Stephen Basioli.

T. A. C. Burgess for the defendants, a son and two daughters of the testatrix.

UPJOHN, J.: This summons raises an interesting point of construction on s. 33 of the Wills Acts, 1837, which, in certain events, prevents the lapse of a devise or bequest to a child or other issue of a testator who dies in the lifetime of the testator.

By her will, dated May 17, 1923, Maria Dominica Depaoli, whom I will call "the testatrix", made a number of devises and bequests to her four children, three of whom survived her and are the defendants to this summons. The fourth, Adelina Emilia Depaoli, who married a Mr. Basioli and whom I will refer to as Mrs. Basioli, predeceased the testatrix. By her will, the testatrix devised and bequeathed to Mrs. Basioli a one-third share of a house and furniture in Exeter, a quarter share of another house, which was near Exeter, and a quarter share of the residue. The aggregate value of these various shares is about £4,800. The testatrix died on Feb. 11, 1940, domiciled in England. Her will was proved in 1941 in the Probate Registry, and the first two defendants are her surviving executors. The testatrix's husband, the father of her children, predeceased her, having died on Nov. 26, 1937. Mrs. Basioli died on July 24, 1929, intestate, and was survived by her husband, Mr. Basioli, who died on Nov. 2, 1939, also intestate. The plaintiff is the administrator of Mr. Basioli and of Mrs. Basioli. Mrs. Basioli was survived by a son of her marriage who also survived the testatrix, but died on Sept. 12, 1949, shortly before attaining the age of twenty-one years. In these circumstances, although Mrs. Basioli predeceased the testatrix, s. 33 of the Wills Act, 1837, operates to preserve the various shares devised and bequeathed to her by the will of the testatrix.

A The sole question which I have to determine is whether the persons entitled to these shares on Mrs. Basioli's intestacy are to be ascertained as at the date of her death in 1929 or whether they should be ascertained as though she had survived the testatrix and died immediately after her, in 1940. As Mrs. Basioli's son failed to attain the age of twenty-one years, if the former be the true view, the estate of her husband, Mr. Basioli, and the estates of her parents (the testatrix and her husband) are entitled to these interests on Mrs. Basioli's intestacy. The plaintiff, as the personal representative of Mr. Basioli, will take the lion's share, representing the surviving spouse's £1,000 and interest thereon (so far as he did not receive such sum out of Mrs. Basioli's original estate, which was very small), and the estates of Mrs. Basioli's parents will take the balance in equal shares. B If Mrs. Basioli is treated as having died in 1940, the defendants, her brother and her two sisters, are entitled on her intestacy. Section 33 of the Wills Act, 1837, is in these terms:

C " . . . Where any person being a child or other issue of the testator to whom any real or personal estate shall be devised or bequeathed for any estate or interest not determinable at or before the death of such person shall die in the lifetime of the testator leaving issue, and any such issue of such person shall be living at the time of the death of the testator, such devise or bequest shall not lapse, but shall take effect as if the death of such person had happened immediately after the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will."

D Two views on the construction of that section have been expressed. One view, which has been called the narrow view, is that the sole object of the section is to give effect to the gift in the testator's will and to prevent lapse, and that the section was not intended to affect or alter the administration of the estate of the person receiving the gift by imputing to that person an artificial date of his or her death. The alternative view on the construction of the section has been referred E to as the wide view, and it is that the child who has predeceased the testator must be treated, for all purposes in relation to the testator's gift, as surviving the testator.

Authorities are to be found in support of both of those views, and I must, therefore, review them. In support of the narrow view, the earliest authority is Pearce v. Graham (1), a decision of SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, V.-C., in 1863. F In that case a testator, by his will, dated after the Wills Act, 1837, gave a legacy to his daughter, a married woman, who predeceased him, leaving issue and her husband her surviving. The settlement made on her marriage contained a covenant that all property coming to her or to her husband in her right during the coverture should be settled. It was held that, notwithstanding the fictitious survivorship created by s. 33 of the Wills Act, 1837, for the purpose of preventing G a lapse, the legacy was not acquired during the coverture within the meaning of the covenant, and was, therefore, not bound by the settlement. SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, V.-C., said (32 L.J.Ch. 360):

H " The property left to Mrs. Pearce according to the words of the covenant, must ' come to or be vested in ' her during the coverture; and therefore it is clear that if it did not ' come to or become vested in ' her during the coverture, it is not subject to the trusts of the settlement. It must be admitted, at the outset, that the legacy would be subject to the debts or contracts of the legatee, and be assets for that purpose; but for the purposes of the covenant, my opinion is that it did not come to or become vested in her whilst the coverture lasted. The effect of s. 33 of the Wills Act was simply to prolong her life by a fiction for a particular purpose, namely, that the legacy might not lapse, but certainly not for any other purpose; whereas the covenant applies to the actual coverture; and even therefore if the act .

had prolonged the coverture, it would have been a fictitious one only, and not an actual one within the terms of the covenant. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to a decree."

Those remarks on the effect of s. 33 are, I think, obiter, and were so treated by PEARSON, J., in Re Hone's Trusts (2), but SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, V.-C., expressed a clear opinion on the ambit of the section which is in favour of the narrow view.

The next authority which, in my judgment, on a careful examination supports the narrow view, is Re Hensler (3). In that case, a father, by his will, devised a freehold house to a son and his residuary real estate to trustees in trust for other persons. The son died in his father's lifetime, leaving issue who were living at his father's death, and having by his will devised all his real estate to his father. It was held that, as, under the Wills Act, 1837, s. 33, the son must be deemed to have survived the father, the property passed to the son absolutely under his father's will, and became subject to testamentary disposition by the son, but that, as by the will of the son the property was devised to his father, the devise by the son failed, and his heir-at-law was entitled to the property. SIR CHARLES HALL, V.-C., said (19 Ch.D. 614):

"By virtue of s. 33 of the Wills Act, the property passed under the devise in the father's will as if the devisee had died immediately after the death of his father. The effect of that is that I must consider the son to have survived his father and to have taken as devisee. I must also consider that the property became subject to the son's will, and included in the general gift therein contained. The son must be deemed to have had the property; and then the question arises whether he must by a legal fiction be taken to have survived his father for all purposes, or to have survived him only for the purpose of giving effect to the gift of the father. It seems to me that the object and the purpose of s. 33 was to effectuate the will of the father, and that that object and purpose are satisfied by holding that the son took the estate. Effect would have been given to the will of the son in case he had left his property to some one other than his father and who in fact survived him, yet as he left it to his father the gift by the son fails, for I cannot hold that the section ought to be extended to any case beyond the one expressly provided for. It must therefore be declared that John Hensler the son took the property but died intestate as to it, and that the petitioner is entitled as his heir-at-law."

I confess that I have some difficulty in following the grounds of the actual decision in that case, and I am not alone in that difficulty: see an article by Mr. R. E. Megarry in the LAW JOURNAL, vol. 91, p. 252. The author of that article, however, treats Re Hensler (3) as supporting, on the whole, the wide view. In that, in my opinion, he was wrong. I think it is clear from the judgment that the Vice-Chancellor would have held that a gift by the son in appropriate terms to a person other than the testator would have carried the testator's gift, even though that other person, though surviving the son, predeceased the testator, and that is consistent only with the narrow view of s. 33. Possibly, the actual decision in Re Hensler (3) may be supported on the ground that if, for the purpose of supporting the gift, the son was treated as surviving the testator, it was impossible to treat the father, at the same time, as surviving the son for the purpose of benefiting under his will, and, therefore, the father had to be treated as being under a special disability, unlike any other object of the son's bounty.

The last case which directly supports the narrow view is Re Hurd, Re Curry (4). It is plain from the arguments of counsel, as reported in the LAW REPORTS ([1941] Ch. 197), that no authority was cited to FARWELL, J., and he dealt with it as a matter of first principle. He said:

"The section [s. 33 of the Act of 1837] provides that the gift is not to lapse, but is to take effect as if the death of such person had happened immediately after the death of the testator. If one treats those words quite literally, one must assume that [the daughter of the testatrix] . . . died immediately after the death of the testatrix in 1939, and the effect must be that the estate must be administered according to the law in force at that date—namely, at the date when she is deemed to have died. In my judgment, however, that is not . . . the true effect of this section. The effect of the section is to prevent lapsing in this particular case, the result being that, instead of the gift lapsing, it becomes part of the estate of the deceased person, and it is provided that the gift is to go on the footing that the [daughter] was alive at the death of the testatrix and was, therefore, a person to whom the gift could be given. However, although she is deemed, for the purpose of making this gift effective, to have been living in 1939, none the less the gift itself does become a part of the estate of the beneficiary—and, that estate being administered in accordance with the law as it was at the true date of the death, that is the law under which the share which she takes by virtue of this provision must also be administered. It is not difficult to appreciate what position might arise if that were not the true effect of the section. For instance, if a person dies intestate in the lifetime of the testator and it becomes necessary to inquire who is the next of kin at the date of the death, and an inquiry is ordered, and the whole matter is gone into and the master's certificate finding who were the next of kin of the deceased person is made. If subsequently that estate becomes increased by a gift which is in favour of a person deemed to have died after 1925, then, if I am to read s. 33 as meaning that the estate is to be administered in accordance with the law as it was after 1925, a further inquiry will be necessary as to the next of kin of that person, on the footing that she died at a time when, in fact, she had been long dead. The result might be that . . . one might have different persons . . . entitled to participate in any share to which the estate became entitled and which is saved from lapsing by virtue of s. 33. On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that this section does not apply beyond providing for the prevention of the lapse. That is to say, it is not intended to do anything more than prevent the gift having no effect at all, with the result that the gift which would otherwise have lapsed passes to the person who is the legal personal representative of the deceased, who takes it as part of the estate of the deceased person . . . The Act does not, in my judgment, apply so as to alter the way in which the existing estate should be disposed of. It only operates so as to increase that estate, and does not change the persons who were entitled to the estate under the law which was in force at the time of the intestate's death."

In my judgment, support for the narrow view is also to be found in certain cases which, although not dealing directly with the point before me, illustrate the general scope and ambit of the section. In Re Scott (5) STIRLING, L.J., said ([1901] 1 K.B. 239):

"In s. 33 the effect is to be 'as if the death of' the devisee or legatee 'had happened immediately after the death of the testator'. To ascertain the meaning of this, let me suppose that the testator by his will has (as in the present case) devised real estate in fee to a child who predeceases him. If the child had survived the testator, the will would have passed the real estate to that child in fee; and the legislature prescribes that, notwithstanding the death of the child, the legal effect of the will shall be the same—that is to say, that the will shall pass the real estate to the child in fee. Such seems to me the natural meaning of the language of the Act; nor can I see any difficulty in understanding it. The legislature has simply provided that in certain cases there shall be a posthumous addition to the property of a deceased person, the object of such provision being to place that additional property at the disposal of the deceased while still living. At this point, in my judgment, the operation of the Wills Act ceases; and this additional property is left to go and devolve as part of the property of the deceased child. If the child, while living, entered for valuable consideration into any contract with reference to such property (as, for example, by way of sale or mortgage, or by way of covenant in a marriage settlement), by such contract the property will be bound. If the child made a will by which such property is, by appropriate language, disposed of, either specifically or otherwise, the property will pass under such disposition. If the child died intestate, the property will go to the persons entitled by law as upon an intestacy. If the child died an undischarged bankrupt, it will vest in the trustee in bankruptcy, and so on."

Later in his judgment STIRLING, L.J., said (ibid., 241):

"In Pickersgill v. Rodger (6) SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., speaking of s. 33 of the Wills Act, says (5 Ch.D. 172): 'The result, therefore, is this, that the child dying in the testatrix's lifetime has his estate augmented by the devise or bequest made to him by the testatrix; in other words, the subject of the devise or bequest falls into the estate of the child, and of course can be disposed of by the will of that child, if that will contains apt words to dispose of it'."

Those passages in the judgments of STIRLING, L.J., and SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., appear to me inconsistent with the wide view. To take an example, if A., who predeceases his father, gives all his residue to X., who survives A., but predeceases A.'s father, X. will receive the residue of A.'s estate on A.'s death. But, when the father dies leaving a legacy to A which is saved from lapse by the Wills Act, 1837, s. 33, and, under the provisions of A.'s will, falls into his residue, then, if the wide view of the effect of s. 33 be correct, X. will not take the legacy and it will be undisposed of. Again, if the wide view be right, then, as FARWELL, J., pointed out in Re Hurd (4), there may be two sets of next of kin in the event of the child dying intestate, or there may be two classes of beneficiary under the child's will; e.g., if the child leaves a residue to a class, there may be one class at the date of his real death and quite a different class at the date of his notional or fictitious death. If that view be right, it seems to me quite inconsistent with the words of STIRLING, L.J. ([1901] 1 K.B. 239), in Re Scott (5), that

"... additional property is left to go and devolve as part of the property of the deceased child" or with the words of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R. (5 Ch.D. 172), in Pickersgill v. Rodger (6), that

"... the subject of the devise or bequest falls into the estate of the child, and of course can be disposed of by the will of that child, if that will contains apt words to dispose of it."

I must now turn to the authorities which are in support of the wide view. The first is In the Goods of Councell (7). In that case, the deceased, a legatee under the will of her father, died in his lifetime, leaving issue living at his death. She also left a husband surviving her, who, however, died before the father, having made a will, in which he appointed executors who took probate of the same. The court granted administration to the son of the deceased limited to the personal estate bequeathed to her by the will of her father, and dispensed with the renunciation or citation of the surviving executor of the will of the husband of the deceased. On an unopposed motion for administration to be granted to the son, counsel on his behalf said:

"[Section 33 of the Wills Act, 1837] enacts, that where a legatee being a child of the testator shall die in his lifetime, leaving issue, the bequest shall take effect as if the death of such legatee had happened immediately after the death of the testator. If that had been so in this case, Mrs. Councill [the deceased] would have died a widow, and her son would have been entitled to administration."

From the report it does not appear that there was any formal or reasoned judgment by LORD PENZANCE. After setting out the form of the letters of administration which LORD PENZANCE granted to the son of the deceased, the report states (L.R. 2 P. & D. 315):

"He [LORD PENZANCE] further dispensed with the renunciation or citation of the surviving executor of the will of the [husband of the deceased]."

As the husband's executor was the only person entitled or interested to urge that the narrow view was the true construction of s. 33 of the Act of 1837, it seems curious that LORD PENZANCE should have dispensed with the citation of him. It is clear that the matter was never argued before LORD PENZANCE, and it is also noteworthy that, although Pearce v. Graham (1) had been decided eight years earlier, that case was not cited to the learned judge.

In the Goods of Councill (7) was followed in Re Allen's Trusts (8). In that case the real issue was between the children of Harriet Iffinger, the testator's deceased child, who died intestate, and the estate of her husband who survived her, but predeceased the testator. If the narrow view be right, the husband's estate would have been entitled to the property, i.e., the fund representing the legacy given to the deceased by the will of the testator. Counsel for the children of the deceased cited In the Goods of Councill (7), and counsel for the surviving trustee of the testator's will and the residuary legatee under the will cited Re Hensler (3), but his clients were not interested in the property so the children's application was really unopposed. The husband's executor was not represented, and, therefore, as in In the Goods of Councill (7), the point was not argued before the learned judge. The judgment of NEVILLE, J., is reported in these words ([1909] W.N. 181):

"NEVILLE, J., held that the decision in In the Goods of Councill (7), covered the point. Having regard to the language of s. 33 of the Wills Act, 1837, Harriet Iffinger must be deemed to have died immediately after the death of the testator for the purposes of the bequest, and her next of kin must be ascertained at that date. Her two children were her next of kin at that date, and were the proper persons to take out representation to her estate."

As I understand it, the learned judge merely followed the decision in In the Goods of Councill (7), the contrary view never having been urged before him.

In Re Hone's Trusts (2), Pearce v. Graham (1) was cited and discussed during the argument, and PEARSON, J., did not disapprove of it, but I do not think that Re Hone (2) assists me on the point which I have to consider. I respectfully agree with the views expressed by FARWELL, J., in Re Hurd (4). In my judgment, s. 33 of the Act of 1837 is aimed solely at preserving the gift in the parent's will and is not in any way concerned to alter the administration of the estate of the child who has predeceased the testator. The words in the section are, in my judgment, put into the section solely to explain and amplify the immediately preceding phrase, "such devise or bequest shall not lapse", and are quite inappropriate to alter the devolution of the estate of a child who has predeceased the testator by imputing to him a fictitious date for his death. For the reasons I have given, In the Goods of Councill (7) and Re Allen (8) cannot be regarded as satisfactory decisions, and, therefore, in my judgment, they do not preclude me from following the decision of FARWELL, J., in Re Hurd (4).

"... but shall take effect as if the death of such person had happened immediately after the death of the testator..."

I am fortified in the conclusion which I have reached that Re Hurd (4) is to be preferred to In the Goods of Councell (7) and Re Allen (8) by the views expressed in JARMAN ON WILLS, 8th ed., vol. 1, p. 468, and THEOBALD ON WILLS, 10th ed., p. 560. Therefore, in my opinion, the persons interested, on the intestacy of Mrs. Basioli, in the shares devised and bequeathed to her by the will of the testatrix are to be ascertained as at the date of Mrs. Basioli's death in 1929.

Declaration accordingly.

Re ALLEN (deceased). FAITH v. ALLEN AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), January 12, 13, 1953.]

Will—Condition—Certainty—Devise to person “who shall be a member of the Church of England and an adherent to the doctrine of that church”.

By his will, dated Nov. 4, 1906, a testator, who died on Nov. 25, 1908, devised real property to the eldest of the sons of F. “who shall be a member of the Church of England and an adherent to the doctrine of that church”, and, in case there should be no son of the said F. “who shall be a member of the Church of England or an adherent to the doctrines of that church”, then the testator devised the property to W.

HELD: the terms “member of the Church of England” and “adherent to the doctrine of that church” were incapable of exact definition, and, therefore, the condition was void for uncertainty.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, whether the devise by Henry George Allen of his dwelling-house “Paskeston” and of other hereditaments referred to in the third codicil to his will to the eldest of the sons of Francis Seymour Allen (excepting his son Hugh) who should be a member of the Church of England and an adherent to the doctrine of that church was valid, or void for uncertainty, or otherwise.

By his will, dated Nov. 4, 1906, the testator gave and devised his dwelling-house called Paskeston to his sister, Isabella Georgina Lort Phillips, during her life if she should prefer to live there, and, subject to her said option (which was never exercised), to his nephew, Frederick Seymour Allen, and his heirs, and, subject as aforesaid, he gave and devised all his lands and real estate to the said Frederick Seymour Allen. The testator made seven codicils to his will of which the third, dated Nov. 10, 1907, is relevant. By this codicil he declared that, if the said Frederick Seymour Allen should die leaving a son him surviving, he confirmed the gift contained in his said will to the said Frederick Seymour Allen and his heirs of Paskeston, but, if the said Frederick Seymour Allen should die leaving no son him surviving, then the testator gave and devised the property to his (Frederick's) wife, Betty or Elizabeth (the defendant Elizabeth Constance Allen), during her life or until any marriage by her to any second husband, and on her death or second marriage the testator gave and devised Paskeston to Francis Seymour Allen during his life and from A after his death to the eldest of the sons of the said Francis Seymour Allen (excepting his son Hugh)

"who shall be a member of the Church of England and an adherent to the doctrine of that church"

(subject to certain provisions not material to be here mentioned), and, in case
 B there should be no son of the said Francis Seymour Allen (other than the said Hugh) "who shall be a member of the Church of England or an adherent to the doctrines of that church", then, on the death of the said Francis Seymour Allen, the testator devised Paskeston to Wilfred Allen. The testator gave and devised all other his land and real estate to the same devisees to whom he had by the said codicil given and devised Paskeston subject to the said conditions
 C so far as applicable. The testator died on Nov. 25, 1908, and his will with seven codicils was proved on Jan. 5, 1909. On Aug. 31, 1941, Frederick Seymour Allen died, never having had a son. On June 18, 1932, Francis Seymour Allen died having had issue four sons: (i) Reginald Seymour Allen, who died on May 14, 1935; (ii) Hugh Evelyn Allen; (iii) Guy Francis Seymour Allen, who died on Apr. 15, 1923; and (iv) Evelyn Prestwood Seymour Allen, who was
 D still living. Reginald Seymour Allen was a Roman Catholic at the date of the testator's death, but there were grounds for believing that he might later have become a member of the Church of England. Guy Francis Seymour Allen was a Roman Catholic at all material times. It appeared likely that Evelyn Prestwood Seymour Allen was a Roman Catholic at the date of the testator's death. The defendant Elizabeth Constance Allen had not re-married, and she E died on Sept. 8, 1952, since the date of the issue of the summons.

D. A. Ziegler for the fourth defendant, the legal personal representative of Guy Francis Seymour Allen.

H. A. Rose for the fifth defendant, Evelyn Prestwood Seymour Allen.

The first defendant, Elizabeth Constance Allen, had not appeared before her death.

VAISEY, J. (having stated the facts): The question arises whether the description, qualification or condition—whatever one calls it—that someone
 H is to be a member of the Church of England and an adherent to its doctrine, is a description, qualification or condition which is sufficiently certain to be operative in law? There is a good deal of authority which seems to border on this point, although I am bound to say that I do not think that any of it is really satisfactory. Looking at it, first, in the absence of authority, it is, I think, notorious that what is meant by being a member of the Church of England is by no means settled or ascertained. For some purposes every parishioner who does not definitely dissent from the teaching and discipline of the church is a member of the Church of England. Membership of the Church of England in some contexts is attributed to anybody who does not actively dissociate himself from the church of the land, which can be described, if one so chooses to describe it, as part of the Catholic Church of God or an association which derives in some way its concomitant powers or duties from the legislation at the time of the Reformation. In some respects nonconforming christians are (and, indeed, they are very apt so to describe themselves) members of the Church of England who do not conform, and that is why a person who has been baptised, but attends a Wesleyan chapel, a Congregational place of worship, or other dissenting place of worship, will always say: I am a member of the Church of England, although I do not conform to it. A

I think that the question whether a person is or is not a member of the Church of England may be answered in many different ways, according to the subject-matter under discussion. Every baptised christian is entitled to be buried in the local parish churchyard, and, subject to certain safeguards, which, again, are rather controversial, to come and be married in the parish church. Indeed, until very recent times it was the only place in which one could get married—the modern legislation under which marriage in the registry office is permitted is, of course, comparatively recent—and every person was treated as a member of the Church of England who was entitled to be married in the building which was the church of the parish in which he or she resided. That is one view of what “a member of the Church of England” means. Another, and much narrower, meaning is that a member of the Church of England is a person who, having been baptised and confirmed, regularly attends the parish church, conforms, so far as he can, to the discipline which is laid down by the formularies and has his name on the electoral roll of the parish, and would describe himself as a member of the Church of England, or, at any rate, would say negatively: “I am not a dissenter or a nonconformist. I am a churchman”. Between those two views, however, there is a fairly wide gulf, and, indeed, apart from the church people, on the one hand, and the nonconforming christians, on the other, there is a vast number of people who, when asked to put down what their religion is, would probably say “Church of England” as giving the least trouble. C D E

I am not at all sure that the words “a member of the Church of England”, are capable of any definite, certain significance, but then, added to those words, in this will are these curious words, “and an adherent to the doctrine of that church”. Be it observed that it is not “doctrines”, but “doctrine”. How does one adhere to the doctrine of a church? Of course, “adherence” is used metaphorically, but the metaphorical use of the word is well established and one may adhere to a political doctrine or one may adhere to a religious doctrine by a vast number of methods and to many varying degrees. If a man is asked, for instance, if he is a conservative or a socialist and is further asked: Do you adhere to the doctrine of conservatism? or: Do you adhere to the doctrine of Socialism?, he would probably be rather puzzled, but he would be prepared to say generally: If I am a conservative, I have to adhere to the doctrine which is laid down by the party leaders. If I am a socialist, I have to adhere to the doctrine of the party. All that is very vague, and almost equally vague is the consideration of adherence to the doctrine of a church. Just as in the Jewish communities there are various forms of Judaism—there is strictly orthodox Judaism, there is liberal Judaism, and there are other forms of intermediate belief and practice—in the same way there are, within the comprehensive walls of the Church of England, varying ideas of teaching (which, of course, is the same thing as doctrine) and there is a large number of members of the Church of England (in whatever sense you use those words) who adhere to the doctrine in some respects whole-heartedly, in some respects half-heartedly, and in other respects will say that they do not much care about it for it does not seem to them to have any bearing on practical life. F G H

But how far adherence must be reduced before it ceases to be adherence is, to my mind, a problem which is entirely beyond the wit of man and certainly past any function which this court can exercise. If one asks a man if he adheres to the doctrine of the Church of England, he would certainly want a little more explanation, I should have thought, before he allowed himself to be pinned down. "What do you mean?" would be his proper retort. "Do you mean that I have to take the words of the three creeds of the church and believe them without any sort of qualification?" One may say to him: "There are diverse views about this, and, no doubt, you will have some liberty of choice." To say that you adhere to the doctrine is obviously a statement of so wide and unqualified a character that no one would like to commit himself, any more than anyone would like to answer the question: "Are you a man of good life? Are you a man of good faith?" Who, with his knowledge of his own shortcomings, would answer that question without hesitation? I should have thought that in this case adherence to the doctrine of a church is something so uncertain as to its quality, so uncertain as to the degree of adherence, that it is impossible to say that it was sufficiently certain to make it plain, as I think it has to be made plain, that a person is not only a member of the Church of England, having first decided what one means by that, but is also an adherent to the doctrine of that Church. How is one to say that one adheres to the doctrine of the Church of England? What is the doctrine of the church? It is a body of beliefs of a very wide character, covering the whole of human experience and divine revelation, but not capable of being reduced to the certainty of a code.

I have been referred to Re Perry Almshouses (1). The headnote relating to the decision in the court of first instance is ([1898] 1 Ch. 391):

"The founder of an eleemosynary charity prescribed by the instrument of foundation that the objects should be selected from among persons who should have (1) regularly attended divine service at the parish church for a fixed period, (2) been partakers of the Holy Communion, (3) lived a godly, righteous and sober life to the glory of God's Holy Name, and that the trustees should be members of the Church of England:—Held, that this was a charity the endowment whereof was held for the benefit of members of the Church of England as such . . ."

I think that the difference between the kind of test which would have to be applied in admitting people to almshouses and the test applicable to decide whether a person qualifies for a benefit under a will is exemplified in this case.

Of course, the trustees of these almshouses would be compelled, if they were to do their duty, to decide whether the applicants for admission to the almshouses were people who had lived a godly, righteous and sober life to the glory of God's Holy Name. If they asked these people whether they had done that, I should have thought that a hardly more embarrassing question could be put to a human being; but the trustees would form their conclusion on the question whether these people qualified for admission. STIRLING, J., says in Re Perry Almshouses (1) (ibid., 400):

"Whatever difficulty there may be in giving a strict legal definition of what constitutes membership of the Church of England, I think that a person who has been baptized, has been confirmed, or is ready and desirous to be confirmed, and is an actual communicant, does hold the status of a member of that church, and would be ordinarily regarded and spoken of as such."

The case went to the Court of Appeal and the court, consisting of SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., CHITTY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ., upheld the judgment of the court below. I do not find in those judgments anything particularly helpful.

There is also not very much to help me in Clayton v. Ramsden (2), for one reason because that was a case of condition subsequent, where I think that the position is different. In Re Tegg (3) the words were: "I desire that my daughter and any children she may bear should at all times conform to and be members of the Established Church of England." FARWELL, J., held that that condition was void for uncertainty, since it was open to grave doubt whether any particular act of omission in the future would bring about a forfeiture. That, again, was a case of a condition subsequent, but I think that the reasoning of that case is equally applicable to the present case, which is one of a condition precedent or a qualification. FARWELL, J., said ([1936] 2 All E.R. 881):

A

"In the present case the first condition which is imposed on this lady is that she herself and her children are at all times to conform to and be members of the Established Church of England. It may be—I am not deciding this—that if the testator had been content to say 'should be members of the Established Church of England,' that might be a matter of some certainty, but that is not enough, because the lady and her children must 'at all times conform to'. Now speaking for myself, I do not in the least know what that means. It seems to me it would be quite impossible to say, here and now, whether any particular act or omission would be enough to render this condition operative. Whether a person, merely because he has been baptised and confirmed in the Church of England, but thereafter has ceased to pay any attention to any religious services at all, can be said to conform to the Established Church of England, I have not the least idea."

Strangely enough there are in one volume of the NEW ZEALAND LAW REPORTS two cases which seem to me to be helpful, and, if I may say so, to be right. The first is Re Lockie (4). The headnote is:

"When a testator, who intends to declare that a gift shall be divested unless the legatee adheres to a prescribed form of religious faith, makes one statement of the events upon which the forfeiture shall take place and the gift over shall operate, and then, later in his will, purports to re-state that condition of forfeiture, but does so in inconsistent language, and the reconciliation is not clearly apparent, the court should hold that the event or events upon which the gift is to be forfeited have not been expressed with the precision which is required by the law, and, consequently, that the condition or conditions of forfeiture are void for uncertainty."

E

The conditions in question were that a particular person should be educated and brought up in the Protestant faith and should at all times remain a Protestant. Then further on the testator refers to adherence to the Protestant religion. The case was argued at considerable length. It was held that those conditions were invalid on the ground that they were not sufficiently certain. The learned judge, SMITH, J., doubted whether the phrase "Protestant faith" was of any certainty, and said ([1945] N.Z.L.R. 245):

F

"The next condition requires that [the person] shall adhere to the Protestant faith at the time of attaining twenty-five years of age. For the reasons already given concerning the term 'Protestant faith', this condition is also void on the ground of uncertainty, but there are other reasons for the same conclusion. What does the word 'adhere' precisely signify? In my view, there must be grave doubt as to what particular course of conduct will constitute adherence."

G

He referred to an earlier case in New Zealand—Public Trustee v. Gower (5)—in which the expression "voluntary adherence" was used, but, having dealt with that, the learned judge said:

H

"In my view, the word 'adhere' is too uncertain to be enforced. Would the condition be satisfied by a mere private adherence to the Protestant faith or would some public profession be required? Would outward adherence to the Protestant faith be sufficient whatever the private faith?"

Even if the court could determine these matters, what degree of adherence would be required? How much church attendance would be required? Would it be sufficient if [the person] answered, upon the taking of a census, that his religion was Protestant although he had no private faith . . . ”

The second case is Re Biggs (6), where the headnote is:

- A “A gift by will upon condition that the donee should be an ‘adherent of . . . the Church of England’ is void for uncertainty. The standard of certainty required is the same whether the condition is a condition precedent or a condition subsequent.”
- B Clayton v. Ramsden (2) and Re Lockie (4) were applied by the learned judge, who in this case was CALLAN, J. The words in that case were very similar to the words which we have in this case, and I do more than share the doubt expressed in those cases. I agree with the conclusions which they reached that those words are not sufficiently certain, either as conditions subsequent or conditions precedent or as qualifications, to justify me in saying that they can be considered as imposing a certain obligation and having a precise and ascertainable significance. I think that “member of the Church of England” is a very uncertain phrase, and, even if the matter had stopped there, I should have felt some doubt about it.
- C FARWELL, J., was very careful not to express any definite view about it. There are so many views as to what “member of the Church of England” means that I should have thought that those words, even alone, were incapable of having attached to them a definite meaning. I think that the difficulty is even greater when the will continues “and an adherent to the doctrine of that church.”
- D Whatever a man may say, whatever he may think, whatever his neighbours may think, or whatever his friend or closest companion may think, on the question whether a person is an adherent to the doctrine of the church, there is so much uncertainty, so much vagueness, so much room for doubt, so much room for difference of opinion, and so much room for differing interpretations, that, adopting the reasoning in the two New Zealand cases, Re Lockie (4) and Re Biggs (6), and considering the matter as best I can, from the circumstances of the case I come to the conclusion that the expressions “a member of the Church of England” and “an adherent to the doctrine of that church” are both singly and in conjunction void for uncertainty. I do not think that the testator has expressed himself with that clarity which is necessary both in a condition precedent of this kind and in a condition subsequent. Therefore, to the first question in this summons I declare that the devise of the testator’s dwelling-house “Paskeston” and other property to the eldest of the sons of Francis Seymour Allen (except his son, Hugh) who should be a member of the church of England and an adherent to the doctrine of that church is void for uncertainty.
- F

Negligence—Damages—Personal injury—Measure of damages—Regard to be had to awards in comparable cases.

While, in an action for personal injuries, it is impossible, in view of the difference in the facts of individual cases, to standardise the amounts of damages which should be awarded, damages should be assessed so as, while bearing in mind the special facts of the case under consideration, to accord with the general run of assessments made by the courts over a substantial time in comparable cases.

APPEAL by the defendants, the National Coal Board, against an order made by BYRNE, J., at Liverpool Assizes on June 27, 1952, in an action for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty in which he gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the defendants were in breach of a statutory duty, and assessed the damages at £10,000.

The plaintiff was a loader employed by the defendants at Cronton Colliery, near St. Helens, Lancashire. On Apr. 18, 1950, while working in the colliery, he tripped and fell, his right arm coming into contact with a moving conveyor belt and being torn away. On appeal, the defendants did not dispute their liability, but they contended that the award of £10,000 damages was too high in all the circumstances of the case and ought to be reduced.

Gardiner, Q.C., and Rigg for the defendants.

Wooll, Q.C., and Pappworth for the plaintiff.

SINGLETON, L.J.: The plaintiff was employed by the defendants at one of their collieries in the neighbourhood of St. Helens when he met with an accident of a very serious character. As a result the plaintiff became a one-armed man, and his injury was such that it was impossible to fix on him anything in the nature of an artificial arm. His injuries are set out in a report by a doctor at the County Hospital, Whiston, near Prescot, of Dec. 7, 1950, as follows:

"James Rushton was admitted to this hospital on Apr. 18, 1950. His right arm had been avulsed and he was suffering from shock. After appropriate treatment of the latter, an operation was carried out the same day under a general anaesthetic and a blood transfusion was given. The whole arm, including the scapula and its muscles, had been torn off, leaving the clavicle intact. Haemorrhage was controlled and the raw area adequately covered with the skin available. This wound healed very well. The following day his chest was troublesome, and, subsequently, it was found that he also had fractures of the second, third and fourth ribs on the right side. This injury had caused a pneumothorax, i.e., the entry of air into the chest cavity from laceration of the lung, and this, in conjunction with the severe damage to the chest wall, so limited movements of his chest that he developed a collapse of the base of the right lung with infection amounting to a 'pneumonia' which was, undoubtedly, a direct result of the accident. He was discharged on May 11, 1950. It was found later that the projecting lateral end of his clavicle was tending to cause ulceration of the skin and on June 28, 1950, one inch of this bone was removed under a general anaesthetic. He was discharged again on July 1, 1950. He was seen again in September, 1950, when he complained of pain in his 'phantom' limb, i.e., as if the limb were still actually present, a well recognised symptom of such injuries. I have not seen him since and do not know how far he suffers from this complaint now."

That agreed report was used before the learned judge, and it was amplified, but not seriously differed from, by a doctor and a surgeon who gave evidence for the plaintiff, and a doctor called for the defendants. There was some question as to the condition of the chest, of which there had been X-ray examinations, but nothing was shown in the way of disease. After the damage done by a broken rib or ribs pneumonia had developed and the plaintiff was left with a cough, and, according to one doctor, there was chronic bronchitis.

After the accident the plaintiff remained in hospital for about three weeks. That he was out of hospital so soon after an injury of this kind, though then approaching thirty-six years of age, shows that he must have been a fit and strong man. After eleven weeks the defendants offered him work as a clerk at the colliery, which he accepted. He had been earning £6 2s. 6d. a week as a labourer in the mine and his earnings as a clerk were almost the same. At the date of the trial he would have been earning £7 5s. had he still been a labourer in the pit as there had been an increase of wages. After fourteen months he voluntarily gave up his employment as a clerk with the defendants and commenced to work on his own account in duplicating, at which he made some £2 or £3 a week profit. He had thought at one time of making commercial art his main occupation in life. He had been some six years in the forces, part of which time was spent in the Middle East, but on his return some domestic trouble caused him to think he had better earn money, and he decided to work as a labourer in a coal mine. Dreadful though his injuries were, his loss of earnings is probably lower than in almost any case of this kind coming before the court where the injured person has been earning money. As counsel for the plaintiff says, a man who is injured is not bound to take every offer of work made to him, but the plaintiff accepted work as a clerk and earned, and could have continued to earn, wages almost as high as he was earning at the date of the accident. The loss of earnings is, therefore, only a small part of the loss. The out-of-pocket loss at the date of the trial was only some £83, which was included in the general award of £10,000 damages.

We have been reminded that when damages have to be assessed in a case of this kind there are many elements for consideration—the pain and suffering which have been undergone and which may occur in the future, the loss of some of the amenities of life, the fact that a man with an injury of this kind will always require some measure of help, even though he may be able to earn considerable money. Those are some of the matters which have to be taken into consideration, besides reduced earnings. Counsel for the defendants directed our attention to a number of cases which have been decided in the courts recently, and he submitted that, however this case might be looked at, the award of £10,000 damages was too high and completely out of line with the decisions of this court and of judges of the Queen's Bench Division recently. Counsel for the plaintiff rightly pointed out that the circumstances of two different cases are not alike, and little help is to be gained from looking at what some judge or this court awarded in the case of an injury of a totally different kind. He submitted that it was impossible to standardise damages.

Everyone appreciates the difficulty of a judge assessing damages by himself in a case of this kind. On appeal every member of this court is anxious to do all he can to ensure that the damages are adequate for the injury suffered, so far as they can be compensation for an injury, and to help the parties and others to arrive at a fair and just figure in all the circumstances. Nevertheless, there is foundation for counsel's remark that it is impossible to standardise damages.

The matter is, perhaps, best put by BIRKETT, L.J., in Bird v. Cocking & Sons, Ltd. (1). On an appeal to this court against the assessment of damages, we are constantly reminded that we ought to interfere if the damages are so low that it can be said that there is a wholly erroneous estimate of damage or if the damages are inordinately high. BIRKETT, L.J., said ([1951] 2 T.L.R. 1263):

"The assessment of damages in cases of personal injuries is, perhaps, one of the most difficult tasks which a judge has to perform, and certainly the task is no lighter when the appellate court is asked to re-consider the assessment made by a judge in the court below. The task is so difficult because the elements which must be considered in forming the assessment in any given case vary so infinitely from other cases that there can be no fixed and unalterable standard for assessing the amounts for those particular elements. Although there is no fixed and unalterable standard, the courts have been making these assessments over many years, and I think that they do form some guide to the kind of figure which is appropriate to the facts of any particular case, it being for the judge, or for the appellate court if they are reviewing the matter, to consider the special facts in each case; for I agree with Mr. Veale that one case cannot really be compared with another. The only thing that can be done is to show how other cases may be a guide, and when, therefore, a particular matter comes for review one of the questions is, how does this accord with the general run of assessments made over the years in comparable cases?"

That passage expresses everything that I would say on the two views put before us in this court as to the use of other cases. It is impossible to standardise damages, but it is the duty of this court to see that, so far as possible, the same general principles are followed and the same approach is ensured for all litigants who have suffered personal injuries and for all defendants in a case of this kind. More than that the court cannot do.

The plaintiff's injury was a dreadful one. It is the worst case of the loss of an arm that any one of us has ever encountered, involving as it did, great suffering, great present discomfort, pain in the future, no doubt, and, inevitably, considerable loss of the amenities of life. The plaintiff is not as other men are. The doctor said he had aged considerably and looked older than his years. There was some damage to the lung and the plaintiff is left with a chronic cough and, it may be, some bronchitis. There is also the less serious loss of earnings. Giving full effect to all those things and being anxious that the plaintiff should receive full compensation, so far as he can, for the injuries he has suffered, I have yet reached the conclusion that the sum of £10,000 is much too high, and that it is the duty of this court to reduce it. Applying such tests as have been put to this court and bearing in mind decisions in earlier cases and the special facts of this case, I cannot say that the damages ought to have been more than £7,000. Accordingly, I would order that they be reduced from the sum of £10,000 to that of £7,000, and I would allow the appeal to that extent.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. This case is another illustration of the difficulties which attend the assessment of damages where personal injuries are concerned. There is no question in the assessment of

A the damages by BYRNE, J., of the omission of any material matter or the introduction of matters which were not material, and there was no misdirection in law. The only question is: Should this award of £10,000 stand? LORD WRIGHT, in the House of Lords in Davies v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. (2) ([1942] 1 All E.R. 664) has used the phrase "a wholly erroneous estimate of the damage suffered" as one of the grounds on which an appellate court can interfere. A phrase used by VISCOUNT SIMON in Nance v. British Columbia Electric Ry. Co., Ltd. (3) ([1951] A.C. 613), was "... the amount awarded is either so inordinately low or so inordinately high ...", and MACKINNON, L.J., in another case, Greenfield v. London & North Eastern Ry. Co. (4) ([1944] 2 All E.R. 440) had spoken of damages being "so excessive ... as to be plainly unreasonable." How those tests are to be applied is a matter of some difficulty, because it can be said that no money can compensate for this dreadful accident and whatever sum a judge awards cannot be inordinately high. BYRNE, J., said in his judgment:

C "This is a case in which money cannot really compensate at all for the loss of enjoyment or the curtailment of his ability to do what he would like to do in the way of earning a living and clearly it must be a case in which the damages are substantial."

D From one point of view it is abundantly plain that money cannot compensate, since nothing is really worth while unless health goes with it, but if money is no compensation, then no sum, £5,000, £10,000, £15,000 or £20,000, has any meaning. The courts have been compelled by the logic of circumstances to decree that their only possible course in cases of personal injury is to award damages in money, and, that being so, it is useful to look at comparable cases to see what other minds have done and so gather the general consensus of opinion as to the amount which an injured person in the present state of society ought to be awarded.

E Here the financial element is the least of all and counsel for the plaintiff says that this award can be justified by the loss of amenities, in that the plaintiff in certain matters must always be dependent on others and cannot conduct his life as he would wish to do or do such things as playing cricket or football and taking part in many athletic exercises. There is also the pain and suffering endured and still to be endured. After anxious consideration, I have come to the same conclusion as my Lord. While this court must regard the decisions of the past, it must also consider the future, and the effect which its decisions may have. Taking all these matters into consideration and looking at the past cases, the general standard, and the particular facts in this case, I concur in the view that the sum awarded is too high and should be reduced to £7,000.

F ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. In the passage cited by my Lord, BYRNE, J., summarised his conclusion on the question of damages by intimating that it was obvious that money could not be regarded as compensation to the plaintiff. Accordingly, this is one of the many cases where the court in effect is being asked to measure the immeasurable, because, except with regard to financial loss, e.g., loss of earnings, damages cannot constitute actual compensation whether £50,000 or £100 is awarded, but the principle has been adopted (and it is the only possible principle) of trying to compensate a person in the plight of the plaintiff by awarding what might fairly be described as notional or theoretical compensation to take the place of that which is not possible, viz., actual compensation. The court should plainly apply that principle with some degree of uniformity so far as possible. I say "so far as possible" because nothing in the nature of any rigid classification can be achieved when one is dealing, not with fact, but with theory. The only way to achieve anything approaching a uniform standard is by considering cases that have come before courts in the past and seeing what amounts were awarded in circumstances, so far as may be, comparable with the case the court has to decide. In the light of the guidance afforded by the authorities it seems to me that the £10,000 awarded in the present case is not only not in conformity with the standard which has in general been adopted in the past, but that it deviates from that standard to such a degree that it cannot be sustained. I agree that £7,000 is the sum which should be awarded in conformity with the trend of previous decisions.

Family Provision—Provision for widow—Estate not exceeding £2,000—Payment of capital—Maximum amount payable—Capitalised value of income—Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938 (c. 45), s. 1 (3) (b), s. 1 (4).

Semle: Where the value of a testator's estate does not exceed £2,000 the court, in making provision for the maintenance of the testator's widow (she being the only dependant of the testator) by way of payment of capital under s. 1 (4) of the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, has power to order the payment out of capital of the capitalised value of the provision by way of income which would otherwise be made to the widow under s. 1 (3) (b) of the Act, but not to order the payment of one-half of the capital.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS by which application was made by the widow of the testator for provision to be made for her out of the testator's estate under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 1 (1).

By his will, dated July 27, 1951, the testator, after making a specific bequest to his son by a former marriage and giving a legacy of £100 to his sister, gave his residuary estate equally to two charities. He died on Aug. 2, 1951. The net value of the estate was under £2,000. The widow was the only dependant, and her application was not opposed by the residuary legatees. Counsel for the widow contended that the court should make an order for the payment to her of (a) one-half of the capital, in a lump sum, without conditions, or (b) an annual income amounting to one-half of the net income of the estate plus supplementary payments out of capital, or (c) the capitalised value of her widowhood interest.

Arthur Bagnall for the widow.

Lindner for the executor.

L. H. L. Cohen for the residuary legatees.

ROXBURGH, J., stated the facts and continued: As the residuary legatees, who are charities, have left the matter to me, not wishing to submit arguments against provision being made for the widow, I need not give reasons for my conclusion that, in the circumstances of this case, I ought to award her the maximum permissible amount (subject to what I am about to say), namely, one-half of the annual income of the net estate, which may be treated as £28 per annum, during her widowhood. Counsel for the widow, however, is not content with that. The estate is under £2,000, and, therefore, s. 1 (4) of the Act of 1938 is brought into operation. That sub-section reads:

"Where the value of a testator's net estate does not exceed £2,000, the court shall have power to make an order providing for maintenance, in whole or in part, by way of a payment of capital, so however that the court, in determining the amount of the provision, shall give effect to the principle of the last preceding sub-section."

By s. 1 (3):

"The amount of the annual income which may be made applicable for the maintenance of a testator's dependants by an order or orders to be in force at any one time shall in no case be such as to render them entitled under the testator's will as varied by the order or orders to more than the following fraction of the annual income of his net estate, that is to say . . . (b) if the testator . . . leaves a wife . . . and no other dependant, one-half."

Section 1 (4) has been twice considered in these courts. The first occasion was in Re Vrint (1), where BENNETT, J., said ([1940] 3 All E.R. 475):

"The amount available where the testator leaves a widow and no other dependant is half the income, or, as in this case, where the net estate does not exceed £2,000, half the capital."

That was a passing observation by BENNETT, J., and was of no particular moment in the view which he took of the case which he was deciding. The point was not argued, and I can hardly think that he was consciously construing this difficult sub-section by those random words, "half the capital".

E

I would, however, have given more weight to his words than I do if there had not been a contrary decision on the point. In Re Catmull (2), a decision of UTHWATT, J., the point which arises on s. 1 (4), namely, whether the court can give one-half of the capital or is limited to giving the capitalised value of the provision which could otherwise be made under s. 1 (3), was argued by counsel on both sides and decided by the judge. Counsel for the widow in that case contended that the court had a discretion under s. 1 (4) to make a larger provision than it could under s. 1 (3), while counsel for the testator's daughters contended that, in making an order for a capital payment under s. 1 (4), the court could not award more than the capitalised value of the maximum amount of income which it would order under s. 1 (3). The issue being thus joined, UTHWATT, J., dealt with the question at considerable length and came to the considered conclusion that the provision which could be made under s. 1 (4) was limited to the capitalised value of the provision which would otherwise be made under s. 1 (3). Counsel for the widow in the present case submitted that that decision was obiter and that I need not, and ought not, to follow it. I do not think that it was obiter, though, for reasons which will appear in a moment, I have not troubled counsel to look into the authorities on what is, or is not, obiter. UTHWATT, J., having to exercise a discretion in the matter, first discussed and decided the area within which his discretion was to operate, and, having done that, in the exercise of his discretion he decided to make no order in favour of the widow. If it were necessary for me to come to a decision on the point, I should probably decide that I was bound to follow Re Catmull (2), but, in the view that I take of the circumstances of the present case, I need not pursue this question any further. Counsel for the widow asked me, first, to order an immediate payment to her of one-half of the capital as a lump sum payment, without conditions. Assuming that I have jurisdiction to make such an order, in the exercise of my discretion I would not do so. He then asked me to make an order for her to receive one-half of the net income plus supplementary payments out of capital. I have no jurisdiction to do that, as it would be violating the principle of s. 1 (3) (b), because it would be giving her more than half the annual income. Lastly, he asked me to give her the capitalised value of her widowhood interest. I have jurisdiction to do that, it being in accordance with the decision of UTHWATT, J., on the construction of s. 1 (4), but I do not think that in this case it is expedient to do so. For these reasons it is not necessary to decide whether I am bound by Re Catmull (2), though, in my opinion, I probably am.

Order accordingly.

CASES STATED by Gloucester justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Cheltenham on July 18, 1952, the respondent, Sidney John Smith, preferred a complaint under the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, s. 62 (2) against (i) the appellants, Kenneth John Bowers and Thomas Arthur Bowers, (ii) the appellants, Allan Charles Evans and Edwin Henry Price Evans, and (iii) the appellants, Terence John

Flack and Edith Gladys Gavin, charging in each case that the first-named appellant, being a young person under the age of seventeen years, was in need of care and protection by reason of exposure to moral danger through his parent, the second-named appellant, not exercising proper care and guardianship.

A It was proved or admitted that each first-named appellant, then under the age of seventeen years, committed indecent conduct by having sexual intercourse (in the case of Flack, by endeavouring to have sexual intercourse) with a girl named Jean Smith, then aged seventeen years, two months, in a latrine in a football field adjoining the Beeches Recreation Ground, Cheltenham, on June 11, 1952; that Bowers watched while Flack attempted sexual intercourse and that Flack watched while Bowers had sexual intercourse with the said Jean Smith; that a boy, Roy Edwards, watched while Evans had sexual intercourse, and that Evans watched while the boy Edwards had sexual intercourse with the said Jean Smith; that there were about thirty boys between the ages of eight and sixteen years in the field at the time and that the latrine was a make-shift corrugated iron structure affording little privacy; that Bowers and Evans had had sexual intercourse with the said Jean Smith on previous occasions in another field; that there was no evidence that any one of the second-named appellants knew of the existence of the said Jean Smith or had been warned in any way of the likelihood of her presence or the presence of any other undesirable female at or in the vicinity of the said football field; that there was no evidence that any second-named appellant was, or should have been, aware that the giving of permission to his or her son, one of the first-named appellants, to play football at the place in question, involved any likelihood that the respective first-named appellant would there come into contact with any undesirable member of the opposite sex; that there was no evidence that any first-named appellant had ever committed or attempted to commit any act of indecency with any female other than the said Jean Smith; that there was no evidence that any second-named appellant had ever attracted the attention of the police by conduct involving a breach of the law or a neglect of the duties of a good citizen; and that there was no evidence that any second-named appellant had or had not given any or adequate sexual instruction to the respective first-named appellant.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that, as stated in CLARKE HALL AND MORRISON ON CHILDREN, 4th ed., p. 3:

F " . . . where a juvenile is brought before a juvenile court not charged with an offence, but as in need of care or protection or beyond control, the first business of the court is to try the issue whether or not the case is brought within the terms of the statute, and only if this be proved by proper evidence can the court proceed to decide upon treatment. If the case be not proved, then whatever be the ground upon which the juvenile has been brought before the court he must be released from custody. The liberty of the subject, however small that subject may be, must be safeguarded by the courts, and as the case of R. v. Toynbee Hall Juvenile Court JJ. Ex p. Joseph (1) showed, the High Court will intervene where that liberty has been invaded without proper legal justification ";

H that on the occasion in question there was no evidence that any second-named appellant was failing to exercise proper care and guardianship, or, if any first-named appellant was exposed to moral danger (which was denied), that this was through the respective second-named appellant "not exercising proper care and guardianship"; that these words should be construed as having the same meaning as "wilfully neglects" as defined by LORD RUSSELL OF KILL-OWEN, C.J., in R. v. Senior (2) ([1899] 1 Q.B. 291, 292); and that the first-named appellants were not exposed to moral danger within the meaning of

s. 61 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, so that any order made under s. 62 would be in excess of the court's jurisdiction.

The justices were of the opinion that the second-named appellants could not have given any or any adequate instruction to the respective first-named appellants in standards of morality and behaviour and matters of sex, and, therefore, they held that the first-named appellants were in need of care and protection by reason of exposure to moral danger through the respective second-named appellants not exercising proper care and guardianship, and ordered (i) under s. 62 (1) (d) of the Act, that the first-named appellants be placed under the supervision of a probation officer for two years, and (ii) under s. 62 (1) (c), that the second-named appellants should enter into a recognisance in the sum of £5 to exercise proper care and guardianship. The appellants appealed against the orders.

S. H. Noakes for the appellants.

Smallwood for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: These three Cases are stated by justices for the county of Gloucester sitting at Cheltenham, before whom the appellants, three boys and their parents, were brought under s. 61 and s. 62 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933. Section 61 (1) of that Act provides:

"For the purposes of this Act a child or young person in need of care or protection means a person who is—(a) a child or young person who, having no parent or guardian or a parent or guardian unfit to exercise care and guardianship or not exercising proper care and guardianship, is either falling into bad associations, or exposed to moral danger, or beyond control . . ."

If the justices find that, they can, among other things, under s. 62 (1) (d) put the young person under the supervision of a probation officer. With regard to parents it is provided, by s. 62 (1):

"If a juvenile court is satisfied that any person brought before the court under this section by a local authority, constable, or authorised person, is a child or young person in need of care or protection, the court may . . . (c) order his parent or guardian to enter into a recognisance to exercise proper care and guardianship . . ."

In this case, not only was an order under s. 62 (1) (d) made in the case of each boy, but also each parent was ordered, under s. 62 (1) (c), to enter into a recognisance in the sum of £5 to exercise proper care and guardianship.

The case raises the question whether in the circumstances the justices had any power to make such an order. The boys were brought before the court because a very disgusting state of affairs had been brought to the attention of the police. The boys were allowed to go to a football field by their parents—in fact I have no doubt they were sent there by their parents—to play games, and there they were guilty of conduct of a most reprehensible character which was deserving of some condign punishment. But it is quite another thing to say that, because these boys committed a grossly dirty act of this sort, they did it because their parents had not exercised proper care and control over them. All that the parents had done in this case was to send the boys to play football. The justices tell us in each Case:

"That there was no evidence that the parent knew of the existence of [the girl], or had been warned in any way of the likelihood of her presence or the presence of any other undesirable female at or in the vicinity of the said football field. That there was no evidence that the parent was or should have been aware that the giving of permission to his son to play football at the place in question, involved any likelihood that their sons would there come into contact with any undesirable member of the opposite sex. That there was no evidence that [the son] has ever committed or attempted to commit any act of indecency with any female other than [the girl]. That there was no evidence that the parent has ever attracted the attention of the police by conduct involving a breach of the law or a neglect of the duties of a good citizen. That there was no evidence either that the parent had, or that the parent had not, given any or adequate sexual instruction to the boy."

A With regard to the last finding, parents are entitled to hold different views on that subject. Some parents hold the view that it is not desirable to give sexual instruction to boys at this age. Certainly, the appellant, Edith Gladys Gavin, might not care to give it herself, the boy not having a father, but, can it be said that there was any evidence before the court that the parents had not exercised proper care and guardianship? Of course, if boys are found repeatedly committing criminal or disgraceful acts, the court may be justified in drawing the inference that parental discipline is wanting. In such cases it ought not to be difficult to give some evidence from which the court can infer the existence of such a state of things, but to say that, because three young adolescents who have just come to puberty have had intercourse with a disreputable girl when they were sexually excited and, perhaps, tempted by the girl, their parents have been guilty of not exercising proper care and attention seems to me to be going a great deal too far. The conclusion of the justices was:

" . . . that the parent of the son could not have given any or adequate instruction to the latter in standards of morality and behaviour and matters of sex as shown by his conduct ",

D and then they set out the acts in which these boys had indulged. It is a very serious thing to say, even if it happens on two or three occasions with the same girl, the parents knowing nothing about it, that because young adolescents commit some sexual misbehaviour—whether it amounts to a crime or not is for this purpose immaterial—it is due to neglect on the part of the parents. I do not think that the statute was ever meant to deal with a case like this.

E If a girl or a boy is found being kept in a house where the mother is permitting prostitutes to assemble or to be housed, or if the mother herself is a prostitute or is carrying on a loose life, it is very proper that the children should be removed, but I fail to see that there is anything here which justified the justices in coming to their conclusion that, because these boys have been guilty of the conduct which has been described—which has been brought to the attention of the parents for the first time—the parents are to be held to blame for not having exercised proper care or guardianship because the justices think they cannot have given the boys sexual instruction. One knows that young adolescents commit indecent acts, and, no doubt, lewd conversation takes place which parents correct if they know of it, but those things, as a rule, are done in secrecy.

F Although the acts against the girl in the present case were done in the presence of other boys on a football field, which makes the boys' behaviour all the more reprehensible, there is not the least suggestion that the parents had any idea of what was going on. No one would say that it was in the least wrong to let the boys go to the field to play football. I cannot agree that, merely because it is found that sexual intercourse has taken place with one girl, that justifies the justices in coming to the conclusion that the parents have not exercised proper care and attention. Accordingly, these three appeals must be allowed and the orders set aside.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: Sections 61 and 62 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, contain most valuable provisions for the protection of young people and for bringing them up in the right way. It is because of that that I have approached this case with a good deal of anxiety, looking to see whether the express provisions of beneficent sections are likely to be spoiled by any observations I may make. It must be remembered that, while these sections do not deal with a criminal offence, the fact that an order has been made with regard to the children of apparently quite respectable citizens makes it incumbent on the tribunal which has to deal with the matter to proceed with a high degree of caution. No one seems to have thought of the possibility in this case that adequate instruction may have been given by the parents, and, as not infrequently happens with regard to parental advice, the young people in question did not choose to take advantage of it. No doubt, there are cases in which justices who have to deal with such matters may, from a persistent course of conduct by a young person, properly come to the conclusion that there must have been something lacking in the state of affairs at home and in the discharge of their duties by the parents. That is something with which justices will deal most carefully, with due regard to the express provisions of the statute. It seems to me that there is no material here on which the justices were entitled to draw that inference, if (though I am not sure) they did so. When one is being invited to draw an inference against a person because of something his child has done which is not to be commended, I venture to suggest that the justices should proceed with very considerable caution. I agree with what my Lord has said, and I think that in the present case the justices have erred. I agree that these appeals should be allowed and the orders set aside.

CARD v. SALMON.

Case Stated (by Justices)—Power of examining justices to state—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (c. 49), s. 33 (1).

The appellant was charged before a court of summary jurisdiction with an offence against the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1), and, the offence being punishable on summary conviction by imprisonment for a term exceeding three months, he had a right to claim, and he, in fact, did claim, under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 17 (1), to be tried by a jury. Before any evidence was given he raised the preliminary point that s. 21 of the Act of 1930 had not been complied with by the prosecution. The justices determined that point in favour of the prosecution, and, on an application by the appellant, purported to state a Case for the determination by the court of the question whether their decision was right.

HELD: as soon as the appellant had elected to be tried by a jury, the justices were required by s. 17 (1) of the Act of 1879 to deal with the case in all respects as if he were charged with an indictable offence; they were then sitting, not as a court of summary jurisdiction, but as examining justices under the Indictable Offences Act, 1848; and, as examining justices, they had no power to state a Case.

AS TO CLAIM TO BE TRIED BY JURY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 21, pp. 592, 593, paras. 1037, 1038; and FOR CASE, see DIGEST, Vol. 33, p. 318, No. 332.

CASE STATED by Devides justices.

On Aug. 12, 1952, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Devizes, an information was preferred by the respondent, a police officer, charging the appellant with an offence against the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1), in that, on May 22, 1952, he drove a motor vehicle in Devizes in a manner dangerous to the public. Before the charge was entered on, the justices granted an application by the prosecution, under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 28 (1), for the case to be tried summarily. The appellant, when invited to say whether he wished the charge to be dealt with summarily or by a jury, elected to be tried by a jury if a case should be made out. Before any evidence was heard, it was contended on behalf of the appellant that the requirement of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 21, in regard to notice of intended prosecution, had not been complied with. The justices, acting as a court of summary jurisdiction, determined that the requirement of s. 21 had been sufficiently complied with, and, on an application by the appellant, they purported to state a Case in regard to their determination on the point.

Skelhorn for the appellant.

Brodrick for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This purports to be a Case stated by justices for the borough of Devizes, before whom the appellant was summoned under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1), for driving a motor vehicle in a manner dangerous to the public. Before the case was gone into, he was asked whether he wished to be tried summarily or by a jury, and he claimed his right to go before a jury. Thereupon, the clear duty of the justices, under s. 17 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, was to sit as examining justices, and take the depositions.

Section 17 (1) of the Act of 1879, as amended by the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 79 and sched. IX, provides:

“A person when charged before a court of summary jurisdiction with an offence, in respect of the commission of which an offender is liable on summary conviction to be imprisoned for a term exceeding three months, and which is not an assault, may, if he appears in person to answer the charge and before he pleads to the charge, but not afterwards, claim to be tried by a jury, and thereupon the court of summary jurisdiction shall deal with the case in all respects as if the accused were charged with an indictable offence and not with an offence punishable on summary conviction, and the offence (if not indictable otherwise than by virtue of this section) shall as respects the person so charged be deemed to be an indictable offence, and if the person so charged is committed for trial, or bailed to appear for trial, shall be prosecuted accordingly . . .”

Under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1), the offence of dangerous driving may be prosecuted summarily or on indictment, but, as, under s. 11 (1) (a), the defendant is liable on summary conviction to be sent to prison for four months, he can claim his right to be tried by a jury, as the appellant did in this case, and thereupon the jurisdiction of the justices to hear and determine the case ceases. They then have to act as examining justices under the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, and take depositions under s. 17 of that Act.

In the present case, after the appellant had elected to be tried by a jury and before any evidence had been given, his solicitor asked the justices to give a decision on a question relating to the validity of the notice of intended prosecution which had been served on the appellant under s. 21 of the Act of 1930. By proviso (ii) to s. 21, the requirement of the section and, therefore, the onus would be on the appellant to prove that it was not complied with. The point should not have been taken before the justices, as it is a point of defence which would have been open to the appellant at the trial for which he had elected. If, after hearing the evidence, the justices had come to the conclusion that, on the facts, no jury would convict the appellant of an offence against s. 11 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, they could have ordered him to be discharged, under s. 25 of the Act of 1848, on the ground that a prima facie case had not been made out against him, but the question whether s. 21 of the Act of 1930 had been complied with was one partly of law and partly of fact which had to be decided by the court of trial.

The difficulty which confronts counsel for the appellant is that examining justices have no power to state a Case. A Case can be stated only by justices who are empowered to try a cause, i.e., by justices sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction, or by quarter sessions when sitting as a court of appeal from an order of justices. Justices have power to state a Case when they are sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction because, subject to appeal, their decision is conclusive, and they are entitled to ask this court whether or not it is in accordance with law. On the other hand, when they are sitting as examining justices, they have only to determine, under s. 25 of the Act of 1848, whether or not there is a prima facie case against the defendant so that he shall be committed for trial. The stating of a Case, like any other form of appeal, is a matter arising entirely from statute. After a defendant has claimed to be tried by a jury, the justices must deal with the case as if he were charged with an indictable offence, and they are then sitting under the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, and not under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.

I have had some difficulty in following the argument of counsel for the appellant which was based on s. 13 (11) of the Interpretation Act, 1889. That subsection does not turn a court of examining justices into a court of summary jurisdiction. In this case the justices were empowered to hear the case, not by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, but by the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1), which provides that the offence of dangerous driving can be dealt with as an indictable offence or as an offence which can be tried summarily. The person charged being liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term exceeding three months, the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 17 (1), applies, and, if the person charged elects to be tried by a jury, the case becomes for all purposes an indictable offence, and the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, then applies, and not the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. Accordingly, there was no power to state the Case, and we dismiss the appeal.

A Certiorari—Prohibition—Power of court to issue orders addressed to private arbitrator.

The court has no power to direct the issue of orders of certiorari or of prohibition addressed to an arbitrator directing that a decision by him should be quashed or that he be prohibited from proceeding in an arbitration, unless he be acting under powers conferred by statute.

B AS TO ISSUE OF WRITS OF PROHIBITION AND CERTIORARI TO NON-JUDICIAL TRIBUNALS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 833, 855, paras. 1411, 1449; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 16, pp. 387-389, 412-417, Nos. 2282-2312, 2709-2762.

C MOTION for an order of certiorari to quash an order made on July 3, 1952, by the Disputes Committee of the National Joint Council for the Craft of Dental Technicians declaring that the employers of an infant apprentice were entitled to dismiss him from their employment, and for an order of prohibition to prohibit the committee from further proceeding in an arbitration between the employers and the infant apprentice.

R. I. S. Bax for the applicants, the apprentice and his mother.

D Vester for the respondents, the employers.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the applicants obtained leave to move for orders of certiorari and prohibition directed to the Disputes Committee of the National Joint Council for the Craft of Dental Technicians. I think that, possibly, the court, when giving leave, thought that the National Joint Council, by reason of its name, was a statutory body, but it turns out that they are merely arbitrators appointed under an ordinary submission to arbitration contained in an indenture of apprenticeship. Unless this were a body set up by statute and having duties conferred on it by statute, so that parties are bound to resort to it, it would be a very novel proceeding if we were to issue these prerogative writs addressed to it.

F Disputes are said to have arisen under an indenture of apprenticeship concerning a young man named Robin Neate under which he was to be taught the craft of a dental mechanic. It is provided in the indenture:

G "This indenture shall be registered with the National Joint Council for the Craft of Dental Technicians and the parties to this indenture hereby jointly and severally agree that all questions or differences whatsoever which may at any time hereafter arise between the parties hereto or their respective representatives touching these presents or the subject-matter thereof or arising out of or in relation thereto respectively and whether as to construction or otherwise shall be referred to the National Joint Council for the Craft of Dental Technicians."

H That is simply a reference to an arbitrator, and I have never heard of certiorari or prohibition going to an arbitrator. Arbitration is a very old remedy in English law, but in all the centuries that have passed since the decisions of English courts first began there is no trace of an arbitrator being controlled by this court by writ of either prohibition or certiorari. The bodies to which in modern times the remedies of these prerogative writs have been applied are all statutory bodies on whom Parliament has conferred statutory powers and duties the exercise of which may lead to the detriment of subjects as, for instance, where a statute gives a certain body power for the compulsory acquisition of land and an arbitrator is set up by Parliament to assess the compensation, and it is essential that the courts should be able to control the exercise of the statutory jurisdiction within the limits imposed by Parliament. There is no instance of which I know in the books where certiorari or prohibition has gone to any arbitrator except a statutory arbitrator, and a statutory arbitrator is a person to whom, by statute, the parties must resort. It would be an enormous departure from the law relating to prerogative writs if we were to apply these remedies to an ordinary arbitrator, whether he be a single arbitrator or a body of gentlemen called a committee or council, and I am of opinion that we must dismiss these applications on the ground that they are wholly misconceived.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: I agree that these applications are wholly misconceived. It is an attempt by the use of prerogative writs to take a short cut to stop an arbitration which has been set on foot pursuant to a submission to arbitration contained in an indenture of apprenticeship. This being a private arbitration between private individuals and directed by agreement to a body which has the name of the National Joint Council for the Craft of Dental Technicians, all the matters in dispute must be dealt with by persons who represent that body. That is all. They are in no sense a public body. Their authority does not depend on any statutory jurisdiction. People are not compelled to abide by their decision. This is a private tribunal set up as arbitrators by agreement between the parties. I agree that these applications must be dismissed.

MORGAN v. ASHMORE, BENSON, PEASE & CO., LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[LEEDS ASSIZES (Donovan, J.), December 2, 19, 1952.]

Tort—Joint tortfeasors—Contribution—Action against two defendants—Action against second defendant not commenced within statutory period—First defendant's right to contribution from second defendant—Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935 (c. 30), s. 6 (1) (c).

On July 3, 1948, during the course of his employment by the first defendants, a workman was killed in an accident in a factory owned and occupied by the second defendants. Within twelve months of his death his widow commenced an action against the first defendants under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846. On July 4, 1949, she added the second defendants as defendants to the action, but they were discharged from the case as the action against them was not commenced within twelve months of the death of the deceased, as required by s. 3 of the Act of 1846. The first defendants claimed contribution from the second defendants under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6 (1) (c), in respect of the damages and costs payable by them to the widow. While not denying that they were joint tortfeasors, the second defendants contended that the first defendants were not entitled to contribution under s. 6 (1) (c), as the widow had failed to bring an action against them within the time prescribed by s. 3 of the Act of 1846.

Held: under s. 6 (1) (c) of the Act of 1935 the right of the first defendants to recover contribution from the second defendants as joint tortfeasors depended, not on whether the second defendants had been sued or could now be sued, but on whether they would have been liable if sued in the past, that is to say, within the twelve months prescribed by s. 3 of the Act of 1846, and, as they would have been liable if sued within that time, they were liable for contribution under s. 6 (1) (c).

ACTION for damages for negligence.

The plaintiff's husband met with a fatal accident while employed by the first defendants in a factory owned and occupied by the second defendants. The plaintiff now sought to recover damages against both defendants under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, but the second defendants were discharged from the action as they were not added as defendants within the period prescribed by s. 3 of the Act. The first defendants, who were held liable in respect of the damage suffered by the plaintiff, claimed contribution from the second defendants under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6 (1) (c). The second defendants, while not disputing their liability for the accident, contended that they were not liable for contribution under s. 6 (1) (c) as the action against them was not commenced within the statutory period. The report deals only with the question of the second defendants' liability under s. 6 (1) (c) of the Act of 1935.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19. DONOVAN, J., read the following judgment. On July 3, 1948, the late James Frederick Morgan was killed as a result of an accident while he was employed by the first defendants, Ashmore, Benson, Pease & Co., Ltd., in a factory owned and occupied by the second defendants, Samuel Fox & Co., Ltd. In consequence, the widow brought this action against the first defendants claiming damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts. She began the action against the first defendants within twelve months of the death, and on July 4, 1949, she added Samuel Fox & Co., Ltd., as the second defendants. Later, they were discharged from the case on the ground that the action against them was commenced after the lapse of twelve months from the death, and, therefore, outside the period of limitation prescribed by the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, s. 3. On Feb. 9, 1950, however, the first defendants, by the appropriate notice, claimed contribution from the second defendants in respect of any damages and costs which the first defendants might have to pay to the widow under the Fatal Accidents Acts, and they did so on the ground that the second defendants were in this respect joint tortfeasors. The second defendants do not dispute that they were joint tortfeasors, but they contend that, as the widow brought no action against them under the Fatal Accidents Acts within the time prescribed, the claim for contribution must necessarily fail. That is the issue which I have to try.

The Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, s. 3, provides as follows:

" Provided always . . . that not more than one action shall lie for and in respect of the same subject-matter of complaint; and that every such action shall be commenced within twelve calendar months after the death of such deceased person ".

The claim for contribution is made by the first defendants under the provisions of s. 6 of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. Section 6 (1) reads: A

" Where damage is suffered by any person as a result of a tort . . . (c) any tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage may recover contribution from any other tortfeasor who is, or would if sued have been, liable in respect of the same damage, whether as a joint tortfeasor or otherwise . . ." B

The second defendants contend that they are not within s. 6 (1) (c) inasmuch as they are not persons who are, or would, if sued, have been, liable in respect of the same damage, since the plaintiff let twelve months go by without suing them under the Fatal Accidents Act.

The purpose of the words " who is, or would if sued have been, liable " in s. 6 (1) (c), is to identify the joint tortfeasor against whom contribution may be sought. He may be either (a) a person who is liable, for example, because he has been sued already, or (b) a person who is not so liable, but who, if sued, would have been liable. Why are the second defendants not liable as falling within the second category ? Because, they say, they cannot be sued now, or because when they were sued it was too late, the period of limitation having expired. Section 6 (1) (c), however, does not ask whether the other tortfeasor can be sued now or whether he was, in fact, sued in time in the past. What it does ask is this. (i) Is the other tortfeasor liable in respect of the same damage ? The second defendants in the present case can answer that question in the negative, not having been sued in time. (ii) Would the other tortfeasor have been liable, if sued ? This question obviously requires one to make the assumption that the other tortfeasor was sued in the past and to determine on that hypothesis whether he would have been liable. If, in obedience to this direction, I assume that the second defendants were sued in the past, the answer is that they would have been liable in respect of the damage in question. They would have been liable if sued in the past, namely, in the twelve months after Mr. Morgan's death. Accordingly, in my view, they are liable to make contribution under s. 6 (1) (c), and it is no answer to say: " Yes, but in fact we were not sued within that twelve months ". Section 6 (1) (c) is dealing in part with the case of joint tortfeasors not sued in fact. C

It can, of course, be urged, and it is urged, that it is anomalous that the second defendants, safe behind the shield of limitation afforded by the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, s. 3, are, nevertheless, open to attack, almost from the rear, under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, in respect of the same damage. On the merits that consideration is not very moving. The twelve months' limit in the Act of 1846 is an arbitrary one, and in the present case was exceeded by only one day. But the true answer is that the anomaly, if it be such, cannot alter the construction of s. 6 (1) (c) of the Act of 1935 if the words be plain, as, I think, they are. Reference was made, however, to Merlihan v. A. C. Pope, Ltd. (Pagnello, Third Party) (1). I am uncertain as to the exact ground of this decision. The third party proceedings brought against Pagnello were in the nature of a separate action, and they were brought outside the period of limitation of twelve months prescribed in favour of public authorities by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1). Pagnello, being a Canadian soldier engaged as such at the time of the accident, was able to rely on s. 21 (1). That being so, it was enough for the disposal of the case, unless the cause of action arose, not at the date of the accident, but at the date when G judgment was given against the defendants in that case. If that were so, the third party proceedings would have been in time. This was the central argument in the case, and BIRKETT, J., decided that the cause of action arose at the date of the accident, so that the third party proceedings were out of time. In a later case, Hordern-Richmond, Ltd. v. Duncan (2), CASSELS, J., speaking obiter, was inclined to take the view that the cause of action in such cases arises when judgment is given against the defendants. This does not concern me in the present case. In the Pagnello case (1) BIRKETT, J., gave his judgment in favour of the third party on the express ground that the third party was protected by the Limitation Act, 1939, because the cause of action in fact accrued on Mar. 15, 1943, the date of the accident in that case. But BIRKETT, J., then went on to say ([1945] 2 All E.R. 451):

“... this statute [the Act of 1935] (which certainly made a great change in the law—but apparently this particular point had not been foreseen), as it stands, and as it is worded, ought not to have added to it ‘who if sued in time would have been liable’.”

It is this last sentence which puzzles me. It seems to me to suggest that the third party proceedings were not themselves an action subject to s. 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939, and what had to be considered was whether the third party could presently be sued by the plaintiff. In that case he could not. If that were the crucial question, then the parties seeking contribution could succeed only if, alternatively, the words in s. 6 (1) (c) of the Act of 1935 could be construed as if they meant: “Would the joint tortfeasor have been liable if sued in time?” BIRKETT, J., declined to read the words “in time” into s. 6 (1) (c).

I approach s. 6 (1) (c) rather differently, and I have already set out my view as to its construction. But supposing in the Pagnello case (1) the words “in time” had been written into s. 6 (1) (c), what difference would it have made? The third party proceedings themselves would still have been out of time in view of s. 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939. The truth is, I think, that the Pagnello case (1) did not require s. 6 (1) (c) to be construed as the present case does, and that I am, therefore, free to express my own view. There will be no conflict between the actual decision of BIRKETT, J., in that case and my decision in this, as there is nothing in the present case barring the present claim for contribution as there was in the Pagnello case (1) barring the third party proceedings, namely, s. 21 (1) of the Act of 1939. If there is any limitation on the present claim for contribution, it may be the six years’ period prescribed by the Act of 1939, though I do not decide this, for it is not necessary to do so, and I gather that there is professional doubt on the matter. Clearly s. 3 of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, does not require the present claim for contribution to be brought within twelve months of the death, for it refers to “such action” and when read in conjunction with s. 1 of that Act means an action under that Act. For these reasons I decide that the first defendants are entitled to claim contribution from the second defendants.

Judgment for the first defendants against the second defendants.

OSBORNE v. SNOOK.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Birkett and Romer, L.J.J.), January 19, 20, 1953.]

Landlord and Tenant—Shop—Renewal of tenancy—Omission of particulars in application—Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951 (c. 38), s. 10 (1)—County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 40A, r. 7, Form 342A, para. 2 (h), para. 2 (k), added by County Court (Amendment) Rules, 1951.

An application by the tenant of shop premises for a new tenancy under s. 10 (1) of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, did not contain all the particulars required by the Form of Originating Application prescribed by Ord. 40A of the County Court Rules, 1936, as amended by the County Court (Amendment) Rules, 1951, in particular, the extent of the living accommodation and whether it was occupied for the purposes of the trade or business carried on at the shop (as required by para. 2 (h) of the form) and the period, rent, and other terms of the tenancy sought (as required by para. 2 (k)), being omitted.

HELD: compliance with the provisions of the rules was not to be regarded as a condition precedent to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the application, and, therefore, the application was, despite the omission of the particulars in question, a valid application for a new lease within the Act and leave to amend the application should be granted.

Marshall v. London Passenger Transport Board ([1936] 3 All E.R. 83), and British & Colonial Furniture Co., Ltd. v. William McIlroy, Ltd. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 12), distinguished.

APPEAL by the applicant from an order of His Honour JUDGE ARMSTRONG at Poole County Court, dated Nov. 5, 1952, whereby it was ordered that the application for a new tenancy be dismissed. The judge held that no application complying with the Act of 1951 had been filed and that he had no power to allow the application to be amended after the expiry of the period of one month referred to in s. 11 of the Act. He further held that the application, if amended in the manner originally sought, would not comply with Ord. 40A and Form 342A of the County Court Rules, 1936, as amended by the County Court (Amendment) Rules, 1951.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a decision of His Honour JUDGE ARMSTRONG in an application made under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951. The applicant was the tenant of premises which she had held under a twenty-one years' lease and which included a shop and a dwelling-house. The application was for a new lease on the expiry of the twenty-one years' lease. The application admittedly did not contain certain particulars, as required by the form of application under the rules, to which I shall refer in detail in a moment. The learned judge refused leave to amend so as to bring the application into conformity with that form. In the note which we have, made by the learned judge at the time, he sets out that there was an application to amend, and that the solicitor appearing for the landlord objected. Two cases are referred to, and then he adds,

B "Application for a new tenancy refused on the ground that no application for tenancy complying with the Act has been filed."

There are some extended notes taken at the time of his judgment which were submitted to him, about which I will say a word or two later.

The Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, s. 10 (1), provides:

C "The provisions of this Part of this Act shall have effect for enabling the occupier of a shop under a tenancy to which this section applies . . . to apply to the court for, and subject to the provisions of this Act to obtain, the grant of a new tenancy where apart from the next following section the expiring tenancy would come to an end immediately before the date of the commencement of this Act or within the period of two years beginning with that date, and would so come to an end by effluxion of time or by the expiration of a notice to quit. . ."

D Sub-section (2) provides that the section applies to a tenancy which

" . . . (a) consists of a shop, or (b) consists of a shop and of living accommodation occupied wholly or mainly by the tenant or by a person who is employed by the tenant for the purposes of the retail trade or business carried on in the shop . . ."

E and then para. (c) deals with a case, which I need not refer to in detail, where the shop is separate from the rest of the premises or the shop and the living accommodation are separate from the whole subject-matter of the lease. I think that is all I need refer to in s. 10. Section 11 (1) provides:

F "An application under this Part of this Act for the grant of a new tenancy shall—(a) if apart from this section the expiring tenancy would expire by effluxion of time, not be made later than one month before the date on which that tenancy would so expire . . ."

That is the provision with which we are concerned. Section 12 (1) provides:

G "Subject to the provisions of this section, on an application under this Part of this Act duly made the court may, if in all the circumstances of the case it appears reasonable so to do, order . . ."

—and I am now summarising—that a new tenancy shall be granted. Under sub-s. (2), "The period for which . . . a tenancy may be ordered to be granted shall be a period, not exceeding one year . . ." Sub-section (3) provides for certain events in which the court shall not order the grant of a new tenancy if it is satisfied on certain matters. One which was referred to in argument is that the landlord has offered to the tenant, on terms which appear reasonable, alternative accommodation. Section 18 provides, and there is no point on this, that the county court shall be the court to which the application shall be made subject to the provisions of s. 111 of the County Courts Act, 1934.

H Rules were made under the general rule-making power contained in the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 99, to which it is unnecessary to refer because it is not suggested that the rules made were ultra vires in any way or that they were not properly made under the rule-making power so conferred. The County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 40A (as amended by the County Court (Amendment) Rules, 1951) provide that proceedings under the Act shall be commenced by originating application. Rule 3 provides that the respondent shall within eight days file an answer in which certain matters are to be set out. Rule 4 provides for the service of notice in a particular form on superior landlords, if any, and other parties who might be interested. Rule 7 provides:

Then the form of an Originating Application for a New Tenancy is set out and it contains a number of particulars to be given, the address, the date of the existing lease, the names of the parties, and so on. Before the alleged application there had been negotiations, but they had not resulted in any agreement. The lease was due to expire on Sept. 29, 1952. An application was made on Aug. 28. The question is whether it was an application within the Act. As I have said, it admittedly did not set out all the particulars as set out in the form. It set out that the premises contained a shop and dwelling-house, but it did not set out, as required by para. 2 (h) of the form, the extent of that living accommodation and whether it was occupied by the tenant or a person employed by the tenant for the purposes of the retail trade or business carried on in the shop. There was no suggestion that the shop or the house was separate within the provisions to which I have referred, so I need not read the part of the form which deals with that. The application did not state what is required by para. 2 (k), namely: "State period, rent and other terms and conditions of the new tenancy for which you are applying". Those are the two important matters. There may have been other minor matters, or it may be that all the other matters were set out.

It was submitted, as is clear from the learned judge's note, that the application to amend should be rejected on the same ground as that on which an application to amend is rejected where the Limitation Act, 1939, or the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, applies. The learned judge was referred, as we were referred, to Marshall v. London Passenger Transport Board (1). We were also referred to another case where amendment was allowed, Collins v. Hertfordshire County Council (2). In the first of those cases it was sought to bring in by amendment a claim based on a breach of statutory duty whereas it appeared (though the actual words of the writ do not appear in the report) that the writ, which had been issued in time, was for negligence at common law only. The court held that the amendment introduced a new case which, if set up in an action commenced at the date of the amendment, would have been barred by lapse of time, and the amendment must be disallowed. In Collins v. Hertfordshire County Council (2) the amendment was allowed on the ground that it was no more than an amendment of the particulars of the cause of action indorsed on the writ. That indicates the dividing line between those two cases. We were also referred to a decision of DONOVAN, J., British & Colonial Furniture Co., Ltd. v. William McIlroy, Ltd. (3). There a somewhat similar point was raised under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 4 (1), which provides that be entitled to certain things. Under s. 25 (1), "The expression 'prescribed' means prescribed by County Court Rules", or the High Court Rules if there were High Court proceedings. The manner was prescribed by rules, but the application in an essential matter did not fulfil what was prescribed. DONOVAN, J., decided that no application had been made in the prescribed manner and that the tenants were, therefore, debarred from proceeding with their claim. If I may say so with respect, I agree with that decision, because the effect of the words used in that section seems to me to be that one must read into the section of the Act of Parliament the actual form prescribed by the rules, and the Act of Parliament is imperative that the application must be made within a certain time in that form and manner. There are no such words in the Act now under consideration. I have come to the conclusion that the principle of Marshall's case (1) and the case to which I have just referred do not apply to this statute.

A It is submitted on behalf of the landlord, as it was submitted to the learned county court judge and accepted by him, as I read his notes, that compliance with all the various matters set out in the form is a condition precedent to an application under the Act. I do not think that that is the proper construction of the Act, read together with the rules made under it. The Act is the governing instrument though questions might arise as to the limits of the rule-making power if the rules had purported to establish conditions precedent other than those which could be gathered from a perusal of the Act alone. That question does not arise because I find nothing in the rules which could be construed in that way. Under s. 11 (1) (a) of the Act there must be not later than one month before the expiry of the existing tenancy an application to the court which, in ordinary language, is an application for a new tenancy under the Act. I think the document which we have before us here comes within that description. I do not think I need elaborate the matter, having indicated, as I have already, the matters which were omitted. So far as the omission with regard to the living accommodation is concerned, it may well be said that that is implied in the fact of making the application because the Act only applies where the premises contain both shop and living accommodation if the living accommodation is used in accordance with s. 10 (2) which I have already read.

D Cases were cited to us regarding the general county court jurisdiction, in one of which SLESSER, L.J., gave a dissentient opinion in the Divisional Court (Upton v. Farmer (4)), on the lines that an amendment ought not to be allowed where the original form was defective in that it did not state the amount of damages claimed, and the county court jurisdiction depended on the amount of damages claimed. In Legon v. Count (5), the other judgment in Upton's case (4), namely, the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., was approved, and it was laid down that where proceedings are brought in the county court for damages and the plaintiff fails to specify the amount of damages, the county court judge has power to allow the plaintiff to amend by restricting his claim for damages to an amount within the jurisdiction of the court. I am not saying that, in any event, the principle which appealed to SLESSER, L.J., in the Upton case (4) would have applied to an application under this Act. I refer to it as it was referred to in argument, because I think that Legon v. Count (5) disposes of that argument if it could ever have been maintained.

F I think the nearest analogy to the present case is to be found in Hanily v. Minister of Local Government & Planning (6). That dealt with provisions in the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946. The relevant provisions provide that a person aggrieved by a compulsory purchase order who desires to question its validity can, within six weeks, make application to the court. An application was made to the court within the six weeks, but after that period had elapsed and before the notice of motion came on for hearing, the applicant applied for leave to amend her notice of motion by adding a further and separate reason as ground for that conclusion. COHEN, L.J., with whose judgment SINGLETON, L.J., agreed, said this ([1951] 2 All E.R. 752):

H “... it seems to me, therefore, that there is nothing inconsistent with the provisions of the Act in applying to the full the power which the court has under Ord. 28, r. 1, to allow an amendment, provided, of course, that the original notice of motion clearly raised the point that the authorisation was not empowered to be granted under the Act.”

Of course, the words there were different, and the subject-matter was different, but I have come to the conclusion that the original application here clearly raised the point that the applicant was applying for a new tenancy and was alleging that she was within the terms of the Act.

Therefore, with respect, I reject the view which I think was taken by the county court judge, that this application was a nullity. I think the view I have formed is reinforced by the general nature and terms of the form. It contains in brackets indications of the matters which should be dealt with rather than prescribing in a precise way the exact form that must be filed. Rule 7, which refers to the form, says:

Those words, I think, themselves indicate that the form is by way of guidance and by way of stating the type of matters which should be dealt with rather than laying down the conditions precedent to a valid application. That being so, therefore, the learned judge had, in my opinion, jurisdiction to consider and should have considered whether he should give leave to amend. It appears from the note which he made at the time that he regarded himself as not having jurisdiction to do so.

It would be more satisfactory and would probably save costs and time if we addressed our minds in this court to the question whether, in the circumstances, leave to amend ought to be given. On that matter I have come to the conclusion that leave to amend, subject to costs, ought to be given. The details do not matter, but it was common ground that there had been negotiations for some time before the actual application was filed. The tenant had indicated that she would like a new lease at an increased rent, and the landlord would have preferred to sell. There was an interview between the parties. The landlord would, as a result, be familiar with the general nature of the premises of which he was the landlord. It was said that the failure to state the amount of the rent was a serious matter in that the landlord might be prepared to grant a lease for such a rent without incurring the costs of legal proceedings. It may be that matter should be dealt with by an order as to costs, but, although I do not think the landlord was under a duty to make inquiries, he could, of course, have asked the applicant what rent she was prepared to pay, and the fact that he could so easily have done that makes it difficult for him to make much of that type of omission in considering whether leave to amend should be given. That the applicant should pay the costs was conceded, because she came to court with an application which was not in order and did not give the details as required by the rules and so had to seek leave to amend. I would grant leave to amend within whatever time may be appropriate and have the matter remitted so that it could be heard, subject to an order that the applicant should bear the costs of the proceedings, and we can hear arguments as to what should be the form and scope of the order. For these reasons, I would allow the appeal.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion and I can state my reasons in a very few sentences. I am glad to think that the court could come to the conclusion which has been announced by my Lord because it seems to me on the facts of this case to accord with what is right and what is best. The point of the case arose on s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1951:

“An application under this Part of this Act for the grant of a new tenancy shall—(a) if apart from this section the expiring tenancy would expire by effluxion of time, not be made later than one month before the date on which that tenancy would so expire . . . ”

I call that the central part of the case because, as I read this judgment of the learned judge, that was the dominant point in his mind at all times. The ground which he gave in his own note for the refusal of the application was:

“Application for new tenancy refused on ground that no application for tenancy complying with Act has been filed.”

A When he came to deal in some detail with the matter he referred to the authorities to which my Lord has referred which asserted the principle for which the solicitor on behalf of the landlord contended. The learned judge said of Marshall's case (1) and Hamily's case (6),

B “These two authorities do, I think, quite clearly establish the principle for which Mr. Miller contends. It is this: If you get a period limited by statute, or rules, duly made, limitations within which the defendant or respondent is entitled to be protected, then no amendment should be allowed in proceedings depriving him of that limitation.”

That refers to the one month under s. 11 (1) (a). Indeed, he says:

“In this case there is a limiting or protecting period of a month on which the landlord is entitled to rely.”

C The view that the learned judge took of the powers to amend were governed by the views he had taken of that principle because he said a little later:

D “Whether indeed there is power to amend does not seem to me to be material. It would be wrong to allow an amendment after practically one month has elapsed. Mr. Miller's suggestion is right and I refuse leave to amend and I am bound to hold the application is bad in form as it does not comply with the rules. The result is I have no power to grant a new tenancy and the application fails.”

E The original application in this case was made on Aug. 28, 1952. The lease expired on Sept. 29, so that was just within the month prescribed by s. 11. My Lord has already expressed the view that this was a proper application because it opens with these words,

F “Madeline Marie Osborne of the Post Office, Upton, Poole, in the county of Dorset, widow, hereby applies to the court for the grant of a new tenancy pursuant to the provisions of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, s. 10, as the occupier of a shop under a tenancy to which that section applies. The following are the particulars.”

G Those particulars follow, in the main, Form 342A, which is prescribed under the rules, and the address of the premises, the date of the lease, the names of the parties, the terms, the rent, the mode of termination, are all set out. The concluding matters in the form about the extent of the living accommodation, and things of that kind, are omitted. The objection which was taken in the pleadings by the answer of the respondent was that:

“The originating application does not comply with the provision of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, or the rules thereunder.”

H It is quite true that before the actual hearing before the county court judge an amendment had been made, but that does not appear to have been quite accurate or full. The learned judge took the view, after considering the matter with some care, that the question of amendment did not arise because there was no valid application before him. That must necessarily mean that he regarded the provisions of the rules which had not been followed as conditions precedent to the jurisdiction which he was to exercise. I share the view that my Lord has expressed that that was a wrong view to take.

On the question of amendment, I would like to add that, in Ord. 15 (1) of the County Court Rules, 1936, the directions with regard to amendment are fully set out. The rule says:

"The court may, at any time—(a) amend any defects and errors in any proceedings whether the defect or error is that of the party applying to amend or not; and (b) add, strike out or substitute any person either as plaintiff or defendant; and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining the real question in controversy between the parties shall be made, if duly applied for . . . "

In the note to that rule we had cited to us this passage:

"An amendment should always be allowed if it can be made without injustice to the other side, and there is no injustice if the other side can be compensated by costs . . . "

Then there is a quotation from BOWEN, L.J. (in Cropper v. Smith (7) 26 Ch.D. 710):

". . . I know of no kind of error or mistake which, if not fraudulent or intended to overreach, a court ought not to correct, if it can be done without injustice to the other party. Courts do not exist for the sake of discipline, but for the sake of deciding matters in controversy, and I do not regard such amendment as a matter of favour or of grace."

In the present case negotiations, which continued for some time, were opened by the landlord in June, 1952, when it was suggested that the property should be sold. The applicant and the landlord met and discussed the matter. The correspondence which continued right down to the end of August ends on the note that the landlord is saying: "I would like to sell", and the applicant is saying: "I would like a lease." In those circumstances, the question whether an amendment should be allowed assumes great importance, but I cannot for myself think that there is any element in this action of any kind which suggests that there would be an injustice or anything approaching an injustice by allowing the amendment which is sought to be made in this case. For these reasons, I agree with the decision which has been already announced by my Lord.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree and I only add a word or two because we are taking a view of the position different from that which was taken by the learned judge. The main argument presented to us on behalf of the landlord was that there was no effective application before the judge at all because the application which was made failed to conform with the requirements of the County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 40A. There is no doubt that the application did fail to conform with those rules in certain respects, but that failure cannot have the effect of invalidating the application to such a degree that it must be regarded as not being an application at all. If that were the true view of the matter then, even if the application had been made some months before the date on which the lease expired, the county court judge would have had no power to give leave to amend and would have had to dismiss it out of hand. That would be a most regrettable result, and I do not think that it emerges from a consideration of the Act and the rules. One only arrives at that result if the true view of the matter is that compliance with the various requirements of the form in Ord. 40A amounts to a condition precedent which, unless performed, invalidates the application. It is to be observed that in this form all sorts of things are provided for by way of particulars which should be given, many of them comparatively unimportant, many of them already known to the landlord. I cannot think that, if the Rules Committee had intended that compliance with the form was to be treated as a condition precedent to an application, they would have put into the form so many relatively unimportant matters of detail. It was admitted on behalf of the landlord that some of them are plainly unimportant, and it was said that failure to comply with those would not invalidate the application. On the other hand, it was argued that failure to comply with those requirements which were of importance would invalidate the application. That is not a tenable way of approaching the matter because either they are all of such importance as to invalidate the application if they are disregarded, or none of them is. Although some of them are of importance, for reasons which my Lord has indicated, and such that the landlord should be acquainted with them as soon as possible, if they were intended to have the drastic effect which the argument for the landlord would result in, they would have been isolated from matters which were not important and they would probably have appeared in the rules themselves and not been relegated to the form. Be that as it may, I quite agree with what my brethren have said, that they cannot have the treatment accorded to them for which the landlord is contending.

The case on which the landlord primarily relied was McIlroy's case (3), but that seems to me to have been quite a different matter. That was an application under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, and the application there, by the terms of the statute, could only be made if it was made in the prescribed manner. The application was not made in the prescribed manner, and, therefore, it was not an application of the kind which was required by the Act itself. DONOVAN, J., said that, for that reason, he could not entertain it and could not allow the amendment. It was sought to say that this case was similar to McIlroy's case (3) by pointing to the word "duly" in s. 12 (1) of the Act of 1951. It was said that an application cannot be regarded as "duly" made under the Act unless it conforms to the form in the order. I think the word "duly" falls very far short of the words "in the prescribed manner" in the Act of 1927. I think the word "duly" in s. 12 (1) is probably referable to the requirement in s. 11 (1) (a) that the application was "not [to] be made later than one month before the date on which that tenancy would so expire" and it may possibly incorporate or envisage other matters as well. But there is no reason to suppose that it was incorporating as a requirement the due observance in point of form of any rules which might be made in accordance with the Act. It seems to me, therefore, that McIlroy's case (3) does not assist the landlord, nor does it drive this court to what is clearly a somewhat unfortunate result—which was the result in McIlroy's case (3)—of defeating without hope of amendment an application which, although plainly directed to a certain jurisdiction and invoking that jurisdiction, did not comply in matters of form with the direction laid down or prescribed by the Act. I am glad that we are able to allow this matter to proceed because it is never satisfactory if an application is defeated, merely because of failure in point of form to comply with certain requirements. I agree with the conclusions which my Lord has indicated.

Appeal allowed.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Pearson, J.J.), January 26, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—Sentence of imprisonment to run concurrently with corrective training—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 21 (1).

If a prisoner is sentenced to corrective training and there are outstanding charges against him for other offences, for which he is sentenced to a term of imprisonment, that sentence of imprisonment must be concurrent with the sentence of corrective training. It cannot take effect at the conclusion of the period of corrective training.

APPEAL against a sentence of six months' imprisonment passed at Sheffield Quarter Sessions on the conviction of the appellant, Derek Talbot, on charges of driving while disqualified for holding a driving licence and for using a driving licence with intent to deceive, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, to take effect at the conclusion of a sentence of three years' corrective training passed at Burnley Borough Quarter Sessions on the conviction of the appellant on a charge of shop breaking and larceny.

R. M. O. Havers for the appellant.

Drabble for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. This is a matter referred to this court by the Secretary of State under the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 19 (a), which provides that the Secretary of State may " . . . refer the whole case to the Court of Criminal Appeal, and the case shall then be heard and determined by the Court of Criminal Appeal as in the case of an appeal by a person convicted . . . "

The appellant, who has a bad character, was convicted at Burnley Borough Quarter Sessions on Mar. 31, 1952, of shop breaking and larceny, and he received what, in the opinion of the court, was a very proper sentence of three years' corrective training. At that time there were two other charges outstanding against him under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 7 (4) and s. 112 (1) (b) (i), and, on Apr. 22, he was brought before Sheffield Quarter Sessions to answer those two further cases. One was the offence of driving while disqualified for holding a driving licence, and the other was for using a driving licence with intent to deceive (he was using his brother's licence and passed it off as his own). Driving when disqualified is regarded by the legislature as so serious an offence that a person convicted of it can be sent to prison for a term not exceeding six months unless the court can find some special reason for thinking that a fine will meet the case. The offence of using a driving licence with intent to deceive, which is almost equivalent to forgery, is punishable by a maximum sentence of two years. The recorder, hearing that the appellant was already serving a sentence of three years' corrective training, passed concurrent sentences for those two offences of six months to take effect at the conclusion of the period of corrective training.

By s. 21 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, a sentence of corrective training can only be passed where a person " who is not less than twenty-one years of age—(a) is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or more; and (b) has been convicted on at least two previous occasions since he attained the age of seventeen of offences punishable on indictment with such a sentence . . . "

It follows that a person cannot be sentenced to corrective training for driving when disqualified because that is not a sentence punishable on indictment with imprisonment for two years, but he can be sentenced to corrective training for using a driving licence with intent to deceive. But he can only be sentenced to corrective training for that offence if the appropriate notices have been served under s. 23 (1) and it is shown that he is a person with the necessary previous convictions.

- A The recorder had to pass a sentence of imprisonment for driving when disqualified, and he thought, quite rightly, that the offence of using the driving licence with intent to deceive also deserved a sentence, but, as the notices under s. 23 (1) had not been served, he could not sentence the prisoner to corrective training. The court feels that the only course they can take is to say that the sentences passed by the learned recorder must be concurrent with the sentence of corrective training, and that, in the result, the whole sentence must be served in corrective training, that is to say, the concurrent sentences of imprisonment really have no effect. The appellant will continue to serve the sentence of corrective training. It is very unfortunate, but that seems to be the only result to which we can come on the wording of this Act. As under s. 19 (a) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, we must treat this case as one in which the prisoner has appealed against the sentence—he has, in fact, petitioned the Home Secretary who has referred it to us—we will impose a disqualification for holding a licence to drive a motor vehicle, and we want to see that it takes effect when the prisoner comes out. We have to pass a sentence to take effect from the date of conviction (April, 1952). He has been in prison since March, 1952, so if he earns his remission he will come out of prison in March, 1954, and we think he ought to be debarred from holding a licence for five years from that period. Therefore, the sentence of disqualification will be a disqualification for seven years from Apr. 22, 1952.

Order accordingly.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 26. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. The appellant was convicted at Bedfordshire Quarter Sessions of being an accessory after the fact to larceny.

In view of the course which the appeal took it is only necessary to state the facts very shortly. A man named Cobb stole a headlamp and a six-volt battery and took them to a café of which the appellant was the manager. Subsequently, the appellant was found in possession of the goods and endeavouring to sell them. He was charged with receiving them knowing them to have been stolen. On that charge he was brought before examining magistrates and the prosecution tendered evidence under the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 43 (1) (b), of a previous conviction of an offence involving dishonesty. This was proved by a police officer and was included in the depositions. The appellant was committed for trial only on a charge of receiving and the indictment contained only a count for that offence. Before the arraignment, however, counsel for the prosecution applied for leave to amend the indictment by including a count charging the appellant with being an accessory after the fact to larceny. His object in so doing was because he felt that there might be a difficulty in proving that at the time the appellant received the goods he knew they were stolen, and, as it turned out, his doubt was well founded, for the evidence showed that the appellant was not at the café when the goods were left there and there was nothing to show that he knew that they were stolen when he first took possession of them. He did not become aware that they had been stolen until a later date. Eventually, the count for receiving was abandoned by the prosecution, and on it a verdict of Not Guilty was returned. Before the court gave leave to amend, the learned deputy chairman asked the defending counsel if he had any objection to the amendment, and he said that he had not, although in our opinion, leave, if given at all, ought to have been given only on condition that evidence of the previous conviction was not given.

The attention of the deputy chairman was called to R. v. Jones (1) where the appellant was charged both with receiving and with being an accessory after the fact to larceny, and a previous conviction against him of factory breaking with intent was given. The jury acquitted on the charge of receiving and convicted on the accessory counts. This court quashed the conviction, but not on the ground of the reception of that evidence. In giving judgment HUMPHREYS, J., pointed out that advantage had been taken by the prosecution of s. 43 and had proved the previous conviction, and he said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 967):

"This evidence was receivable for the purpose of proving guilty knowledge on the charges of receiving. There was no specific direction to the jury that they must disregard it when considering the charge of being an accessory. It would certainly have been better that the jury should be so directed, but as they acquitted the appellant on the receiving counts to which it specifically related, we think it unlikely that it affected their minds on the other counts."

It was contended that this authority showed that where there was a charge of receiving and also a charge of being an accessory after the fact evidence of a previous conviction could be admitted, provided a warning was given to the jury that, when considering the accessory counts, they must disregard the evidence of previous conviction, and it is only right to say that in his summing-up the learned deputy chairman did give a strong direction to the jury to this effect. At the same time, the passage that I have quoted in the judgment was obiter

A and we may say, without any disrespect, that the court was not directly considering the admissibility of the evidence where there was a charge of being an accessory after the fact, because they quashed the conviction on quite different grounds. It is, perhaps, curious that there is not more authority on this point, and, indeed, the only other case which affords any assistance is R. v. Ballard (2). In that case there were counts for stealing and receiving, and objection was taken to evidence of a previous conviction on the ground that, though there was evidence on the stealing count, there was none on the receiving count, and, therefore, the evidence could not be admitted. In giving judgment LORD READING, C.J., said (12 Cr. App. Rep. 4):

B "The section has to be carefully administered, no doubt, and ought not to be used where there are counts for both stealing and receiving for the purpose of getting a verdict on the count for stealing, where the court cannot exclude the evidence as there is a count for receiving; it might induce the jury to convict of stealing on very slight evidence. So if the charge is substantially one of stealing, and not receiving, the evidence ought not to be given."

He goes on to say

C "... but the chairman held that he could not say that the substantial charge was one of stealing, so he felt bound in law to admit the evidence. The court thinks that he was right in that view. They jury found the prisoner guilty of receiving only."

D In our opinion, that case shows the true rule. If the case is substantially one of receiving and is presented to the jury on that footing, so that they are not being asked to find a verdict on some other count, evidence of a previous conviction may be admitted, but it cannot be admitted where there is another charge on which a verdict is sought, and we think that the only right rule to lay down is that, if the prosecution feel that they cannot confine their case to one of receiving, but must also rely on some other count, be it of stealing or of being an accessory after the fact to stealing, then, if they include in the indictment a count for either of those offences they must refrain from giving evidence of any previous conviction. Evidence of bad character or of previous convictions is evidence of a most prejudicial kind and is only allowed in receiving cases because the legislature, no doubt, recognised the difficulty which often arises of proving guilty knowledge in such cases. It must be restricted to those cases. One often has to tell a jury to disregard such matters as the statement which one prisoner makes involving another, but there a jury can often see a very good reason for one prisoner trying to throw the blame on another or to see the other does not escape if he himself is being convicted. Here, it is not a mere casual or accidental piece of evidence bearing unfavourably on the appellant's character. It is a case in which a witness was called to prove, and did prove, a specific conviction.

G No warning could possibly remove that evidence from the minds of the jury, and, accordingly, the court feel they have no option but to allow the appeal and quash the conviction.

Appeal allowed.

CASE STATED by Monmouth justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Abergavenny on Sept. 10, 1952, the appellant, John Haines, a police superintendent, preferred an information against the respondent, Haydn George Roberts, charging that he, on July 18, 1952, at Abergavenny, was under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of a motor cycle of which he was in charge, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 15.

It was proved or admitted that on July 18, 1952, the respondent, who was aged seventeen years and eight months and was employed as an engine fireman, went on his motor cycle to Abergavenny where he left it in the yard at the rear of a motor garage. During the evening the respondent, who was with a friend, F., had a good deal to drink, and shortly after 10 p.m. he was seen leaning on a wall of an omnibus station opposite the said garage by two other friends, S. and H., who had themselves spent the evening in a local cinema, were sober, and had not been drinking with the respondent. S. and H. saw that the respondent was drunk. They took him to the back of the omnibus station and asked him how he was going to get home. He told them that he was waiting for some friends and that he wanted a drink. Knowing that there was a water tap in the rear yard of the garage, S. and H. took the respondent to this yard, and, after he had taken a drink of water, they doused his head under the tap, and the respondent went to sleep and did not wake up till about 11.30 p.m. While the respondent was sleeping, F. arrived on the scene and after discussion it was arranged that F. should go and find a fourth friend who was to ride the respondent's motor cycle back to the respondent's home at Llanellen, some four miles away, and get the respondent's father to fetch the respondent. The respondent took no part in, and was not aware of, these arrangements made by his friends. At about 11.55 p.m., before the arrangements were completed, two police constables found the respondent clinging to an upright steel standard in the rear yard of the garage. He was swaying backwards and forwards, his breath smelled strongly of alcohol, and the constables formed the opinion that he was drunk. They shone a torch and saw a pair of gauntlet gloves and goggles hanging out of the respondent's pocket, and within about five feet of the respondent was his motor cycle. The respondent was asked if it was his motor cycle and he replied: "That is my bike, and you leave it alone." The constables tried to find out who the respondent was and where he lived, but he refused to give any information and was truculent and aggressive. When asked if he intended to ride his motor cycle in his condition, the respondent replied: "If I want to ride that bike, I will ride it, and no one in town will stop me." The respondent was taken to the police station and examined by the police surgeon who found he was under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having control of a motor vehicle. The rear yard of the garage was a public place. From the time when S. and H. first saw the respondent they intended to look after him and to prevent him from riding his motor cycle home.

A It was contended on behalf of the appellant (i) that the respondent was in charge of the vehicle when interviewed by the police officers in that he had retained the element of control over the said motor cycle, (ii) that he was not insensible and had in no way authorised or acquiesced in the arrangements which his friends were alleged to have set out to make, (iii) that Crichton v. Burrell (1), Dean v. Wishart (2) and Adair v. McKenna (3) were distinguishable from the present case, B and that Leach v. Evans (4) and R. v. Wallhouse (5) applied. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that, although he was admittedly under the influence of drink to such an extent as not to have proper control of a motor vehicle, he was not "in charge" of his motor cycle at the time in question, that he had been brought by his friends near to his vehicle at the rear yard of the garage from a place further away, that he had neither the intention nor the ability to ride C the motor cycle, that he could not be said to be "in charge" of it merely because he was the owner, and that his friends would have prevented him from riding the motor cycle.

D The justices were of the opinion that there had been no movement or possibility of movement, nor was the respondent a free agent, because his presence near his motor cycle was involuntary in the sense that he had been brought to the rear yard of the garage by his friends, that they were looking after him, that they would have been able to prevent him from riding or attempting to ride his motor cycle, and that he did not intend to ride his motor cycle. They, accordingly, dismissed the information and the appellant now appealed.

Arthur G. Davies for the appellant.

E James Campbell for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Monmouth before whom the respondent was charged with the offence of being under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of a motor cycle of which he was in charge. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] How can it be said that in those circumstances the F respondent was not in charge of the motor cycle? He had not put it into anybody else's charge. It may be that, if a man goes to a public house and leaves his car outside or in the car park and, getting drunk, asks a friend to go and look after the car for him or take the car home, he has put it in charge of somebody else, but if he has not put the vehicle in charge of somebody else he is in charge of it until he does so. His car is away from home, on the road or in the car park— G it matters not which—and he is in charge. Some day, I daresay, we shall have to decide the question whether, if the car is in a car park and there is an attendant at the car park, the attendant is in charge. That, no doubt, will be a question of fact.

H The justices gave a great deal of attention to this case and had three Scottish decisions cited to them. Those cases have also been cited to us, but they are not binding on us and, I think, they are clearly distinguishable. Here it is clear that the respondent was in charge of the motor cycle until he had given it into somebody else's charge. He was not charged with driving while under the influence of drink. In these circumstances the Case must go back to the justices with an intimation that the offence was proved, and with directions to them to convict and to disqualify.

PEARSON, J.: I agree.

MOTIONS for mandamus and to bring up and quash an order for costs.

E

On a date in May, 1952, an Austin A.40 motor car No. 18BC92 was stolen from some military barracks near Colchester, and on May 24 it was found at a garage near Thetford owned by the respondent, Harry Fletcher. The police made inquiries about the car and Fletcher's account was such that the police arrested him. At the same time they arrested his son, Michael Fletcher, who was suspected by them of having been concerned in the theft with his father. The two men were handed over to the Essex police who took them to Colchester Police Station where the superintendent exercised his powers under the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 22, and the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, s. 45, and bailed the two men on their entering into recognizances to appear at such times and at such places as they might be required. The Essex police later decided not to go on with the case and gave notice to Harry and Michael Fletcher that their recognizances were at an end. Subsequently, Harry Fletcher was arrested by the Norfolk police, an information was laid against him charging him with receiving the car in question, and he was brought before the examining justices at Thetford. No charge was made against Michael Fletcher, but before the justices he was called as a witness for the prosecution. Harry Fletcher was committed for trial at the Norfolk Quarter Sessions where the indictment against him was quashed on the ground that Michael Fletcher had been charged jointly with him with stealing the car, that the charge had not been determined by process of law, and that, consequently, Michael Fletcher was not a competent witness. Quarter sessions, in the exercise of their discretion, also made an order that the costs of Harry Fletcher should be paid out of local funds. The applicant, George Brunson, an inspector of the Norfolk Constabulary, now applied for the order as to costs to be quashed and that an order of mandamus should issue to the quarter sessions to hear and determine the indictment against Harry Fletcher.

Howard, Q.C., and F. P. Keysell for the applicant.

Head for the respondent.

Lionel Thompson for the justices.

A LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: It is not necessary for us to go into the question whether a charge had been preferred against Michael Fletcher or not, for I am clearly of opinion that no charge had been preferred which made it improper for him to be called as a witness in the case. There was, indeed, no charge. He had been taken into custody and released on bail, and in due course the police told him that he need not surrender, and he did not do so. But this case is one of great importance, because, B if, in different circumstances, we had to give effect to this submission and uphold the quarter sessions, it would, so far as I can see, mean that, if any inadmissible evidence be given before justices when they are acting as examining justices, that vitiates the committal of the defendant by them. It is true that a judgment in R. v. Grant (1) given on circuit by BIRKETT, J., when, no doubt, C he had not had the opportunity of as full an argument and of cases being cited as we have had, seems to have been to that effect, and his judgment was followed by LEWIS, J., in R. v. Sharrock (4), but consider what it means. If a committal is to be vitiated because an incompetent witness has given evidence, which means that the evidence is wrongly admitted, it would follow that a committal could always be objected to if it could be shown that there was something on the depositions which could not be legally admitted as evidence. That would D be very revolutionary. I think that R. v. Grant (1) is, perhaps, to be explained by the fact that BIRKETT, J., strongly disapproved of what had been done in that case and thought that the witnesses who had been called were called in a way that was unfair, or it might have been they were put in the position of having to incriminate themselves. It is interesting to notice that counsel E in which it was expressly decided by a court of the highest authority—the Exchequer Chamber upholding the decision of the Queen's Bench—that, if two people are indicted together, although it is an undesirable practice—and I have no doubt nowadays it would never be allowed—there was nothing in law to prevent the Crown calling one prisoner as a witness for the Crown though the proceedings against him had not been determined. It may be that the F Criminal Justice Acts, 1855-1948, have put difficulties in the way of that case being followed, but we need not consider that because I am willing to admit for the purposes of this argument that Michael Fletcher should not have been called before the justices and his depositions taken.

G On that assumption, it might well be that at the trial objection could have been taken to his evidence, but the words of the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 17, are:

H “ . . . in all cases where any person shall appear or be brought before any justice or justices of the peace charged with any indictable offence . . . such justice or justices, before he or they shall commit such accused person . . . for trial, or before he or they shall admit him to bail, shall, in the presence of such accused person, who shall be at liberty to put questions to any witness produced against him take the statement on oath or affirmation of those who shall know the facts and circumstances of the case, and shall put the same into writing, and such depositions shall be read over to and signed respectively by the witnesses who shall have been so examined . . . ”

That section took the place of statutes which were passed as long ago as the reign of Philip and Mary to regulate the procedure before justices. There were two statutes, one dealing with bailable and the other dealing with non-bailable offences. In those days the duty of a justice when a person appeared before him charged with an offence was, first, to examine the prisoner, which, of course, cannot be done now, and then he reduced what he could obtain from the prisoner into writing. Then, but not in the presence of the prisoner, he examined any witnesses, or, to use the language of the Act, "persons", who should know the facts and circumstances of the case. Having taken their statements, which were, no doubt, in those days referred to as depositions, but which were not the same as depositions at the present time, they sealed them and sent them with a writ of mittimus to be used at the assizes, and one of the principal pieces of evidence was what the justice had got from the prisoner. Those statutes remained in force until Jervis's Act, the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, which prescribed what was to be done by committing justices. They were to take the depositions in writing, and that had to be done in the presence of the prisoner, who was entitled to cross-examine. If the provisions of that section are not complied with, the committal is bad, and that is what the Court of Criminal Appeal decided in R. v. Gee, R. v. Bibby, R. v. Dunscombe (3) where, instead of taking depositions in the way prescribed by the Act, statements had been obtained from witnesses and they were read over in court. Speaking for myself, I should have thought it would be a very good thing if something like that could be permitted because it would save an enormous amount of time, but it is not permitted, and, as the depositions had not been taken as prescribed by the Act, the court held that the committal was bad. But no court has suggested that, because justices in taking depositions admit some evidence that is not admissible or hear a witness to whom, it turns out, objection could be taken on some point or another, that vitiates the committal. The committal takes the place of the form of presentment by a grand jury, who could hear what evidence they liked or no evidence at all, and now the matter is dealt with by the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933, s. 2 (1), which makes a committal by justices equivalent to a presentment by grand jury. Therefore, so long as it is once shown that justices have acted in accordance with the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, their committal is a good committal. Whether the evidence that has been given before the justices will be admitted at the trial is another matter.

If we gave effect to the argument which has been advanced and did not disapprove of R. v. Grant (1) and R. v. Sharrock (4), it must follow, it seems to me, that any inadmissible evidence given before justices, that is to say, any evidence which the court of trial comes to the conclusion is inadmissible, would vitiate the whole committal. I cannot see the difference between the admission of inadmissible evidence or the admission of the evidence of a witness who is incompetent. During the argument I instanced a case in the Court of Criminal Appeal in which a wife had been called to give evidence against her husband on a charge of larceny, and we quashed the conviction on the ground that the evidence of the woman was the evidence of an incompetent witness although no objection had been taken in the court below. She had also given evidence before the justices, but no one had suggested that the committal was bad. In the present case there was no ground on which quarter sessions could properly refuse to try the indictment. Their order quashing the indictment must be quashed as also the order giving costs, and mandamus must go to them to hear and determine the case.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: I am of the same opinion. If the argument which has been advanced is right and the committal was bad, that does not mean that the prisoner of necessity goes free, for the court in a proper case, where there has been some irregularity, can send the matter back to the justices so that they can hear evidence properly in accordance with the statute. I cannot see that there was anything in any evidence which Michael Fletcher might have given, if called on to give evidence at quarter sessions, which could be said to be inadmissible evidence. What happened when these two people were released by the Essex police cannot in the least affect his competence to give evidence. Whether it was desirable that he should be called to give evidence is a wholly different matter. It is true that a prisoner on trial is not permitted to give evidence as against a fellow prisoner unless it is clearly established that the proceedings against him have come to an end either by his being acquitted or convicted or by his pleading Guilty and being dealt with by the trial tribunal. I am at a loss to understand how in the circumstances this man was in the least incompetent as a witness.

PEARSON, J.: I also agree with the judgment proposed, and with the reasons given by my Lord. I would only like to say that, to my mind, the short point here is that it is not shown that there was any infringement in the taking of the depositions of the provisions of the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 17. The requirement there laid down is that the justices shall take the statements on oath or affirmation of those who "know the facts and circumstances of the case". That wording, especially having regard to the history of the section which has been described, seems to me very different from other wording which there might have been—that they should take the evidence of only such witnesses as would be admissible according to the rules of evidence at the trial. This contemplates, to my mind, a much less formal inquiry. The object of the section is that the depositions of those who know the facts and circumstances of the case should be taken, and it is not in the least established here that there was any infringement of that provision. The second observation I want to make is that I thought that the argument of counsel for the respondents might depend to some extent on definite meanings which might be given to the word "charged". In a sense a prisoner may be charged at the moment when a policeman arrests him without warrant on suspicion of felony and there is some obligation to inform the arrested person for what he is being arrested. There may be further action taken by the police at the police station, but it does not follow that what happens at those earlier stages makes the person arrested charged in the relevant and material sense, which I should have thought means that an information has been laid against him so that the proceedings against him have at that stage been started. I am not satisfied that he can be said to be charged in any sense material for the purposes of this case until an information has been laid. I agree that the orders should issue.

Orders of quarter sessions quashing indictment and granting costs, quashed.

Order of mandamus issued to quarter sessions to hear and determine the indictment.

GRIMSHAW v. DUNBAR.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ., and Roxburgh, J.), January 15, 1953.]

County Court—Appeal—New trial—Discretion of county court judge to allow—No reason given for refusal—Power of Court of Appeal to review facts and reverse decision—County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 37, r. 2—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 105.

On June 5, 1952, a landlord commenced an action for possession against the tenant of a dwelling-house within the Rent Restrictions Acts on the ground of non-payment of rent. On June 30, 1952, the tenant paid the arrears of rent into court, with costs, and was then told by an official of the county court that it was unnecessary for him to attend the hearing of the action. On July 3, 1952, the action was heard, and, in the absence of the tenant, an order for possession on Nov. 3, 1952, was made in favour of the landlord. On Sept. 23, 1952, the tenant served notice of his application to have the order set aside under the County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 37, r. 2. After an adjournment, the application was heard on Oct. 28, 1952, when the proceedings lasted only a few minutes and the county court judge dismissed the application, but extended the time for giving possession until Jan. 1, 1953. No reasons for the dismissal were given.

HELD: although no reasons are given by a judge exercising, or refusing to exercise, a discretionary jurisdiction, it may, nevertheless, be possible, on looking at the facts, to say that, if he had taken all the relevant circumstances into consideration and had excluded from consideration all irrelevant circumstances, he could not possibly have arrived at the conclusion to which he came, because on those facts that conclusion involves a palpable miscarriage of justice; in the present case the matters which the judge ought to have considered were (a) the reason for the tenant's failure to appear when the case was heard, (b) whether there had been undue delay in making the application so as to prejudice the landlord, (c) whether the landlord would be prejudiced by an order for a new trial so as to render it inequitable to permit the case to be re-opened, and (d) whether the tenant's case was manifestly insupportable; had the judge paid due regard to those considerations he must have exercised his discretion under Ord. 37, r. 2, in favour of the tenant; and, therefore, the judge had proceeded on a wrong principle which amounted to an error in law and a new trial would be directed on terms as to costs.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, Q.C., at Bromley County Court, dated Oct. 28, 1952, whereby he refused an application for a new trial.

Sofer for the tenant.

E. D. Smith for the landlord.

JENKINS, L.J.: The action of which the tenant desires a new trial was commenced on or about June 5, 1952, and was a claim for possession by the landlord of certain rent-restricted premises on the ground that the tenant was in arrear with his rent. The particulars of claim allege no other ground for possession beyond the fact of the arrears, and there is claimed in addition, as is usual, the rent in arrear down to the issue of process and thereafter mesne profits at the same rate to the date of hearing or judgment. On June 30, 1952 (i.e., three days before the hearing of the summons, which came on before the learned judge on July 3), the tenant paid into court the full amount claimed, and costs. He says, and it has not been disputed before us, that he was misled by information he obtained from an official at the offices of the county court. I understand that when he saw the official on June 30, in connection with paying the money into court he asked whether, if he paid the full amount claimed into court, it would be necessary for him to be present at the hearing or would the summons in that event automatically stand dismissed or not be the subject of any order. He says that the official informed him that in the circumstances it was unnecessary for him to attend. That advice was, of course, erroneous. At the hearing on July 3, 1952, the learned judge heard the landlord's side of the matter, but the tenant did not appear, and on that ex parte hearing the learned judge appears to have come to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the payment into court, it would be reasonable to make an order within the meaning of the relevant provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts. He made an order accordingly for possession of the premises on Nov. 3, 1952. A few days later the tenant received a copy of it, but he appears to have taken no step for some weeks, for it was not until Sept. 23, 1952, that he served notice of his application to have the order of July 3, 1952, set aside. That I understand to be the proceeding which is accepted for the present purpose as sufficiently intimating a request for a new trial. The matter did not come effectively before the learned judge until Oct. 28, 1952, and the only record with which we have been supplied of what took place before him on that occasion is a memorandum in these terms:

"This application was made on Oct. 28, 1952, and was dismissed, but the time for giving possession was extended to Jan. 1, 1953. No further application can be entertained. This is a final order. Costs of 10s. have been allowed which sum must be paid into court on or before Nov. 11, 1952."

There appears to have been no evidence before the learned judge in support of the application, the matter being dealt with in a few minutes. We have before us an affidavit filed on the part of the tenant which sets out his story about the mistaken advice he received from the county court official and his receipt of the order awarding possession against him. He explains that he issued the application for a new trial on Sept. 23, 1952, and that the application was originally fixed to be heard on Oct. 14, but, as I have said, it did not in the end come effectively before the learned judge until Oct. 28, 1952. In the last part of the affidavit it is stated:

"At the plaintiff's solicitors' instance the hearing of the said application was adjourned to Oct. 28, 1952. I appeared on that day before the learned county court judge when he refused my said application."

It will be observed that nothing is said as to the learned judge's reasons for refusing the application.

Those are the facts, and the question is whether the tenant has made out such a case of error of law on the part of the learned judge as would entitle this court to vary the order refusing a new trial which he made in exercise of the discretion reposed in him under the County Court Rules, 1936. The relevant rule is Ord. 37, r. 2:

"(1) Where a defendant to an action or a defendant to a counterclaim does not appear at the hearing and a judgment or order is given or made against him in his absence, the judgment or order and any execution thereon may on application be set aside and a new trial may be granted. (2) The application may, if the parties are present, be made on the day on which the judgment or order was given or made, and in any other case shall be made on notice. (3) The application shall be made to the judge if the judgment or order was given or made by the judge and in any other case to the registrar."

It will be observed that the form of the rule is that "the judgment or order and any execution thereon may on application be set aside and a new trial may be granted". In other words, the rule is couched in language appropriate to the vesting of a discretion in the judge.

I should next say a few words about the principles on which this court acts in considering whether a case is made for interference with the exercise of a judicial discretion in the county court. The most useful case for that purpose is, I think, Dick v. Piller (1), a decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal, consisting of SCOTT, L.J., and CROOM-JOHNSON, J., DU PARCQ, L.J., dissenting. The case concerned an exercise by a county court judge of his discretionary power by refusing an adjournment sought owing to the illness of a witness, and the effect of the decision is that when a witness in, or a fortiori a party to, an action in a county court is alleged to be prevented by illness from attending the court for a hearing of the case and the judge is satisfied of the fact of his illness and of the materiality and importance of his evidence and that the granting of an adjournment will not cause an injustice to the other party which cannot be reduced by costs, it is the duty of the judge to grant an adjournment, it may be on terms, and failure on his part to do so constitutes a miscarriage of justice which necessarily involves an error of law on which an appeal may be founded. SCOTT, L.J., put his view of the matter thus ([1943] 1 All E.R. 628):

"The only question in the appeal is whether the judge erred or misdirected himself in law in refusing the particular adjournment. DU PARCQ, L.J., thinks that, if the judge erred, his error was an error of fact. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., thinks there was an error of law. I have read both judgments with care, and agree with the conclusion arrived at by the latter, although I agree with the former that, if the refusal of the adjournment had been an exercise of discretion on a pure question of fact, no appeal would have lain under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 105. Upon the facts relating to the application for adjournment, I think the judge caused a serious miscarriage of justice, and that, in doing so, he neglected a first principle of law, for he deprived the defendant of his elementary right to be heard before he was condemned."

DU PARCQ, L.J., in his dissenting judgment, found himself unable to discern a question of law in the matter, but in the course of his judgment (ibid., 632) he referred to this well-known passage from the judgment of LORD ATKIN in Evans v. Bartlam (2) ([1937] 2 All E.R. 650):

"Appellate jurisdiction is always statutory; there is in the statute no restriction upon the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal, and, while the appellate court, in the exercise of its appellate power, is no doubt entirely justified in saying that normally it will not interfere with the exercise of a judge's discretion except on grounds of law, yet, if it sees that, on other grounds, the decision will result in injustice being done, it has both the power and the duty to remedy it."

A It should be noted that the discretion to which Evans v. Bartlam (2) related was a discretion exercised by a judge of the High Court, and, therefore, their lordships were not embarrassed in that case with the effect of the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 105, but from the passage in the judgment of SCOTT, L.J., to which I have already referred it will be seen that, in the view of the learned lord justice, similar considerations apply on appeals against an allegedly improper exercise of discretion by a county court judge. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dealt with the matter on what I may, perhaps, describe as rather more conventional lines. He summed up his view in these terms ([1943] 1 All E.R. 635):

B “It has, I think, always been maintained that an exercise of judicial discretion on a wrong principle is appealable. To exercise it on wrong considerations or on wrong grounds, or to ignore some of the right considerations, is, in my judgment, to decide on wrong principles. The effect of the judge’s order was to reject in advance the defendant’s evidence altogether. Why? Apparently, if we are to accept the addendum to his note, on the ground that there was no affidavit in support of the [medical] certificates or verifying them.”

C The judge went on to say that this was not a sufficient ground.

D Applying the observations I have just quoted from the judgment of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., to the present case, did the judge here exercise his discretion on wrong considerations or wrong grounds, or did he ignore some of the right considerations? If so, then he decided on wrong principles, his error was a matter of law, and this court can interfere. It was argued before us for the landlord that it has not been shown that the judge took anything into consideration which he ought not to have taken into consideration or failed to take into consideration anything which he should have taken into consideration. We are told nothing more than the bare fact that the application for a new trial was made and dismissed. There is this amount of force in that submission, that prima facie it is the duty of an appellant to provide the court with a sufficient record of what took place before the learned judge to enable this court to understand and deal with the matter, but I think the truth here is that the application for a new trial was actually disposed of in the matter of a very few minutes, and the judge does not appear to have given any reasons. If he had given any reasons, no doubt, the solicitors present would have made a note. In the result, we have the facts which I have stated, and we have the judge’s refusal recorded, so far as we are concerned, without reasons, and nothing more.

E Can it be said in those circumstances that the judge demonstrably proceeded on some wrong ground or excluded something from consideration which he ought to have considered? In my view, although no reasons are given by a judge exercising, or refusing to exercise, a discretionary jurisdiction, it may, nevertheless, be possible, on looking at the facts, to say that, if the judge had taken all the relevant circumstances into consideration and had excluded from consideration all irrelevant circumstances, he could not possibly have arrived at the conclusion to which he came, because on those facts that conclusion involves a palpable miscarriage of justice. Thus, one gets back, in effect, to the way in which the point was dealt with by SCOTT, L.J., in Dick v. Piller (1).

H What were the matters to be taken into consideration here? Far be it from me to attempt an exhaustive statement of the considerations which should influence a judge in exercising his discretion under Ord. 37, r. 2; but I can, at all events, state a few considerations which are of the first importance. It is to be observed that in certain circumstances “may” in r. 2 should, I apprehend, in effect be construed as “must”. Suppose a case where a defendant, plainly through no fault of his own, arrives five minutes after an order against him has been made and perfected in his unavoidable absence. If in such a case the defendant forthwith applies for a new trial, acting as promptly as he possibly can, it seems to me difficult to see how a learned county court judge could be justified in refusing to exercise his discretion in favour of that defendant—at all events, on suitable terms as to costs, but, perhaps, in an extreme case such as I have mentioned, not even on any special terms as to costs. With that in mind I will mention some of the main considerations which I conceive should be regarded in the exercise of the learned judge's discretion. First, although there is no hard and fast rule about it, as LORD ATKIN pointed out in Evans v. Bartlam (2) ([1937] 2 All E.R. 650), it must be material for the learned judge to know why it was that the defendant failed to appear on the proper day when the case came into the list and was heard. How does this case stand as regards that matter? There is the undisputed statement of the tenant which he has put on oath before us to the effect that his absence was due to the wrong advice which he received from one of the officials of the court. One starts with that. The difficulty in which he finds himself is due to the fact that an official of the court unwittingly misled him. Secondly, has there been any undue delay by the absent party in launching his proceedings for a new trial? In answering that question I venture to think that delay in itself would not be important, but delay prejudicing the other party or delay which would enable rights of third parties to intervene would be most material. How does the matter stand here as regards delay? The tenant did not move in the matter until, I think, Sept. 23, 1952, i.e., some six weeks or so after he received the copy of the order, but in estimating the importance of that lapse of some six weeks it is right, I think, to bear in mind that the original order for possession did not direct possession to be given up until Nov. 3, 1952, so that at the date when the tenant launched his application there was plenty of time left for a new trial to be held without embarrassing the landlord (assuming him to be successful on the new trial) by having the tenant in his house for a longer period than he would otherwise have been and, therefore, perhaps impeding him in some future disposition or letting of the house. In this case, therefore, I should not say that there had been any undue delay, and that conclusion is reinforced by the circumstance that when this application did come before the learned judge and he refused it he granted the tenant an extension of time for giving up possession to Jan. 1, 1953. So the learned judge cannot have thought that there had, up to the time the matter came before him on Oct. 28, been any delay which would prejudice the landlord. The learned judge could on the same day have granted a new trial with every prospect that the new trial would be held before Jan. 1, 1953. Thirdly, will the landlord in this case be prejudiced by an order for a new trial? There may be cases where the order sought to be set aside has been acted on and circumstances have arisen (generally linked, I should say, with some undue delay or other dereliction on the part of the defendant) which would make it unfair or inequitable that the case should be re-opened. I see nothing in the facts of the present case which could be said to make an order for a new trial prejudicial to the landlord in any respect which could not be adequately compensated by a suitable award of costs.

There is a more debatable point, as I regard it, as to how far the learned judge should consider the prospects of success of the party applying for a new trial. No doubt, the learned judge is entitled to satisfy himself that the party applying has a bona fide intention of defending the action and that there is some possibility of his doing so with success. For example, I apprehend that, if an admitted and self-confessed trespasser allowed judgment for possession to go in default in his absence, the learned judge would be entitled, on an application for a new trial, to refuse on the ground that he was palpably a trespasser, and could not, whatever evidence he gave, possibly justify his presence in the house. Short of cases of that kind I think that a new trial should seldom, if ever, be refused merely on the ground that the applicant's case appears a weak one, and it is, moreover, difficult to see how the tenant's case here could on the face of it be classed as obviously weak in view of the payment into court. Be that as it may, a party to an action is prima facie entitled to have it heard in his presence. He is entitled to dispute his opponent's case and cross-examine his opponent's witnesses, and he is entitled to call his own witnesses and give his own evidence before the court. If by some mischance or accident a party is shut out from that right and an order is made in his absence, then common justice demands, so far as it can be given effect to without injustice to other parties, that that litigant who is accidentally absent should be allowed to come to the court and present his case, no doubt on suitable terms as to costs, as was recognised in Dick v. Piller (1).

While I have felt considerable hesitation in finding that this is a proper case in which to interfere with the judge's discretion—in particular, a discretion exercised by so careful and experienced a judge as SIR GERALD HURST—I have come to the conclusion that on the facts the learned judge could not have done otherwise than order a new trial on suitable terms as to costs if he had paid due regard to the considerations properly relevant to the exercise of his discretion, and to those considerations only. For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

MORRIS, L.J.: I have reached the same conclusion, and I only add a few words because I have formed a view different from that reached by the county court judge. When the application for a new trial came before him on Oct. 28, 1952, it appears that it was accepted that the tenant had, in fact, been told before the date fixed for the action by some official in the court that it was not necessary for him to attend on the date appointed for the hearing of the action. That being so, it seems to me that the tenant showed a very compelling explanation for his non-attendance at the hearing, and he advanced very strong grounds in support of his application that there should be a re-hearing. He had never been heard; his case had never been before the learned judge. That was not the fault of the landlord, but the tenant had this rather unusual, but satisfactory, explanation, the accuracy of which was, apparently, not doubted. That being so, it seems to me that, in the absence of some very good reason, the application for a new trial should have been acceded to, and I think further that, in the absence of some such good reason, not to accede to the application involved proceeding on a wrong principle in such a way as to amount to an error in law. If there was such an error in law, then the matter becomes appealable to this court within the provisions of the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 105, which provides that if any party to any proceedings in a county court is dissatisfied with the determination or the direction of the judge in point of law or equity, or on other grounds which I need not mention, then he may appeal to this court.

In my judgment, Dick v. Piller (1), decided in this court, is authority supporting the view to which I have referred. I make one further citation from Dick v. Piller (1) in addition to those which my Lord has made. I refer to the concluding words in the judgment of SCOTT, L.J., who was one of the majority in the court. He said ([1943] 1 All E.R. 630):

“Jones v. S.R. Anthracite Collieries, Ltd. (3) in the Court of Appeal is authority that the question raised by this appeal is covered by the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 105, and, I think, affords some support to the view which I take that, where a miscarriage of justice, such as I think took place here, occurs, it necessarily involves an error of law.”

I, therefore, think that, unless there was some good reason pointing to a different result, there was a compelling case in favour of acceding to the application made, and that not to accede to it did, in the circumstances of this case, involve proceeding on a wrong principle, which, in turn, amounted to an error in law. It has been said that on Oct. 28, 1952, the learned county court judge went into the matter, and that, in effect, he came to the conclusion that there was nothing to try, or that on a re-trial the result must have been reached which was reached originally in the absence of the tenant. I think that if, on an application for a re-trial within Ord. 37, r. 2, it is quite manifest to a judge that there is really nothing to be tried, or if there are some special circumstances which make it clear that on a re-hearing the same result as that already announced must again be reached, then it may well be that a learned judge could refuse an application. But I cannot regard the facts of the present case as being within any such principle. In Dellenty v. Pellow (4), in this court, JENKINS, L.J., in delivering his judgment, with which the other members of the court agreed, said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 716):

"I would agree that, prima facie, where possession is sought on the ground of non-payment of rent . . . and the tenant pays the rent into court or tenders the rent before judgment, it would not be reasonable to make an order for possession . . ."

That being so, on the facts of this case, as the rent was paid into court, prima facie it would not be reasonable to make an order for possession. The learned lord justice went on to say (ibid.):

"In the present case, however, the evidence showed that there had been a long history of default on the part of the tenant, and time after time it had been necessary to issue a summons against him before the rent could be extracted from him. This time again he allowed his rent to fall into arrear for more than a year and did not pay until the summons was issued and the case was about to be heard."

We have been told that on Oct. 28, 1952, the tenant did not give evidence on oath, that the hearing took a matter of minutes, and that the learned judge did not feel it necessary to make any notes of the points that were before him. It seems to me that it would require a careful examination of the history of the case before any conclusion could be reached in regard to the question whether it was reasonable to make an order for possession. The tenant had not gone to court on Oct. 28 prepared to argue his whole case, nor, so far as we can ascertain, did anything in the nature of a hearing of the case take place, nor was it the appropriate time for such a hearing. It could not possibly, in my judgment, be said that there was not a very substantial matter to be heard. The matter could not be disposed of in the course of a few minutes, and would require investigation of all the facts and would require also comparison of the facts, when ascertained and when explanations were received and considered, with the facts in Dellenty v. Pellow (4). Each case must obviously depend on its own facts. I cannot, therefore, accede to the view that what took place on Oct. 28 demonstrated either that there was nothing to be tried, or that in any event the landlord must on a re-hearing have received judgment. There was a case to be tried. I think that, in view of the explanation given, and not challenged, why the tenant had not been present at the hearing of the case, compelling reason was shown why he should be allowed to have a re-hearing.

ROXBURGH, J.: I agree. The explanation which the tenant offered for his non-attendance at the trial was compelling, and there is no reason to think that any doubt was thrown on its truth. Therefore, the learned judge, in refusing the application for a new trial, must have been actuated by some consideration of weight and importance. It cannot have been delay, for the reason which my Lord has already given. What, then, can it have been? It must, I think, have been that the judge thought that the tenant was unlikely to succeed if there was a re-trial. In my view, as a matter of law, he was not entitled to adopt that attitude at that stage. As has already been pointed out, on the authority of Dellenty v. Pellow (4) (where, as in this case, the rent was paid into court before the hearing) prima facie there must have been a case to be tried because it would rest on the landlord to prove that in the circumstances of the case that prima facie rule should be departed from. By "evidence" in the passage quoted by MORRIS, L.J., from the judgment of JENKINS, L.J., in Dellenty v. Pellow (4), was meant, not a mere statement of some advocate dealing with an application for a new trial, but evidence taken in the ordinary way at a trial, cross-examined to if the other side desired to cross-examine to it, and accepted after hearing any counter-evidence. Therefore, in my judgment, this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Re JONES (deceased). MIDLAND BANK EXECUTOR AND TRUSTEE CO., LTD. v. JONES AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), January 22, 1953.]

Will—Forfeiture clause—Forfeiture on annuitant, in opinion of trustee, having "social or other relationship" with named person.

By his will a testator directed his trustee to purchase an annuity in the name of the trustee in favour of the testator's daughter D. and to pay the income produced thereby to the said D. in such manner as the trustee should in its uncontrolled discretion appoint, "Provided always and I hereby direct that if at any time . . . [D.] shall in the uncontrolled opinion of the [trustee] have social or other relationship with [G.] . . . then in such case as from the occurrence of such event [D.] shall absolutely forfeit and lose one-half of the annuity payments . . ." and that half share should be paid to another person.

HELD: the term "social or other relationship" was incapable of exact definition; the uncertainty was not cured by the fact that the opinion of the trustee was the deciding factor, because the testator had not adequately defined the state of affairs on which the opinion was to be formed; and, therefore, the provision for forfeiture was void.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, (i) whether the direction in cl. 10 (b) of the will of John Hibbert Jones, deceased, that after the death of the testator's widow his trustee, the Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co., Ltd., was to purchase an annuity for the defendant, Doris Mabel Jones, was (a) a direction to expend the whole of the testator's residuary estate in the purchase of such an annuity, or (b) a direction to purchase an annuity of such amount as the trustee in its discretion thought fit, or (c) a direction void for uncertainty; and (ii) whether the proviso in cl. 10 (b) of the will for forfeiture by Doris Mabel Jones of one-half of her annuity and payment of the other half if she should have social or other relationship as therein mentioned was a valid or a void provision.

By his will, dated Dec. 8, 1947, the testator, who died on July 22, 1950, devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate on the usual trusts for sale and conversion to his trustee (therein called "the company") and by cl. 10 directed the company to pay or provide for his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, legacies, and certain duties, and to invest the residue, and to stand possessed of the investments and any part of his estate for the time being unconverted (therein called "his residuary trust fund") on the following trusts:

"(A) Upon trust to pay the income thereof to my . . . wife during her life and after her death (B) Upon trust to purchase an annuity in the name of the company in favour of my said daughter Doris Mabel Jones and to pay the income produced thereby to the said Doris Mabel Jones in such manner as the company shall in its uncontrolled discretion appoint . . . Provided always and I hereby direct that if at any time during the lifetime or after the death of my said wife my said daughter Doris Mabel Jones shall in the uncontrolled opinion of the company have social or other relationship with [G.] . . . then in such case as from the occurrence of such event my said daughter Doris Mabel Jones shall absolutely forfeit and lose one-half of the annuity payments hereinbefore directed to be paid to her and the other [sic] one-half share of the said annuity payments so forfeited shall from the date to be determined at the absolute discretion of the company be paid to my daughter Gladys Joyce during her life and after her death (c) Unto and equally between the British Empire Cancer Research Fund, and the Royal National Lifeboat Institution and Dr. Barnardo's Homes absolutely."

The fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth defendants were various charities interested under the will.

DANCKWERTS, J.: I now have to consider whether provisions of cl. 10 (b) of this testator's will are effective or whether they are void for uncertainty. The testator evidently had an objection to a certain lady whom he mentions in the clause, and, in the event of his daughter, Doris Mabel Jones, "in the uncontrolled opinion of the company", that is, the bank, which is the trustee, having "social or other relationship with" the lady in question, she was to suffer a forfeiture in respect of an annuity which the testator provided for. There is no doubt that this condition imposed on the gift of the annuity is a condition subsequent and, as it is a condition subsequent which may involve forfeiture, there is no doubt, again, as to the principle of law which is to be applied, namely, that

“ . . . that condition must be such that the court can see from the beginning, precisely and distinctly, upon the happening of what event it was that the preceding vested estate was to determine ”:

A per LORD CRANWORTH in Clavering v. Ellison (1) (7 H.L. Cas. 725), decided in 1859. That is the principle which I have to apply.

B It has been argued on behalf of those who would benefit in the event of forfeiture that the material words, “ have social or other relationship with ” the lady in question, are not too uncertain and have a meaning which can be clearly ascertained, and I have been referred to Lord Dormer v. Knight (2), decided in 1809. That was a decision of the Court of Common Pleas, sitting en banc, to consider a case which had been tried before LORD MANSFIELD, C.J., with a jury. The words in that case were “ associate, continue to keep company with, or cohabit or criminally correspond with ” a certain person. On the happening of any of those events, an annuity was to cease and a smaller annuity was to be substituted. The report says (1 Taunt. 418):

C “ The court were clear that this deed had received a perfectly right construction ; for it appeared by the evidence, that short of criminal intercourse, Mr. F. was a suspected person.”

What he had done, it appears, was simply to call in the ordinary way (ibid., 417) and leave

D “ his card, like any other visitor: he had sometimes been admitted; but the witnesses had never seen any improper behaviour in him, nor any appearance of levity in the lady,” whatever that may mean. The court said (ibid., 418):

E “ The words of the deed were as general as could be, and went much further than the mere exclusion of criminal cohabitation: the intention was, to put a stop to all intercourse whatever between these two persons. The receiving a man’s visits whenever he chooses to call, is associating with him. The parties had chosen to express themselves in those terms, and the words must receive their common meaning and acceptance.”

F The point made in the course of counsel’s argument on behalf of the seventh and eighth defendants is that “ relationship ” has exactly the same meaning as “ association ”, that this case shows that the word “ associate ” is not too uncertain to be given a meaning by the court, and that, as the Court of Common Pleas had no difficulty there in construing that word, no difficulty arises in the present case. But it is to be observed, so far as Dormer v. Knight (2) is to be used as an authority, that the question of uncertainty operating to prevent a forfeiture being effective was never argued, the question of the uncertainty of conditions subsequent was never discussed before the court, and the word G “ associate ”, which possibly by itself may denote something more active than merely the existence of an association, appeared in conjunction with the words, “ continue to keep company with, or cohabit or criminally correspond with ”, all of which seem to me to denote something active on the part of the person who was not to associate with the other named person.

H In Jeffreys v. Jeffreys (3), FARWELL, J., thought that the word “ associate ” presented difficulties. There was a provision in regard to the life interest given to a certain person in that case by a codicil that, if the person should “ in any way associate, correspond, or visit with any of my present wife’s nephews or nieces ”, the life interest was to be forfeited and the gift over was to take effect. FARWELL, J., held that the condition, which was, of course, a condition subsequent, was void for uncertainty. He says (84 L.T. 418):

“ Taking, for instance, the word ‘ associate ’—does that mean simply for pleasure or business, or both ? ”

It is argued, on the other hand, in the present case that that difficulty at least does not arise, because the words are "social or other relationship" and, therefore, it is relationship of any kind, in any form, which is forbidden by the clause.

I find some difficulty in knowing exactly what the words "social or other relationship" mean. From the OXFORD DICTIONARY it appears that the word "relationship" may have a number of meanings. In the present case it obviously does not mean any connection by blood or marriage between the two persons in question. It seems to me that there may be a difference between the words "relationship" and "association", as referring merely to the existence of a state of affairs, and the word "associate" which connotes some active step. In the present case I think that "relationship" means simply the existence of a relative state of facts between the two persons named, or, at any rate, that that situation may be included in the word. It seems to me that it may include, for instance, such things as being members of the same congregation, members of the same omnibus queue, citizens of the same State, and all kinds of things which merely are a passive existence of facts. This is not, therefore, necessarily merely a prohibition against active steps on the part of Doris Mabel Jones. In ascertaining the precise meaning of these words I find difficulty similar to that felt by FARWELL, J., in Jeffreys v. Jeffreys (3), and, unless this doubt is cured by the reference to the opinion of the trustee, this clause cannot be regarded as sufficiently certain to be upheld as a forfeiture clause or a condition subsequent.

The relevant words relating to the trustee are "shall in the uncontrolled opinion of the company have social or other relationship". It is said by counsel for the fifth defendant that those words resolve the difficulty because the guiding fact is not the existence of "social or other relationship", but the existence of "the uncontrolled opinion" on the part of the company. He referred me to a case in the House of Lords which certainly is of great interest in regard to the matter—Dundee General Hospitals Board of Management v. Walker (4)—where, in order that a named body should qualify for a legacy, the trustees had to be satisfied as regards a certain hospital, the Dundee Royal Infirmary, that ([1952] 1 All E.R. 896):

"... the said infirmary has not been taken over wholly or partly by or otherwise placed under the control of the State or of a local authority or of a body directly or indirectly responsible to the State and/or a local authority."

As counsel correctly says, quoting a well-known observation of BOWEN, L.J. [in Edgington v. Fitzmaurice (5) (29 Ch.D. 483)] the state of a man's mind is as much a fact as the state of his digestion, and he says that it is the existence of an opinion or the non-existence of a particular opinion which is the test of forfeiture or otherwise in the present case. Reference to the Dundee case (4) shows that the will there contained a condition precedent, and, unless the trustees were satisfied that a certain state of things existed, the condition precedent was not fulfilled and the legacy could not be claimed. As counsel for the first defendant pointed out, the existence of a doubt in the minds of the trustees was sufficient to prevent the condition being fulfilled, so that the legacy was not payable. The legacy would never be payable unless the existence of a particular conviction on the part of the trustees was proved. In the present case, in substitution for the opinion of the court, the opinion of the trustee is to decide whether or not a certain obscure and difficult state of facts has occurred. The trustee might be unable to decide, and the court might have to decide the matter, or to attempt to do so, on a reference to it by the trustee. It appears to me that that alters the situation and brings the matter nearer to Re Coxen (6). In that case JENKINS, J., says ([1948] 2 All E.R. 502):

"I have so far treated the condition as if it was simply in the terms 'if she shall have ceased permanently to reside', whereas its actual terms are 'if in the opinion of my trustees she shall have ceased permanently to reside'. That I think makes a very material difference. The opinion of the trustees that the double event has happened, and not simply the happening of the double event, is what brings about the cesser of Lady Coxen's interest. If the testator had insufficiently defined the state of affairs on which the trustees were to form their opinion, he would not, I think, have saved the condition from invalidity on the ground of uncertainty merely by making their opinion the criterion, although the declaration by the trustees of this or that opinion would be an event about which in itself there could be no uncertainty . . . "

He goes on to say that he thinks that the relevant double event is sufficiently defined to make it perfectly possible for the trustees to decide. It seems to me that that is directly on the point which I have to consider in the present case and that I should apply those observations of JENKINS, J., with the result that the mere fact that the decision of the point is referred to the trustee's opinion does not overcome the difficulty of uncertainty. Accordingly I come to the conclusion that the provisions of this clause for forfeiture are not enforceable and are void for uncertainty.

Order accordingly.

PASMORE v. WHITBREAD & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning and Morris, L.JJ., and Roxburgh, J.), January 20, 1953.]

Landlord and Tenant—Compensation for goodwill—Carrying on business for five years—"Predecessors in title"—Title to premises, not to business—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 4 (1), s. 25 (1).

The tenant of business premises surrendered his tenancy to the landlords who granted a quarterly tenancy of the premises to a new tenant, to whom the previous tenant sold the goodwill, fixtures and fittings. The landlords subsequently gave the new tenant notice to quit the premises expiring two and a half years after the commencement of his tenancy of the previous owner of the business. On an application by the tenant for compensation for loss of goodwill under s. 4 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927,

HELD: the "predecessors in title" of a tenant in s. 4 (1) and s. 25 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, meant his predecessors in title to the premises and not to the business; as the previous owner of the business had not assigned his tenancy to the tenant, he was not his predecessor in title; and, therefore, the business had not been carried on by the tenant or his predecessors in title at the premises for not less than five years, and he was not entitled to compensation under s. 4 (1) of the Act.

FOR THE LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT, 1927, s. 4 (1) and s. 25 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 889 and 910.

Case referred to:

(1) Williams v. Portman (Viscount), [1951] 2 All E.R. 539; [1951] 2 K.B. 948; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL from an order of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, Q.C., at Bromley County Court, dated Nov. 6, 1952.

On Nov. 24, 1951, the landlords gave the tenant notice to quit a garage occupied by him, and on Dec. 19, 1951, he served a notice on them claiming compensation for loss of goodwill or a new lease under s. 4 (1) and s. 5 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. On Jan. 17, 1952, on the landlords' refusing either to pay compensation or to grant a new lease, he filed an originating application in the county court. The matter was referred to a referee under the Act, who reported that the tenant was not entitled to either compensation or a new lease. The court ordered that the report be confirmed and adopted and that the application be dismissed, and the tenant appealed. A

Percy Lamb, Q.C., and N. R. King for the tenant.

Winn and Warshaw for the landlords.

DENNING, L.J.: The tenant claims compensation from the landlords under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 4 (1), on the ground that he has had to leave certain business premises, to which he says, a goodwill has become attached by reason of a garage business which has been carried on there for many years. To become entitled to compensation for goodwill under the sub-section the tenant must prove B

"to the satisfaction of the tribunal that by reason of the carrying on by him or his predecessors in title at the premises of a trade or business for a period of not less than five years goodwill has become attached to . . ." C them.

The whole question is whether he and his predecessors in title have carried on the business for the requisite period of five years. The facts as found by the referee are that a Mr. Fordham carried on the business of a garage in the premises from early in 1946 until the beginning of October, 1949, and the tenant from the beginning of October, 1949, until 1952. So a garage business has been carried on on the premises for over five years, but the question is whether Mr. Fordham was a predecessor in title of the tenant. The real issue is whether "predecessors in title" in the sub-section means predecessors in title to the goodwill of the business or predecessors in title to the tenancy. D
Mr. Fordham held a quarterly tenancy at a rent of £90 a year. In August, 1949, in the course of negotiations between Mr. Fordham and the tenant, the question arose whether the tenant should take an assignment of Mr. Fordham's tenancy or should take a new tenancy from the landlords. Mr. Fordham would, of course, have to surrender his tenancy, to enable a new one to be granted to the tenant. E
The landlords made it plain that they were unwilling to consent to an assignment by Mr. Fordham to the tenant of Mr. Fordham's tenancy, but they were prepared to grant a new tenancy to the tenant on Mr. Fordham surrendering his, and that is how the matter in fact went through. The tenant bought the business from Mr. Fordham. He paid £1,625 for the goodwill, fixtures and fittings, of which a large part was attributable to goodwill. At about the same time Mr. Fordham surrendered his tenancy and a new tenancy was granted by the landlords to the tenant on quarterly terms. F
The matter was thus completed in September and October, 1949. From 1949 onwards the tenant carried on the business until, on Nov. 24, 1951, the landlords gave him three months' notice to quit expiring on Feb. 26, 1952, in accordance with his tenancy agreement. Thereupon the tenant gave notice under the Act claiming compensation or a new lease. G

The tenant contends that he carried on the business at the premises himself from 1949 to 1952—two-and-a-half years—and that Mr. Fordham had carried it on for three years before him, making more than five years altogether. But was Mr. Fordham the predecessor in title of the tenant? Counsel for the tenant says that the words "predecessors in title" in s. 4, properly construed, mean predecessors in title to the business, and that Mr. Fordham was the H tenant's predecessor in title to the business. Counsel for the landlords says that "predecessors in title" means predecessors in title to the tenancy, i.e., to the legal interest in the premises. By s. 25 (1) of the Act of 1927:

"The expression 'predecessor in title' in relation to a tenant or landlord means any person through whom the tenant or landlord has derived title, whether by assignment, by will, by intestacy, or by operation of law."

A It seems to me, as MORRIS, L.J., pointed out in the course of the argument, that the expression must mean the same in relation to a tenant as it does in relation to a landlord. In relation to a landlord it clearly means predecessor in title to the property, not to the business. So, also, in relation to the tenant it must mean, and its natural meaning is, predecessor in title to the property and to the legal interest which the tenant holds. That meaning was assumed to be correct in Williams v. Viscount Portman (1) in which SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., said ([1951] 2 K.B. 952):

"It is obvious that emphasis might appropriately have been directed to the interest in the business rather than the title to the property; but, whatever might have been done, Parliament chose language which this court must construe to the best of its ability."

C It seems to me that there is no escape from the plain meaning of the phrase "predecessors in title", which is the predecessors in title to the interest of the tenant in the premises. If Mr. Fordham had assigned his tenancy to the tenant, he would have been a predecessor in title of the tenant, but, as he did not assign his tenancy, but surrendered it in order that the landlords should grant a new tenancy to the tenant, he was not the tenant's "predecessor in title". Counsel for the tenant said that that might lead to most unjust consequences, and I can see that it is very hard on the tenant in this case. Indeed, as counsel pointed out, the policy adopted by the landlords here means that landlords have an easy way out of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. If a landlord grants leases, each for three years, to a series of successive tenants, then, although a business carried on on the premises will increase in value with each tenant, none of them gains any rights under the Act or can say that his predecessor is a "predecessor in title" to him. Each has his own tenancy. I ought to say, however, that the policy of these landlords is not devised in any way so as to evade the Act. Long before the Act, indeed ever since 1915, their policy has been to say: "We do not like one tenant assigning to another. We much prefer the previous tenant to surrender his tenancy and ourselves to grant a new one to the incoming man". That is what they have done. The effect is that the previous tenant is not the predecessor in title of the new tenant and the Act does not operate unless the new tenant is himself there for five years. It is very hard on a tenant who has paid a very substantial sum for goodwill, but I hope that in future tenants taking a new tenancy will realise that they have not any security of tenure until five years have passed, and that, therefore, the amount which they pay to their predecessor in the business ought to be scaled down accordingly. I would willingly have decided in favour of the tenant if I could have found any escape from the wording of the Act, but I cannot do so, and, in my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

H MORRIS, L.J.: I agree. The point that has been submitted to us was stated very succinctly in the report of the learned referee as follows:

"But the question is whether the words used in the Act—s. 4 and s. 25—are apt to cover a case where there was clearly no assignment, but a cancellation of an old, and grant of a new, tenancy. The words are 'predecessors in title' and I do not take the view that they are apt to cover merely a continuance of a business although maintaining the same goodwill. The words connote a title to the premises. It appears to me that the legislature cannot properly be held to have covered a case like the present whether its intention and policy were to do so or not."

I am in agreement with the way in which the referee stated his recommendation in that passage.

As my Lord has pointed out, Williams v. Portman (1), in this court, proceeded on the basis that the phrase "predecessors in title" had reference to the title to the property. The Master of the Rolls referred in his judgment to the language of the Act, and said ([1951] 2 K.B. 952):

"It may well be (and, I think, this is not said for the first time) that the language selected in s. 4 was not entirely happy, seeing that the subject-matter with which Parliament was dealing was compensation for goodwill attached to premises as the result of the carrying on at the premises of a particular business for a particular period of time."

On the language that was used and is to be found in the statute it seems to me that we cannot uphold the submission of counsel for the tenant. I think there is force also in what was submitted by counsel for the landlords that the word "title" is not the word that would normally be used in reference to the ownership of a business. I am in full agreement with all that my Lord has said and I think that this appeal cannot succeed.

ROXBURGH, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Prize Law—Condemnation—Partly constructed ship not capable of floating—Ship under construction in building yard—Seizure at same time as capture of port—No intention by captors to seize as immediate prize—Seizure after surrender of belligerent.

The fact which gives jurisdiction to the Prize Court is that a ship has been physically captured and taken out of the possession of her former owners. The physical capture of a ship is the same thing as taking her in prize, and the fact that the captors wish first to use the ship for their own purposes and then to make her a prize at a later date is irrelevant. It is the intention to seize, not the intention to seize in prize, which is essential. The jurisdiction of the Prize Court arises from the mere fact of seizure.

Article 46 of the Hague Convention No. IV provides that enemy private property cannot be confiscated by a belligerent. This must be understood to refer to private property which does not consist of war material or means of transport serviceable for military operations (OPPENHEIM'S INTERNATIONAL LAW, vol. II, 7th ed., para. 143, p. 405). Accordingly, an unfinished ship in course of construction can be a proper subject of prize—at any rate when it is captured by or with the assistance of naval forces—even though it is not capable of floating, because its completion would make it available for war-time use. A ship lying in a port is "captured" when the port is captured, and, therefore, five partly constructed ships lying in German ports when those ports were captured by or with the co-operation of the Royal Navy were captured at the same time as the ports themselves, i.e., on May 2 or 3, May 6, and May 10, 1945.

Although the German High Command surrendered unconditionally all forces under their control on land, at sea and in the air by the Act of Military Surrender of May 8, 1945, there was no surrender of the German government or Reich itself. It was the Declaration of Berlin on June 5, 1945, which terminated hostilities and ended the right of seizure in prize, because it was not till that date that the passive submission of Germany to the will of the allies became an accomplished fact. Though a victor may abrogate his rights jure belli—including the right of prize—not only by express renunciation but also by conduct, there is no necessity to imply a condition between those two dates that all rights jure belli were to be foregone by the allies. Further, when war is carried on by partners as allies, the unconditional surrender of one partner cannot protect it against the right of seizure in prize so long as active hostilities are continued by the other partner (as was the case with Germany and Japan), unless the victor consents to abrogate his right.

In consequence, all of the partly constructed ships concerned were validly seized in prize, although two of them were seized on May 10, 1945 (i.e., two days after the Act of Military Surrender).

APPEALS by the claimants from decrees made by LORD MERRIMAN, P., in the Prize Court dated May 10, 1951.

The objects affected by the decrees were (i) Hulls 507 and 508, which were under construction on the stocks at Flensburg in May, 1945, and which were not then ready for launching. The ribs of Hull 507 were up and half the plating was completed, while the double bottom of Hull 508 had been laid and half the ribs were up. The President referred to these as "the Flensburg structures" and the first-named appellant claimed them as its property. (ii) Numbers 347 and 348, which, in May, 1945, were still on the stocks at Lübeck. Number 347 was almost ready for launching save that she had not been painted. About seventy per cent. of No. 348 was completed, but the outer sides and decks were only partly riveted. The President referred to these as "the Lübeck structures" and the second appellant company claimed them as its property. (iii) The motor vessel, Hermes, which had been launched, but which, in May, 1945, was not completely constructed. At the outbreak of war in 1939 she was lying partly built in the Vulkan shipyards at Bremen-Vegesack, but as, owing to the outbreak of war, work could not be completed there, she was taken, in September, 1942, to Bolnes, near Rotterdam, where she lay, still incomplete, at the time of the allied landings in Normandy. In October, 1944, her owners, the third appellant, decided to have her towed to Emden for completion, and while she was lying in Emden harbour she suffered considerable bomb damage during an air raid. She did not sink in consequence of this damage, but was lightly grounded as a precautionary measure and holes in her below the water-line were provisionally stopped. In May, 1945, she was lying in Emden harbour, damaged, grounded and still incomplete. The third appellant admitted that she had acquired the character of a ship, but claimed her as its property. In the summer of 1947 proceedings were instituted in the Prize Court by the Procurator-General for the condemnation of these objects as good and lawful prize. By this date the construction of all of them had been completed by the claimants (who had obtained authority to do so from the Powers occupying Germany) and the Crown subsequently paid for the work done. The writs were dated as follows: Hull 507, July 22; Hull 508, Aug. 23; No. 347, Aug. 6; No. 348, Sept. 1; the Hermes, Aug. 13. The writ was served in each case by affixing it, or a copy of it, on a portion of the vessel.

By Ord. XV 2 (b) of the Prize Court Rules, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 1466), a cause for the condemnation of a ship is to be heard on evidence provided by affidavits of the officers of the ship concerned in the capture. Accordingly, the Procurator-General presented, in support of his claim, affidavits by naval officers asserting that they were present at the capture of these objects in 1947 and 1948, and that no ship's papers were found on board at the time of the seizure. The affidavits followed a common form, which was presumably prepared beforehand, but they did not in some cases state the precise date of capture alleged. For example, in respect of the Flensburg structure 507, the lieutenant who swore the affidavit on June 30, 1947, merely said that he was present at the capture of structure 507 "lately taken by His Majesty's ship of war". In the case of Flensburg structure 508, he was more specific and swore, on Sept. 29, 1947, that he was present "at the capture of the said ship 508 and lately taken by His Majesty's ship of war Royal Harold at Flensburg on Aug. 21, 1947". In the case of the Lübeck structure 347, another lieutenant of the Royal Navy, on July 22, 1948, swore that he was "present at the capture of the said ship s.s. Flenderwerke No. 347 . . . lately taken by His Majesty's ship of war Royal Harold". In an affidavit dated Aug. 26, 1947, he swore that he was present at the capture of s.s. Flenderwerke No. 348 "lately taken by His Majesty's ship of war". The Crown, in putting forward these affidavits in support of their claim, presumably overlooked the proposition that an enemy ship could only be captured as prize in time of war, and when this was pointed out by the German lawyer acting for the second appellant in a letter to the Admiralty Registry dated Oct. 28, 1947, this letter was placed by the Crown before the President. The President, finding that the order for condemnation, which he had pronounced on Apr. 29, 1948, against all these structures, except No. 348, had not been drawn up, thereupon cancelled the order which he had made and directed a new hearing.

On the re-hearing the Crown admitted that the right to seize in prize in connection with the late war expired on June 5, 1945, the date of the Berlin Declaration, when the allies assumed for the time being powers of government over the whole of Germany. It thus became obvious that the claim made on behalf of the navy that these objects were seized as prize in the summer of 1947 failed, and the seizure hitherto relied on and sworn to was invalid to give the Crown any rights in the Prize Court. The Procurator-General, therefore, revised his claim and contended that the occupation or seizure of the ports of Flensburg, Lübeck and Emden constituted ipso facto the seizure of the five structures found therein. The writs were amended on Feb. 6, 1951, to claim that the Flensburg structures were "seized and taken as prize by our naval or military or naval and military forces while lying at Flensburg at the time of the capture of Flensburg on May 10, 1945"; that the Lübeck structures were similarly seized and taken as prize while lying at Lübeck at the time of the capture of Lübeck on May 2 or 3, 1945; and, in the case of the Hermes, that she was similarly seized and taken as prize while lying at Emden at the time of the capture of Emden on May 6, 1945. New affidavits were sworn by Vice-Admiral Baillie-Grohman, on Jan. 22, 1951, to establish the capture of Flensburg and Lübeck on the dates named, and by Mr. Kent (assistant-solicitor in the Treasury Solicitor's department, who had the conduct of the proceedings) to establish that the port of Emden was occupied by His Majesty's Canadian army on May 6 and 7, 1945. This was confirmed by an affidavit sworn by a naval officer on Feb. 5, 1951, which stated that the port of Emden was surrendered to the allied forces on the morning of May 6, 1945, that the port was controlled by the navy with the assistance of military guards and the port area was cleared of Germans other than those in guarded camps and was later enclosed in a barbed wire fence, that no German could enter the port precincts without a pass, and that it was impossible for the Germans to do anything to their ships or go aboard them.

Jan. 12. VISCOUNT SIMON: These are consolidated appeals brought by the respective former German owners of five objects against decrees of May 10, 1951, made by LORD MERRIMAN, P., sitting in a Court of Prize, which dismissed the respective claims of the appellants and pronounced the respective objects to be liable to confiscation by the Crown and condemned the same as good and lawful prize. The issues in the appeal are complicated and have been admirably presented and argued before the Board by counsel on either side.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] LORD MERRIMAN, in his judgment, defined the questions for decision as follows:—

- (i) Were the ports in question respectively occupied in circumstances and at a time which permitted the exercise of any belligerent rights of prize therein?
 - (ii) If the ports were captured when they were respectively occupied, was their capture of such a nature as, ipso facto, to effect the capture of these objects respectively?
 - (iii) Were the Lübeck and Flensburg structures a proper subject of maritime prize, or were they merely private property on land, and, therefore, protected from confiscation by virtue of art. 46 of the Hague Convention IV?
 - (iv) In any event, assuming that for any of the above reasons any one or more of these objects is not liable to condemnation as good and lawful prize, and, therefore, must be released, ought they, nevertheless, to be released to the Crown and not to the claimants because, as was said in a letter of July 8, 1949, . . . they have, in consequence of the assumption of the government of Germany by the declaration of June 5, 1945, and of what is the equivalent of German legislation thereunder, become the property of the Crown?
- Counsel for the appellants discussed the questions involved in a different order and formulated them thus: (a) Is conscious volition or intention on the part of a captor necessary to constitute capture or seizure in prize? (b) Are structures not capable of floating, such as the Lübeck and Flensburg structures, capable in their nature of being maritime prize? He conceded that the Hermes was a "ship". (c) Did rights of seizure in prize continue after May 8, 1945, when the act of military surrender was signed at Berlin on behalf of the German High Command? The contention that no seizure in prize was possible after this date affects only Hull 507 and Hull 508, since Flensburg was captured on May 10, 1945.

Their Lordships find it convenient to deal with the issues raised in the order formulated by counsel for the appellants. The form in which the first question is framed implies that the captor who has laid hands on an enemy ship has an option to decide whether to claim her as a prize as from the date of seizure or to use her for his own purposes in the first place, with a right to seize her as a prize at a later date. There can be no doubt that this was the assumption made by the combined chiefs of staff of the allies in reference to captured German ships before the surrender of Germany. There is in evidence an affidavit, made on Jan. 18, 1951, in these proceedings by Mr. H. D. Samuel, an assistant secretary in the Admiralty and the head of the naval law branch of the secretary's department, which paraphrases the signals sent in cypher on this subject as follows:—

"4. I have read the signals and can say that in December, 1944, the combined chiefs of staff agreed on the following policies concerning enemy ships captured before the surrender of Germany: (a) For operational purposes supreme commanders were to have first claim on enemy ships taken in ports within their commands just as they had on ex-allied ships. (b) When supreme commanders had no further need for military operations of enemy merchant ships captured or found in ports within their commands these were to be transferred to representatives of the Combined Shipping Adjustments Board. Arrangements for manning and operations would then be made within the combined shipping pool, but such ships were to remain subject to all claims, including salvage claims, and were to be accounted for in the final shipping settlement. 5. On May 14, 1945, instructions were sent by the combined chiefs of staff to General Eisenhower that unless otherwise directed the policies referred to in para. 4 hereof should be applied to all German shipping captured by forces under General Eisenhower's command in German ports before the surrender or declaration of defeat of Germany. 6. Further instructions were given on this date to General Eisenhower that captured ships were to be seized as prize except for fishing-craft, inland water craft and vessels needed for local service with German crews. Seizure was to be effected in Bremen and Bremerhaven by the United States Navy and in other ports by the Royal Navy. 7. Further instructions were to follow regarding the treatment of shipping falling into the hands of the Allied Expeditionary Force upon surrender or declaration of defeat. On June 8, 1945, instructions were sent by the Admiralty to the naval authorities in Germany referring to the seizure of German ships in prize. A paraphrase of this signal is annexed to this affidavit and is marked 'A'."

Exhibit A, which was addressed to flag officers-in-charge, Hamburg and Kiel, flag officers, Norway, Western Germany, and Denmark, C. in C. Rosyth, F.O.I.C. Humber, and N.O.I.C. Methil, stated:

"Subject: German ships seized in prize. Vessels are, if possible, to be seized in ports of Germany or in ports occupied recently. Vessels to be accompanied to U.K. with affidavits of seizure in hands of officer commanding armed guard. These affidavits to be delivered to N.O.I.C. at arrival port. At such port affidavit to be delivered by N.O.I.C. to customs officer. Vessels not to be seized until at point of departure for U.K. by reason uncertainty regarding arrangements for re-fitting."

(The flag officer-in-charge for the Kiel area, which included Flensburg and Lübeck, was Vice-Admiral Baillie-Grohman.) These "further instructions" are obviously given with a view to complying with the procedure called for by s. 16 of the Naval Prize Act, 1864. The explanation of the last sentence of Exhibit A is that it was desirable to send a vessel seized as prize to the port of this country where she could be conveniently "re-fitted", i.e., overhauled.

- The view on which these directions were framed was, therefore, that when the allies took possession of German ports and thereby acquired control of enemy merchant shipping in them, a practical question would arise as to what was to be done with the shipping. On the one hand, the allies might be glad to use it "for operational purposes", for example, to move troops or to bring in supplies. The
- A fact that merchant ships and transports belonging to the allies had been extensively sunk by German submarines made it all the more necessary to avail themselves of means of sea transport which fell into their hands. On the other hand, the allied navies might be ambitious of taking the German shipping as prize and thereby contributing to the fund which would be available for prize-bounty. Having, as they conceived, these two alternatives before them, the joint chiefs of staff adopted the policy of recognising that the first claim on the shipping was for operational use and so informed General Eisenhower and others concerned. But they contemplated that German shipping seized in German ports should in the end be dealt with so as to contribute to the prize funds of the victorious navies. Thus, the plan was to use the seized ships in necessary operations as long as the war was going on without being handicapped by the formalities of a Prize Court,
- C but it was contemplated that when Germany surrendered there would still be time to bring the vessels before the Prize Court. Those who advised this plan and gave these instructions laboured under the misapprehension that proceedings based on capture in prize, which invoked the jurisdiction of the Prize Court, could be taken after the surrender of Germany. This, in their Lordships' opinion, was an error, and it is now conceded by the Crown that no seizure in prize could
- D validly take place after June 5, 1945. Counsel for the appellants, relying on the above assumption on which the first question is based and on the view set out above of the chiefs of staff, contended that the instructions given by the latter to seize in prize at a later date demonstrated that there had been no seizure in prize at the time of the capture of the ports, and that, therefore, there could have been no intention on the part of the captors to seize the objects in prize when the
- E ports were captured. This argument, however, is met, in their Lordships' opinion, by considering what is the nature of a prize-capture over which the Prize Court has jurisdiction.

- The British Prize Court, constituted at the beginning of any war in which this country is engaged involving naval action, is set up by a commission under the Great Seal addressed by the Crown to the Admiralty. The commission under
- F which the Prize Court sat in connection with the last war was issued under a Order in Council dated Sept. 5, 1939, which recited that a state of war existed between this country and the German Reich

- "so that His Majesty's fleets, ships, and aircraft may lawfully seize all ships, vessels, aircraft and goods belonging to the said German Reich or to the citizens and subjects thereof, or other persons inhabiting within any of the countries, territories, or dominions of the said German Reich, and bring the same to judgment in any such courts as shall be duly commissioned to take cognizance thereof", and the commission authorised
- G

- "the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral to will and require His Majesty's High Court of Justice and the judges thereof for the time being to take cognizance of and judicially proceed upon all manner of captures, re-captures, seizures, prizes and reprisals of all ships, vessels, aircraft and goods that are or shall be taken, and to hear and determine the same, and according to the course of Admiralty and the law of nations and the statutes, rules, and regulations for the time being in force in that behalf, to adjudge and condemn all such ships, vessels, aircraft, and goods as shall belong to the said German Reich or to the citizens or subjects thereof, or to any other persons inhabiting within any of the countries, territories, or dominions of the said German Reich or be otherwise condemnable as prize".

The Admiralty then executed this commission by issuing a warrant to the High Court requiring the judges to act accordingly. It is plain, therefore, that the Prize Court has jurisdiction in every case of seizure or capture of a ship alleged to have belonged to the enemy and to decide "according to the course of Admiralty and to the law of nations" whether it should be condemned as true and lawful prize. "Prize", in this connection, means nothing more than "taking" or seizure. "Capture in prize" or "as prize" is not one species of capture. If a ship is captured, she thereby becomes a prize subject to the jurisdiction of the Prize Court. The French equivalent for our "Prize Court" is "Cours des Prises", and "prise" means "taking". Littré defines "prise" as "action de prendre un navire". The jurisdiction of United States courts in prize cases equally extends to all captures, as explained by JUDGE STORY in NOTES ON THE PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE OF PRIZE COURTS. It was pointed out in the course of the argument that, according to MURRAY'S OXFORD DICTIONARY, the English word "prize" in this sense, though spelt and pronounced in the same way as the word for a reward, is a distinct word and means simply a capture. The first question in every prize case is: Was the vessel "captured" by the captors who demand its condemnation as prize? Similarly, in a claim for "prize salvage" it is normally essential to prove that the rescued ship had been "captured" by the enemy: The Progress (1); The Edward & Mary (2). This view of the matter, which is fundamental to the first and main issue in the case, is supported by the early history of prize jurisdiction. In ROSCOE'S HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH PRIZE COURT, the author points out how captures of ships when an English King was carrying on a naval war were likely to lead to complaints by neutrals or allies that their ships had been seized and how the Lord High Admiral was authorised in early days by the Crown to investigate such complaints "with a delegated authority in the nature of prize jurisdiction" (op. cit., p. 4). In course of time, a personage called the Admiral's deputy came into existence, who exercised a prize jurisdiction (SELECT PLEAS OF THE CROWN IN THE COURT OF ADMIRALTY, vol. 1, p. 42), and by the sixteenth century a rudimentary prize court undoubtedly existed (ROSCOE, p. 11). The jurisdiction was to decide about "prizes" i.e., capture of ships. In 1589, at the time of the Armada, for example, Dr. Julius Caesar, "doctor of laws, the duly appointed judge lieutenant of the High Court of Admiralty of England", was pronouncing sentence of condemnation of a Spanish ship as lawful prize (LAW AND CUSTOM OF THE SEA (Navy Records Society), vol. 1, p. 254).

Their Lordships, therefore, reach the conclusion that the physical capture of a ship is the same thing as taking her in prize and that a prize court has jurisdiction to decide "according to the course of Admiralty and the law of nations" the fate of every vessel so captured. The fact that captors wished or intended to make the vessel a prize at a later date is irrelevant; she became a prize subject to the jurisdiction of the Prize Court from the moment of capture. It is the intention to seize, not the intention to seize in prize, that gives jurisdiction. The view of their Lordships that the physical capture of a ship is the same thing as taking her in prize, and that the jurisdiction of the Prize Court arises from the mere fact of seizure, is supported by the language of the Naval Prize Act and by the Prize Rules made thereunder. The rules (Ord. I) define "captor" as meaning

"any person taking or seizing, or having taken or seized, any ship, aircraft or goods as prize . . ."

It is true that s. 16 of the Act requires, as a matter of procedure, that every ship taken as prize and brought into port within the jurisdiction of a Prize Court shall be delivered up to the custody of the marshal, or, failing him, to the principal officer of customs of the port, and s. 17 requires the captors "with all practicable speed" after this to bring the ship's papers into the registry of the court. If the captor seizes a ship and does not promptly act in accordance with these sections, this does not oust the jurisdiction of the Prize Court: see The Zamora (3) per LORD PARKER ([1916] 2 A.C. 104), but complaint can be made to it that this has not been done, and the Prize Court will permit those interested in the captured ship to institute proceedings before it and, in an appropriate case, to claim damages from the captor: see The Remonstrant (4), and COLOMBOS ON THE LAW OF PRIZE, 3rd ed., p. 310. Similarly, once a ship is captured, the Prize Court has jurisdiction to control its requisition, and to make orders to preserve the res.

When, then, did the capture of these objects take place? Allied forces, with which the British Navy co-operated, captured Lübeck on May 2 or 3 and naval forces occupied Flensburg on May 10, 1945. Naval officers were appointed "to control the ports and the shipping in them": see Admiral Baillie-Grohman's affidavit, para. 5. As a result "nothing could be done by the Germans with their ships, whether they were completed ships or uncompleted ships building in shipyards": see same affidavit, para. 6. LORD SUMNER said in The Pellworm (5) ([1922] 1 A.C. 302)

"... capture consists in compelling the vessel captured to conform to the captor's will. When that is done deditio is complete . . ."

Admiral Baillie-Grohman hoisted his flag at Travemünde, at the mouth of the river on which Lübeck lies, and the entrances there and to Kiel harbour were controlled: paras. 3 and 8. The port of Emden, in which the Hermes was lying, was similarly captured and held with the co-operation of the British navy. The inevitable conclusion from these facts is that the ships and other objects in the ports were "captured" at the same time as the ports themselves, just as, in The Bellaman. The Agostino Bertani (6), ships aground in Tripoli harbour were regarded as seized when the port of Tripoli was taken. They became, in LORD PARKER's phrase in The Roumanian (7) ([1916] 1 A.C. 138),

"enemy goods seized on enemy territory by the naval forces of the Crown . . ."

This is in accordance with SIR WILLIAM SCOTT's view in The Progress (1) where he observes, in reference to the allegation that the French had captured shipping in the port of Oporto (1 Edw. 210):

"it is not necessary to show that they had taken formal possession of each individual ship, because they had possession of the port itself; and the taking of that which contained the vessels is in effect the same as taking bodily possession of the ships themselves."

It may be objected that, if the seizure of a port in such circumstances involves the seizure of enemy ships within it, a ship which is in the port but which belongs to a neutral owner or is otherwise not liable to seizure is none the less seized and made prize. The answer is that this is indeed so, but the captor can put himself right by promptly releasing any vessel against which no claim of condemnation can be validly made: see para. 433 of OPPENHEIM'S INTERNATIONAL LAW, vol. II, 7th ed., p. 868. If there is unreasonable delay in releasing such a vessel, the parties interested have the right to compensation, which is awarded by the Prize Court: see art. 64 of the Declaration of London, which, though it was not ratified, embodies this rule. To sum up, the fact which gives jurisdiction to the Prize Court is the fact that the ship was physically captured and taken out of the possession of her former owners. It is this fact which constitutes her a prize, and the intention of captors to postpone the date when the Prize Court has jurisdiction is irrelevant.

The second question is whether the Lübeck and Flensburg structures were, at the time of their capture in May, 1945, capable in their then condition and position of being regarded as a res which was subject to capture as prize. As international law has developed, efforts have been made to set limits to the right of belligerents in war to capture property belonging to the enemy or to the enemy's subjects. Originally, no doubt, it was the practice of an army in invasion to seize such property on land and appropriate it, and equally for a belligerent navy to capture enemy ships and the like and their cargoes. But the rule soon developed (even though it was not always observed) that it was not legitimate to seize enemy private property on land (unless it was ammunition or arms which could be used against the enemy in fighting) while it remained the law of nations that captures at sea by naval forces were authorised. By 1781 a distinction between land warfare and maritime warfare in this respect was recognised: see LORD MANSFIELD's judgment in Lindo v. Rodney (8), in a note to Le Caux v. Eden. The explanation of this difference may well be found in the fact that merchant shipping is used in war for purposes of transport, and, so long as it belongs to the subjects of the enemy, it adds to his strength, while the capture of merchant shipping at once reduces the enemy's power and adds to the power of the belligerent and hence becomes a legitimate operation of war. Moreover, merchant shipping, unlike property on land, is usually found on the high seas, which belong to no particular nation. Cargoes belonging to or destined for the enemy (unless protected by the Declaration of Paris) are subject to capture by a belligerent for the same reason. The rule prohibiting the seizure by a belligerent of enemy property on land is now formulated in Hague Convention No. IV dealing with the Laws and Customs of War on Land, drawn up in 1899 and revised in 1907, art. 46 of which provides that "private property cannot be confiscated". This must be understood to refer to private property which does not consist of war material or means of transport serviceable for military operations: OPPENHEIM'S INTERNATIONAL LAW, vol. II, 7th ed., para. 143, p. 405; to capture and confiscate other private property in the course of land-warfare would be pillage, and this is formally prohibited by art. 47. Articles 52 and 53 deal with requisitions and the latter article, as revised in 1907, contains the paragraph:

"All appliances, whether on land, at sea, or in the air, adapted for . . . the transport of persons or goods apart from cases governed by maritime law, depots of arms, and, generally, all kinds of war material may be seized, even though belonging to private persons, but they must be restored and indemnities for them regulated at the peace."

The phrase "apart from cases governed by maritime law" marks the divergence between the rules of war on land, which prohibit capture of private enemy property, and the rules governing sea warfare which permit prize capture. On which side of the dividing line do the Flensburg and Lübeck structures fall?

There is no authority or decided case exactly in point and their Lordships agree with the learned President that the question whether the capture of any particular property is a justifiable means of coercion must be tested as a matter of principle. To use LORD MANSFIELD's phrase (2 Doug. K.B. 615), it is necessary to consider "the reason of the thing". DANA's note to WHEATON'S INTERNATIONAL LAW, 8th ed. (1866), p. 451, under the heading of "Distinction between Enemy's Property at Sea and on Land", contains the following passage:

"Where private property is taken, it is because it is of such a character or so situated as to make its capture a justifiable means of coercing the power with which we are at war. If the hostile power has an interest in the property which is available to him for the purposes of war, that fact makes it prima facie a subject of capture. The enemy has such an interest in all convertible and mercantile property within his control, or belonging to persons who are living under his control, whether it be on land or at sea . . . The humanity and policy of modern times have abstained from the taking of private property, not liable to direct use in war, when on land."

Applying this test, it would seem to follow that an unfinished ship in course of construction can be a proper subject of prize, at any rate when captured by or with the assistance of naval forces, for its completion makes it available for war-time use. Their Lordships agree with the learned President that these structures, though not capable of floating at the time they were captured, are none the less to be regarded as "maritime property in a maritime town" and are rightly to be regarded as maritime prize.

- A The third and last question in the appeal affects only Hull 507 and Hull 508, which were under construction in the port of Flensburg when it was occupied by a detachment of the British army and by British naval forces on May 10, 1945. The appellants submitted that the seizure of these vessels was invalid because seizure in prize is an act of hostility and all hostilities had been brought to an end on May 8, 1945, by the Act of Military Surrender signed at Berlin on that date on behalf of the German High Command in the presence of officers representing the supreme commander of the Allied Expeditionary Force and the Supreme High Command of the Red Army. The Crown's submission is that the right to seize in prize persisted till June 5, 1945, when the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the provisional government of the French Republic, by a declaration signed at Berlin by their representatives, declared that they assumed supreme authority with respect to Germany, including all the powers possessed by the German government, the High Command and any State, municipal and local government. That declaration admittedly brought to an end all hostilities between the allied Powers and the German State, and it terminated the right of seizure, because thenceforward all German ships and maritime property were at the disposal of the allied Powers as the supreme governing and legislative authority of the Reich. The decision of the learned President was that, though the victors might expressly and impliedly abrogate any rights that they may have jure belli including rights of prize, he saw no reason for holding that the Crown had lost those rights because of anything which occurred before the declaration of June 5, 1945.

- E The Act of Military Surrender of May 8, 1945, by which the High Command surrendered unconditionally all forces on land, at sea and in the air which were at this date under German control is unprecedented and there is no legal decision of the courts of the United Kingdom, nor, indeed, of any foreign court, which defines the consequences in relation to the victor's right of prize. The appellants, therefore, in default of more direct authority, sought to base an argument on precedents which define the effects of a general armistice. The argument was summarized by the learned President as follows:

- F "it is at the very least doubtful whether the exercise of belligerent rights in prize is permitted during an armistice, unless they are expressly reserved; and, seeing that an armistice is a mere suspension of hostilities, so much the less can the exercise of these rights be permissible after a total surrender, which involves an absolute cessation of hostilities."

- G This was in substance the argument presented to their Lordships. The argument is beset by the weakness which attends all arguments from analogy. A general armistice is the result of a negotiation in which detailed consideration is normally given to the conduct during the armistice of the armed forces of both parties, and it frequently includes as one of its terms a provision dealing with the right of seizure in prize. When that is done the agreed term regulates the right. But when there is no term in the armistice dealing with the right, then it is a question whether a provision should be implied that the right of prize is suspended, and that question will depend on the special circumstances of each case. When there are no special circumstances, the practice, or, it may be better to say, the tendency, of the courts varies in different countries. In France, for example, the tendency is to hold that the right of prize is suspended: see The Santa Flavia (9). The German and Italian courts, in obedience to their own municipal legislation, have taken a contrary view. There is, however, no doubt that during a general armistice the right of visit and search and the right to seize contraband and neutral vessels attempting to run a blockade are not suspended. Their Lordships are of opinion that, if these rights can be exercised against neutrals, a fortiori the British courts would recognise the right of seizure of enemy ships. All these rights find their justification in the prevention during the armistice of the enemy's replenishment of his resources and of the increase of his warlike potentiality. If that be the sound view, the supposed analogy between a general armistice and an unconditional surrender turns against the appellants.

But the absolute surrender of all existing military forces is not truly analogous to a general armistice, and provisions regulating the conduct of the victor's forces find no place in it, and are, indeed, incompatible with it. It may not be correct to describe such a surrender as a unilateral act of the vanquished enemy, for, to take the present instance, the surrender was received by the victor as an acceptance of terms which he might impose. Article 4 of the act of surrender of May 8, 1945, expressly provided that it should be "without prejudice to and would be superseded by any general instrument of surrender imposed by or on behalf of the United Nations", and the Berlin Declaration of June 5, 1945, was, in fact, the general instrument of surrender contemplated by that article. In the interval between May 8 and June 5 it would, of course, have been contrary to international law and the dictates of humanity to attack submissive and unresisting officers and men of the German forces, and it would not be incorrect to say that abstention by the victor from acts of that kind was an inherent condition of the surrender. But there is no necessity to imply a condition that all rights jure belli were to be foregone by the victor. The allies were, for example, fully entitled to order their forces to advance further into German territory, and their Lordships have no doubt that they remained entitled to seize German vessels on the high seas in prize.

There are two specialities of the situation as it stood on May 8, 1945, which provide additional and independent grounds for this conclusion. The first is that there was on May 8 no surrender of the German government or of the Reich itself. The appellants' case is that the victor's rights as a belligerent were immediately replaced by rights of subjugation. Such an instantaneous transition is scarcely practicable even when it is the enemy government that surrenders, but there was a German government still in existence on May 8, and it was entitled to raise new forces, to dismiss the existing High Command, to appoint new military leaders with instructions to continue the struggle. A prolonged resistance after the defeat of the German armies had often been threatened by German leaders and on May 8 it could not have been said that the resistance of the Reich was finally at an end. It is significant that the Berlin Declaration of June 5, 1945, instead of proceeding merely on the narrative that the German armed forces had surrendered, narrates also that Germany was no longer capable of resisting the will of the victorious Powers, and that the unconditional surrender of Germany had thereby been effected. By June 5, the chief members of the German government had been arrested, and the passive submission of Germany to the will of the victors had become an accomplished fact. It was, therefore, the Declaration of Berlin that terminated all hostilities and ended the right of seizure. The other matter is that Germany had been waging war in alliance with the Japanese Empire and that the war with Japan continued after the surrender of the German armed forces. Their Lordships agree with the Crown's submission that when war is carried on by partners as allies the unconditional surrender of one cannot protect it against the right of seizure so long as active hostilities are continued by the partner, unless the victor consents to abrogate his right.

Their Lordships do not find it necessary to consider the opinions of writers on the effect of the unconditional surrender of Germany's armed forces on the right to seize in prize. No author was cited who had had before his mind the precise state of affairs between the surrender on May 8, 1945, and the Berlin Declaration of June 5, 1945, or the distinction between a surrender by the High Command and the surrender of the Reich, or the effect of the continuance of the war by Germany's ally, Japan. Their Lordships find themselves in agreement with the opinion of the learned President that the victor may abrogate his rights jure belli including rights of prize, not only by an express renunciation, but also impliedly by his conduct, and they would add that there may be circumstances in which unreasonable delay after an unconditional surrender in regulating the situation by a new declaration or arrangement may have a prejudicial effect on the victor's retention of his rights. Their Lordships, therefore, hold that the condemnation as good and lawful prize pronounced by the Prize Court was correct and will humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed. The conclusion at which their Lordships have arrived renders it unnecessary to decide the fourth question formulated by LORD MERRIMAN. Inasmuch as the ultimate case for the Crown varied so widely from that first presented, there will be no costs of the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

REES v. BERNARD HASTIE & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.), January 20, 21, 1953.]

Factory—Protection of eyes—Cutting sheet metal by cold process—Need for employers to provide goggles or screens—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 49—Protection of Eyes Regulations, 1938 (S.R. & O., 1938, No. 654), schedule.

While a workman was engaged in cutting sheet metal with a machine operated by electrical power which did not involve the application of heat, a strip of metal which he was cutting off sprang up and injured his eye. His employers had failed to provide him with goggles or a screen. In an action for damages against the employers he alleged, inter alia, breach of s. 49 of the Factories Act, 1937, and the Protection of Eyes Regulations, 1938, made thereunder,

HELD: the "welding or cutting of metals by means of an electrical, oxy-acetylene or similar process" referred to in the schedule to the regulations applied only to high-temperature processes and did not extend to a cold cutting process, and, therefore, the employers were not under a duty to provide the workman with goggles or a screen, and were not in breach of the regulations.

FOR THE FACTORIES ACT, 1937, s. 49, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 9, p. 1039.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., sitting without a jury, made at Swansea on July 18, 1952, in an action for damages for personal injuries.

The plaintiff was a cutter employed by the defendants who were sheet metal workers. The machine the plaintiff used cut the metal by means of knives or shears which were operated by electrical power, and had a flex attached to a plug from which the electrical power came, but did not involve the application of heat. Inside the machine, which was held in the hand, was a motor which operated the shears. The plaintiff first made from a piece of steel a rough cutting which was larger than the actual piece which was finally to emerge. He then cut off the superfluous margin so as to get the precise shape he required. In the course of cutting, this marginal strip, which had a sharp point, sprang up, injuring and causing the loss of one of his eyes. His employers had failed to provide him with goggles or a screen in accordance with the Protection of Eyes Regulations, 1938, and s. 49 of the Factories Act, 1937.

The plaintiff brought an action for damages against the defendants, his claim being based on (a) negligence at common law, and (b) on a breach of the Factories Act, s. 49, and the regulations made thereunder. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., held that the defendants were liable in damages for a breach of statutory duty, and the defendants appealed.

Beney, Q.C., and G. P. Thomas for the defendants.

Marven Everett, Q.C., and T. Watkins for the plaintiff.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: We are concerned with the allegation that there was a breach of statutory duty. The breach alleged is failure to provide the plaintiff with goggles or a screen, contrary to the Factories Act, 1937, s. 49 and the regulations made thereunder. The section reads as follows:

"In the case of any such process as may be specified by regulations of the Secretary of State, being a process which involves a special risk of injury to the eyes from particles or fragments thrown off in the course of the process, suitable goggles or effective screens shall, in accordance with any directions given by the regulations, be provided to protect the eyes of the persons employed in the process."

Regulations were made in pursuance of that section, and in the schedule various processes are set out in respect of which goggles or screens are to be provided. We are concerned with the construction of the words in the schedule "welding or cutting of metals by means of an electrical, oxy-acetylene or similar process."

The first issue raised is whether what the plaintiff was doing was a process within the words that I have read. Counsel for the defendants submits that it was not. Counsel for the plaintiff submits that it was, and his construction may be summarised as being that the regulations cover any form of cutting if the power which leads to the steel being cut is electrical. Counsel for the defendants submits, in effect, that the regulations cover cutting only where the electrical process involves a very high temperature. One can approach the matter by first considering the oxy-acetylene process. That clearly welds and cuts by raising the portion of the steel to which the blowpipe is applied to a very high temperature. In welding the two separate pieces of steel are welded together by the high temperature, and in cutting the high temperature is applied by another method and the two pieces come apart. Although that is not cutting in the sense in which the word is ordinarily used, such as cutting with a knife, or with scissors, or shears, that process is described in the trade as cutting, and it is clearly described as cutting in this schedule which covers cutting by means of an oxy-acetylene process. On the evidence, when so cut, particles and fragments are thrown off at a high temperature and constitute a special risk of injury to the eyes. Where cutting or welding is performed by an electrical process and a very high temperature is used, there is the same throwing off of particles as in the oxy-acetylene process.

It is submitted on behalf of the defendants that the electrical process dealt with by the regulations is a high-temperature process, the use of an arc. In my opinion, that is the natural construction of this schedule, and I can state my reasons briefly. The fact that the schedule covers welding or cutting indicates that the process dealt with, whether oxy-acetylene or electrical, is one which can be used for either purpose, and the word "similar" indicates a similarity in the danger to the eyes with which the schedule deals. As in the case of oxy-acetylene the provision in the schedule plainly deals with the well-known danger of fragments and particles being thrown off at a high temperature, I would expect it to be dealing with the same danger in that part of it which refers to an electrical process. If it is read as including all processes of cutting when electrical power is used, it is obvious that the dangers, if they existed, would be of a different character. The fact that we are dealing with a single sentence and the use of the word "similar" point to the construction for which the defendants contend, namely, that the electrical processes referred to are high-temperature processes. Presumably, the words "similar process" were inserted to cover chemical means of obtaining a very high temperature other than by the combination of oxygen and acetylene, if they exist.

To my mind, that is the natural construction. Even if the other construction were possible, this is a schedule which creates offences, and the natural construction should clearly prevail for the benefit of the person against whom a breach is alleged. The learned judge seems to have assumed, or readily come to the conclusion, that the wider construction contended for by the plaintiff was right. I have given my reasons for coming to a different conclusion on that point. He went on to consider whether it was open to him to accept evidence, and act on a submission, that in this process particles and fragments were not in fact thrown off, or not thrown off so as to involve a special risk of injury to the eye, and, therefore, the regulations, in so far as they covered this process, should be regarded as ultra vires. He took the view that that was not a matter which it was open to him to consider and that the Secretary of State was the sole judge, and, as he had specified the process in regulations made under s. 49, it was not open to anyone to challenge it on the basis that it was not a process which involved a special risk of injury to the eyes within the meaning of s. 49. At first sight such a contention would be open to a party if a regulation were made covering a process which did not involve any special risk. I can see a possible argument to the contrary, but, as it does not arise in this appeal, I feel that it had better be left over to be decided when it arises. I am not satisfied, with respect, that the conclusion which the learned judge came to was necessarily the right one. For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. There is no doubt that in the schedule to the regulations of 1938 the Secretary of State specified a process which involves a special risk of injury to the eyes in these words:

"Welding or cutting of metals by means of an electrical, oxy-acetylene or similar process."

The question is not the extent of the powers of the Secretary of State or whether he ought to have done this or the other. The simple question for this court is whether the instrument which does the work of cutting, as it has been described in the judgment of my Lord, comes within the material provision. My Lord has considered this provision. He said, and I agree, that there must be a process for the purposes of "welding or cutting of metals" similar to the oxy-acetylene process. I share the view that my Lord has expressed with regard to the construction of this schedule, and I think that this appeal ought to be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree. It seems to me that the relevant provision is confined to cutting processes which involve the application of heat. There is nothing I can usefully add to the very clear exposition on that subject which my Lord has given. The only point on which I add a word is the question whether a regulation is to be conclusively treated as valid because it is made by the Secretary of State, regardless of any other aspect of the matter. The learned judge said in his judgment:

"It looks to me as if once the regulations have been specified by the Secretary of State, that particular process is brought within the section, and, being brought within the section, it follows that suitable goggles or effective screens ought to be provided to protect the eyes of a person employed in the process... The process is the work which the man is being employed to do, and... it is for the Secretary of State to legislate. Parliament has put him into the position of deciding whether a particular process ought to be brought within the section or not. I do not think the court has any duty or power to examine and see whether the Secretary of State is right or wrong in making the regulation."

I am not sure whether the learned judge was there laying down that the mere fact that the Minister makes a regulation under s. 49 establishes in itself the validity of the regulation. On the view that we have taken as to the meaning of the regulations, this particular point does not fall for decision, but I should hesitate to adopt that view as at present advised because, although I appreciate the suggestion that the words in s. 49 "being a process which involves a special risk of injury" are nothing more than a directive to the Minister, nevertheless, a formidable argument could be presented that the words "being a process which involves a special risk to the eyes" raise a question of fact which is open to review at the instance of anyone who is being proceeded against for an alleged breach of a regulation made under that section. It may be that as there are no such words as "being in the opinion of the Secretary of State a process", and so on, it would be open to an employer to prove, if he could, that the process which is the subject of the regulation was not one which involved a special risk of injury, but the point does not fall for decision in the present case and I agree with my Lord that it should be left as an open question. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), January 22, 23, 1953.]

Husband and wife—Ownership of property—Money found in matrimonial home after death of spouses—Wife owner of matrimonial home—Intention to form joint fund accruing to survivor.

A husband and wife lived in a flat which was the freehold property of the wife. The husband died in April, 1948, and his wife four months later, both leaving wills under which the plaintiffs were appointed executors and trustees. After the death of the wife a large number of banknotes and coins were found hidden in the flat. On the question whether the notes and coins belonged to the estate of the husband or to that of the wife or equally to both,

HELD: they belonged to the estate of the wife on the ground (i) that the freehold of the property on which they were found was vested in her: South Staffordshire Water Co. v. Sharman ([1896] 2 Q.B. 44), applied; or, alternatively, (ii) the fund was intended to be a joint fund in which both spouses were equally interested, and which, on the death of one of them, accrued to the survivor.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS for the determination, inter alia, of the question whether a sum of £5,994 13s. 6d. in notes and coins found after the death of the testatrix, Rebecca Cohen, in the flat formerly occupied by the testator, Max Cohen, deceased, and the testatrix belonged to the estate of the testator, or to the estate of the testatrix, or partly to one estate and partly to the other, and, if so, in what shares and proportions.

H. A. Rose for the first, second, fourth and seventh defendants.

L. H. L. Cohen (R. Cozens-Hardy Horne with him) for the third and sixth defendants.

Rink for the fifth and eighth defendants.

VAISEY, J.: This question arises under an originating summons which was issued on Sept. 1, 1950, in the matter of the estates of Max Cohen, deceased, and Rebecca Cohen, deceased. Those two persons were husband and wife. The husband's will was dated June 21, 1944. He died on Apr. 3, 1948, and probate was granted on Dec. 3, 1948, to the National Provincial Bank, Ltd., who were appointed executors of his will, with his wife, the testatrix, Rebecca Cohen; she, however, died on Aug. 18, 1948, having left a will dated Aug. 3, 1948, by which she appointed the National Provincial Bank, Ltd., as her executors. The summons to which I have referred was taken out by the bank, as executors of both wills, joining as defendants a number of the beneficiaries under the wills.

The matter came before WYNN-PARRY, J., on Oct. 19, 1951, when he made an order disposing of all the questions raised by the summons. One of the questions was in these words:

"Whether the sum of £5,994 13s. 6d. in notes and coins found after the death of the testatrix in the flat, No. 19, Montpelier Villas, Brighton, formerly occupied by the testator and the testatrix, belongs to the estate of the testator or to the estate of the testatrix, or partly to one estate and partly to the other, and, if so, in what shares and proportions."

On that question WYNN-PARRY, J., ordered that there should be an inquiry whether that sum of money belonged to the estate of the testator or to the estate of the testatrix, or partly to one estate and partly to the other, and, if so, in what shares and proportions, and there was a further question added—whether, if any part of the money belonged to the testator's estate, it formed part of the assets of his business at the date of his death or not. That inquiry having been prosecuted in chambers, the master made his certificate on Oct. 10, 1952. The master finds himself unable to answer the question and leaves it for the consideration of the court.

Max Cohen, the husband, carried on business in the city of London. He and his wife were residing together till the date of his death, and the testatrix, as a widow, continued to reside, at the flat, No. 19, Montpelier Villas, Brighton. The interval between the husband's death and the wife's death was a little over four months. Very little was done in regard to the husband's affairs before the death of the wife. After her death a large amount of notes and coins was found hidden in the flat. A bundle of notes was found behind the loudspeaker of the radiogram; more notes were found behind the water tank on the landing; a further sum was found in a locked tin box behind the wardrobe in the bedroom; and yet another sum was found underneath a kitchen cabinet. I venture to describe these two persons as having had some of the characteristics usually associated with magpies. In all, this sum of £5,994 13s. 6d. was found hidden in this flat.

So far as the evidence is concerned, there is nothing to throw any light on the mystery. In view of the conflicting claims of the beneficiaries under the respective wills I have to decide to which estate this money belongs. This money is not res nullius, an expression used in Sinclair v. Brougham (1), and it is obvious that no claimant other than the representatives of the two estates could be heard to assert any right to it. There is no indication to whom this money belonged. There is no suggestion that the husband and wife came to any agreement between themselves with regard to it. There is no evidence of the source of the money or of the purpose of its owner in depositing it in such a manner. Sometimes the solution to such a problem is to treat the claimants as entitled in equal shares.

I must, however, now mention another fact. The house, No. 19, Montpelier Villas, was the freehold property of the wife, that is to say, the legal estate was in her. Whether she held as nominee or trustee for her husband, or whether they had made any arrangement between themselves for any tenancy I do not know. But the fact is that she was the legal owner of the house in which they lived and in which this money was found, and it seems that there is a legal presumption that the owner of land is the owner of the chattels on the land, and for that proposition the authority is South Staffordshire Water Co. v. Sharman (2), of which the headnote states:

"The possessor of land is generally entitled, as against the finder, to chattels found on the land. The defendant, while cleaning out, under the plaintiffs' orders, a pool of water on their land, found two rings. He declined to deliver them to the plaintiffs, but failed to discover the real owner. In an action of detinue:—Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to the rings."

In his judgment LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., uses these words ([1896] 2 Q.B. 47):

"... the general principle seems to me to be that where a person has possession of house or land, with a manifest intention to exercise control over it and the things which may be upon or in it, then, if something is found on that land, whether by an employee of the owner or by a stranger, the presumption is that the possession of that thing is in the owner of the locus in quo."

There is a further authority, Johnson v. Pickering (3), in which this passage occurs in the judgment of LAWRENCE, J. ([1907] 2 K.B. 444):

"The tendency of modern authorities is to make an intention to possess the test, in the absence of more direct evidence, of actual possession."

And South Staffordshire Water Co. v. Sharman (2) is cited with approval.

Questions regarding possession, namely, what amounts to possession, from what possession may be inferred, and when possession can be deemed to indicate ownership, are questions on which there is much authority and, perhaps, controversy. Certain principles are laid down in Mason v. Lickbarrow (4). I was referred to a short passage of the report, where it is said (1 Hy. Bl. 360):

"Possession of goods is prima facie evidence of title; but that possession may be precarious, as of a deposit; it may be criminal, as of a thing stolen; it may be qualified, as of things in the custody of a servant, carrier, or a factor. Mere possession without a just title gives no property, and the person to whom such possession is transferred by delivery must take his hazard of the title of his author."

A The question of possession of property as between husband and wife has been adverted to and decided in many cases, especially since the passing of the Married Women's Property Act: see Ramsay v. Margrett (5) and Youngs v. Youngs (6). In the present case the possession was ambiguous in one sense, because the husband and the wife were both living in the house. It may be that this money came to be put where it was found between the death of the husband and the death of the wife, but, assuming that it was placed there while they were both living, then the possession of it as goods in the house is entirely ambiguous. Nobody can say as between the husband and the wife to which of them lawful possession must be attributed, but it was submitted that the authority of the South Staffordshire Water Co. case (2) must determine the issue in this matter as there is nothing better to rely on.

B I cannot find any solution which appears so probable or so convincing that it overrides what I find in South Staffordshire Water Co. v. Sharman (2) to be a principle of law to be appealed to if there is nothing else to guide one. I must follow that case and hold that this money belonged to the wife. As I have said, C I do not know whether this money was ever there in the husband's lifetime, but it was there when the wife died, and even if it was placed there in the husband's lifetime, it was so placed by one of two spouses on and in property which belonged to one of them, namely, the wife. I must, therefore, decide that these notes and coins were the property, not of the husband, but of the wife. Had I been able to decide the case on grounds a little more picturesque than D the whereabouts of the legal estate, I should have been very glad to do it.

E It was suggested that a useful guide is afforded by a recent decision of my own, Jones v. Maynard (7), approved in the Court of Appeal in Rimmer v. Rimmer (8). In the former case I came to the conclusion that where a husband and wife have what is called a "joint purse", and the purposes for which the joint F purse was formed come to an end, the proper way of dealing in a court of equity with the money that is left is not to investigate the precise sources out of which the fund was built up, but to assume that the intention was an equal division of what was left. The analogy of that case does not appeal to me in reference to the facts of the present case, because I consider that the more likely history of this deposit was that the husband and wife had put G the money aside with a view to providing for the survivor of them. I do not suggest that there was any intention to conceal assets from the revenue authorities, and it may well be that during the perilous times of the war it was thought advisable to have a large sum of cash at hand in case the husband should meet a tragic death, leaving the wife to maintain herself, or vice versa. In such a case the presumption would be, not for a division, but for an equality of ownership, in the sense that the nest egg was intended to remain intact for the benefit of the survivor after the death of one of the spouses. Jones v. Maynard (7) only applies to this extent, that, while the ownership of the fund might be presumed to be one of equality between the spouses, their interest in it was probably that of a severable joint tenancy, so that, if they wanted to divide the fund in their lifetimes, they could have done so, but if no such division were made, the fund would remain for the benefit of the survivor.

H If that view is taken,—and I only put it as an alternative to the main point on which I have decided the case, unsatisfactory though that point is—the result would be exactly the same, as, if the wife survived, she would be entitled to the fund as survivor. However, I base my decision primarily on the point which I mentioned first, but, in case I am held to be wrong in a higher court, I wish to add as an alternative reason for my decision in favour of the wife's estate that, if it were possible now to draw a deduction from one's knowledge of human nature, I should hold that this was a fund intended to be a joint fund in which both were equally interested and which accrued to the survivor. On that view, also, the wife's estate would be entitled to my judgment. A further point with which the master was asked to deal was whether any part of these funds belonging to the estate of the testator formed part of the assets of his business. As I have held that no part of it formed part of the assets of the testator, that side of the inquiry has never arisen, and I need not deal with it.

Order accordingly.

HICKSON v. HICKSON.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J., and Roxburgh, J.), January 16, 1953.]

County Court—Adjournment—Action by wife for arrears of maintenance under separation deed—Application for determination of title to property under Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17—Petition by husband for divorce on ground of wife's adultery—Proof of adultery relevant on issue of payment of maintenance—Applications by husband for adjournment of proceedings pending hearing of divorce petition—Husband's refusal to accept terms of adjournment.

A wife brought an action in the county court against her husband for arrears of maintenance under a separation agreement. The recital to the agreement contained a statement that the husband had undertaken to contribute to the maintenance of the wife and the child of the marriage so long as the wife should remain chaste. The wife also made an application, under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, for the determination of the title to certain property. On Nov. 3, 1952, the husband filed a petition for the dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery, and a copy of the petition was served on the wife on Nov. 4, the day fixed for the hearing of the county court proceedings. On applications by the husband for adjournment of the proceedings in the county court until the issue of adultery had been tried in the High Court, the county court judge was ready to adjourn both cases on certain terms. As the husband would not agree to the terms, the judge refused the applications for adjournment and heard and decided the cases. On appeal by the husband to the Court of Appeal on the ground that the county court judge should have adjourned the proceedings,

Held: (i) the practice followed in a court of summary jurisdiction, in accordance with the principle laid down in Knott v. Knott ([1935] P. 158) (viz., that, during the pendency of a matrimonial suit in the High Court on an issue of adultery, proceedings in a court of summary jurisdiction, in which the same issue was incidentally raised, should be stayed pending the decision in the High Court), did not give conclusive guidance in the case of a civil action for debt (e.g., the claim for arrears of maintenance under the separation agreement) brought in the county court; the county court judge had a discretion to stay the action, and, the issue of the wife's adultery being relevant both to the subject-matter of the case before him and to the matrimonial cause, it might have been convenient to grant the adjournment on terms; but, as the husband refused to agree to the terms on which the judge was prepared to adjourn the case, the judge had committed no error of law in proceeding to hear it.

(ii) in regard to the wife's application under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, the question of the ownership of the property did not depend on her conduct during marriage, and, therefore, there was no reason why the county court judge should have adjourned the case.

C APPEALS by the husband from orders made by His Honour JUDGE RICHARDSON, at Gateshead County Court, on Nov. 4, 1952, (i) in an action by the wife for arrears of maintenance under a separation agreement, and (ii) on an application by the wife under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, in regard to the title to certain property.

D The recital to the separation agreement contained a statement that the husband would pay maintenance so long as the wife remained chaste. The husband, having filed a petition for the dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery, applied to the county court judge to adjourn, pending the hearing of his petition, both the proceedings brought by the wife, but, as he would not agree to the terms on which the judge was ready to adjourn the proceedings, the judge refused the adjournments and heard the cases. The husband appealed to the Court of Appeal on the ground that the judge should have adjourned the proceedings in the county court until the issue of the wife's adultery had been decided by the High Court.

JENKINS, L.J.: I will ask MORRIS, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

G MORRIS, L.J.: These are appeals from decisions of His Honour JUDGE RICHARDSON given in the Gateshead County Court on Nov. 4, 1952, in two proceedings between the same parties, a husband and his wife. The same point is raised in both appeals, and, shortly stated, it is that the judge ought to have acceded to applications by the husband for adjournment of the proceedings. One of the two proceedings was an action in which the wife claimed from the husband a sum by way of arrears under a separation agreement. The parties were married in December, 1941, and on July 11, 1952, they entered into a separation agreement. The recital was in these terms:

H "Whereas the husband has undertaken during the joint lives of himself and his wife so long as the wife shall remain chaste or as hereinafter appears to contribute to the maintenance of the wife and of the child of the marriage, Norma, born on May 31, 1947, of whom the wife shall have the custody, such sum as will after deduction of the appropriate rate of income tax for the time being amount to the sum of £3 per week and the parties hereto in pursuance thereof have agreed to enter into the covenants hereinafter contained."

The first covenant was:

“ The husband will pay to the wife during the joint lives of himself and wife so long as they shall be living apart the sum of 30s. per week and the sum of 30s. per week in respect of the said child Norma until she shall attain the age of sixteen years.”

By her particulars of claim the wife alleged that the husband had failed to make any payments under the agreement and claimed arrears due which, between July 12, 1952, and Oct. 11, 1952, amounted to £39. By his defence the husband denied the maintenance agreement and further denied any liability under it, including the alleged arrears of £39. The substance of the husband's case was that he alleged that his wife had not remained chaste and that, accordingly, he was not liable to pay.

The other proceedings before the county court judge were under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17. The wife was the applicant and alleged, in the particulars of claim, that in May, 1949, certain property at Faraday Grove, Gateshead, was purchased by the husband for the sum of £625; that the sum of £100 by way of the deposit and legal expenses, including stamp duty on conveyance and mortgage, was supplied by her as part of the purchase price; that the balance of the purchase price was provided by a building society mortgage and that the repayment of the mortgage had been made by her and by her husband jointly; and that the rates and usual outgoings had been paid from joint moneys. She further alleged that the household furniture and effects set out in the schedule to her particulars of claim were bought by her out of moneys belonging to her or were gifts to her, and she claimed all the furniture. Therefore, she asked for a declaration under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, in regard to the house and for an order that the furniture and effects were her property and should be delivered to her.

Both proceedings were due to come on before the learned judge on Nov. 4, 1952. We were told by counsel for the husband that the husband considered that, since December, 1951, he had had reason to doubt his wife's conduct, that he had made applications to the Legal Aid Committee to be admitted as an assisted person, but that, as no step had been taken by the committee by Nov. 3, the day before the hearing of the county court proceedings, he withdrew his papers and his application from the committee, and, at his own expense, caused to be drafted and filed a petition for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery. The wife was served with that petition on Nov. 4. Before that date there were some discussions between the solicitors for the parties in regard to possible adjournments of the county court proceedings, but no agreement was reached. When the matters came before the county court judge on Nov. 4, applications were made on behalf of the husband that both proceedings should be adjourned pending the hearing of the divorce petition. The learned judge did not refuse an adjournment absolutely. There was a discussion as to certain terms, and the judge was willing to adjourn the proceedings, so far as the action for arrears of maintenance was concerned, if the money claimed by the wife on her own behalf was paid into court and the amount payable in respect of the child was paid by the husband. The husband would not agree to those terms. He would agree to pay the money for the wife into court, but, in respect of the child, he would agree to pay only 20s., and not 30s. After some consideration of the matter and after the failure of the parties to agree terms, the judge decided not to accede to the applications for an adjournment.

It seems to me that different considerations apply in regard to the two proceedings, as, in regard to those under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, it is very difficult to see how a determination, as a matter of fact, in regard to the ownership of the property as between the husband and the wife could be affected by any question whether one of the spouses had or had not committed a matrimonial offence at a time after the property was acquired. It is plain, however,

- that the judge did not refuse out of hand to consider the application for adjournment. On the contrary, he went into the matter and considered possible terms, and it was only when there was a failure to agree that he decided not to grant an adjournment. So far as the action for maintenance was concerned, the course that was then adopted was that the learned advocate for the husband did not call evidence on the issue of the alleged adultery of the wife. I think that it was made clear to the judge that the adjournments were applied for on the ground
- A that there was a pending petition in the sense that a petition had been filed and served, though the matter was not ready for hearing, and that the issue of adultery should be determined in the High Court. The issue in the action was whether or not, under the terms of a contract, the husband owed a sum of money to his wife, and, incidentally, in the determination of that issue the husband proposed to raise a question that his wife had not remained chaste.
- B If counsel for the husband is to succeed in his application before us, he must show that there was some error of law. Therefore, he must show that the county court judge either had no discretion in this matter to refuse an adjournment or that he exercised his discretion on a wrong principle resulting in a miscarriage of justice, and, accordingly, that an error in law took place. No authority has been cited to us by counsel for the husband to show that any such question as that
- C which is now before us has ever arisen in regard to an action in the county court. Different considerations apply where an issue, which is to be determined in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, is raised in a court of summary jurisdiction. Counsel for the husband referred to three authorities, the first being R. v. Middlesex JJ. Ex p. Bond (1). I do not propose to refer fully to that case for the reason that, when it came to this court, it was determined on the
- D point that the matter had been res judicata before the justices. The facts of that case were that in 1930 the husband petitioned for the dissolution of his marriage. The wife entered an appearance, but did not defend the suit. In August, 1931, after the decree had been made absolute, she applied to a court of summary jurisdiction for an order under s. 5 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, as amended by the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, for the custody and main-
- E tenance of a child of the marriage. It was pointed out to the bench that the marriage of the parties had been dissolved and that the wife, having appeared to the petition, was entitled under the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, r. 34, to be heard in the Divorce Division as to the custody of the children. The chairman said: "If that is the case we think the application should be made there." In April, 1932, the wife again applied to the justices and a differently constituted
- F court made an order giving her the custody of the child. On an application by the husband for a writ of certiorari, it was held by the King's Bench Divisional Court that the matter was res judicata by the decision in August, 1931, whether that were regarded as a refusal to make an order from which refusal there had been no appeal, or as a decision that the matter was one which would more conveniently be dealt with by the High Court. It was further held in the
- G Divisional Court that the jurisdiction of the Divorce Division, when it had become seised of a matrimonial cause, was an exclusive and overriding jurisdiction and ousted that of justices under the Guardianship of Infants Acts. When the matter came before this court the second point was left open, the decision of the Divisional Court being affirmed on the ground that the matter was res judicata.
- The two decisions on which counsel for the husband principally relied were
- H Higgs v. Higgs (2) and Knott v. Knott (3). In Knott v. Knott (3), which was heard by SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., and BUCKNILL, J., the President said that, though it might be sufficient to say that he thought they were bound by Higgs v. Higgs (2), he would go into the matter fully, for the reason (inter alia) that their decision in Higgs v. Higgs (2) was given without the court being made aware that the decision of the King's Bench Divisional Court in R. v. Middlesex JJ. Ex p. Bond (1), which they had followed, had been the subject of an appeal, and that the Court of Appeal had not dealt with the matter save on the issue of res judicata. The headnote to Knott v. Knott (3) is:

"During the pendency of a matrimonial suit in the High Court on an issue as to adultery, conflict of jurisdiction may arise from the simultaneous prosecution in a court of summary jurisdiction under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1925, of proceedings incidentally raising the same issue. The issue as to adultery is paramount, the High Court alone having power to dissolve the marriage if adultery be established, while the jurisdiction exercised by the inferior court provides other relief during the continuance of matrimonial status. Proceedings in the inferior court should accordingly be stayed pending the decision of the paramount issue in the High Court."

SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., and BUCKNILL, J., discussed the respective jurisdictions and the methods of harmonising them. After referring to the fact that an appeal from justices would lie to a Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., said ([1935] P. 166):

"In a case like the present, however, the court already has seisin of the cardinal issue of adultery, and ought, unless the statute compels the opposite conclusion, to be able to try that issue upon the evidence of the witnesses, unembarrassed by the fact that a Divisional Court have accepted or rejected, on evidence necessarily viewed at second hand, a decision of the justices given at a time when the very issue was pending in this court. It might very well be that, on seeing the demeanour of the witnesses, the judge trying the suit would come to a conclusion different from that arrived at by the justices and affirmed by this court upon the notes of the evidence reported by the clerk of the justices. Though such a result might be justifiable as a matter of logic, it would obviously be most unfortunate, and might very well be characterised in the robust words of AVORY, J., in R. v. Middlesex JJ. Ex p. Bond (1) on which we based our decision in Higgs v. Higgs (2). On further consideration therefore I am not prepared to depart from the decision of this court in Higgs v. Higgs (2). Though I recognise the distinction to which counsel has called attention, I think that, whatever may be the ultimate relief sought, the substance of the matter is that, when the issue of the adultery of the wife is pending in both courts, it should be decided exclusively by this court."

SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., concluded his judgment by saying (ibid., 169):

"It remains to consider what is the proper order to be made. In my opinion the finding of the justices should be set aside on the ground that they should not have proceeded to a determination of the matter after their attention had been called to the conflict of jurisdiction and to the authorities, and that the matter should be remitted to them for re-hearing, but that such hearing should be stayed until the determination of the issue of the wife's adultery by this court. This will keep the complaint alive. I need scarcely add that if in this, or in any other case in which this question arises, this court were satisfied that the suit was not being duly prosecuted, but was merely being used for the purpose of prolonging the payments under the order, the court would have ample power to deal with this matter in such a way that the justices would regain jurisdiction."

The principles and the practice laid down by SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in Knott v. Knott (3) and in his earlier decision in Higgs v. Higgs (2) are, of course, followed and are not in question, but it does not seem to me that a reference to those authorities and to the practice which is followed in cases in courts of summary jurisdiction gives conclusive guidance in regard to the point which is now before us and which concerns the hearing of a civil action for debt brought in the county court. I see no reason why the learned judge was obliged to accede to this application. He might have done so; it was within his discretion, and he considered the matter fully. But I cannot see that it can be said that he had no option but to postpone a determination of the matter raised in the action, namely, whether the husband did or did not owe a particular sum to his wife. In the notice of appeal it is stated that the judge was wrong in law in refusing the application for an adjournment. I cannot take that view at all. I see no error of law on the part of the judge. The same considerations apply, I think, in regard to the other proceedings, and with even greater force. As I indicated earlier, it does not seem to me that a consideration as to the conduct during marriage of one of the spouses ought to affect the decision of the court in the proceedings under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. The first ground of appeal in regard to these other proceedings is stated as being that the wife's rights depend on, or were liable to be affected by, her conduct during marriage. I am not persuaded that that is so, and it seems to me that the judge had before him the issues defined in the pleadings and he was concerned to consider, on evidence, in whom was the ownership of the property and of the various chattels. No complaint is made as regards the determination by the judge, as matters of fact, of those issues. For those reasons, in my judgment, the judge did not fall into any error of law and there is no reason to criticise the decisions at which he arrived.

- A ROXBURGH, J.: I agree with MORRIS, L.J., that the two appeals must be differentiated. As regards the second appeal, which relates to the ownership of property, I cannot see how the issue of adultery is relevant to the determination of those matters, and I cannot see any reason why there should have been an adjournment. As regards the first appeal, on the other hand, the position is quite different. In that case there is a common question of fact to be determined, namely, the question of adultery, which is plainly relevant both to the subject-matter of the first appeal and also to the matrimonial cause. I cannot accept Knott v. Knott (3) as the foundation for a broad proposition that, whenever a county court is faced with an issue of adultery, then, if there is a matrimonial cause pending, the court is absolutely debarred from adjudicating on that issue.
- D It seems to me that there is nothing in Knott v. Knott (3) to suggest a broad proposition of that kind. On the other hand, it would generally be convenient that the decision of such an issue in the county court should be postponed until after its decision in the High Court, but usually not unconditionally. In almost every case it would be proper to require some term as a condition of granting the adjournment. In this case it is quite plain that the county court judge was prepared to adjourn both cases, though I am only concerning myself with the first. He was prepared to adjourn the case on certain terms. Counsel for the husband submitted that, when the husband refused to accept the terms which were suggested and of which the county court judge approved (if he was not even doing more than that, namely, insisting on them), the county court judge ought to have made an order that the case be adjourned on certain terms. For my own part, I cannot see how he could possibly have done that. The question of adjournment had to be decided then and there. He was either to go on with the case or he was not. As far as I know, he had no power to make an order in invitum on the husband to pay 30s. a week during the pendency of the divorce proceedings. All that he could do was what he seems to have done, namely, say: "You, the husband, want an adjournment. I will give you an adjournment if you will accept certain terms". When the husband refused to accept those terms, I cannot see what the county court judge could have done except go on with the case, which is what he did.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. PEARLBERG.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning and Morris, L.JJ.), January 19, 1953.]

Income Tax—Recovery of unpaid tax—Assessments under sched. A—No appeal against assessment—Denial of liability by taxpayer—No defence to summons by Crown—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), s. 169—Finance Act, 1941 (c. 30), sched. I, para. 5.

The taxpayer was charged with income tax under sched. A in respect of certain properties on the ground that under s. 12 (1) of, and sched. I, Part I, para. 1 to, the Finance Act, 1941, he was the landlord at the material time, and he was served with a notice under para. 1 against which he did not appeal. He was also personally assessed and charged in respect of other properties, but he did not appeal against the assessment within the time prescribed by the Finance Act, 1942, sched. X, para. 6 (3). On a summons by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for leave to sign final judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, for the two sums thus charged, the taxpayer sought leave to defend on the ground that he had been wrongly assessed.

HELD: with regard to the first group of properties, the taxpayer having brought no appeal against the notice, under para. 5 of Part I of sched. I to the Act of 1941 it was to be conclusively presumed that the amount of tax specified in the notice was due from him; with regard to the second group, the taxpayer not having appealed against the assessment, under s. 169 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, the tax was recoverable by the Crown; and, therefore, he was not entitled to leave to defend and the commissioners were entitled to judgment.

FOR THE INCOME TAX ACT, 1918, s. 169, and THE FINANCE ACT, 1941, sched. I, see HALSBURYS STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 12, pp. 92 and 543.

APPEAL by the taxpayer from a decision of HAVERS, J., in chambers, dated Dec. 15, 1952.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed £438 7s. for income tax due partly under assessments made under r. 8 of No. VII of sched. A to the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of certain properties and recoverable from the taxpayer, not being the person named in the assessments, as the landlord of the respective properties on Jan. 1, 1952, under s. 12 (1) of the Finance Act, 1941, and sched. I thereto, and partly under assessments to income tax on the taxpayer as landlord. Regarding the first group of properties, a notice had been served on the taxpayer in accordance with para. 1, Part I, of sched. I to the Act of 1941, but the taxpayer had not given notice of appeal against that notice, nor had he appealed against the second assessment. The commissioners issued a summons under R.S.C., Ord. 14, for leave to sign final judgment, and the taxpayer asked for leave to defend on the ground that he had been wrongly assessed. On Dec. 8, 1952, the master gave leave to sign final judgment, and on Dec. 15, 1952, HAVERS, J., dismissed the taxpayer's appeal.

Cyril King, Q.C., and D. C. Miller for the taxpayer.
Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

DENNING, L.J.: The master and the judge in chambers have both given judgment in favour of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue against the taxpayer on a claim for income tax by the commissioners under sched. A amounting to £438 7s. The taxpayer now appeals to this court asking that he should have liberty to defend the claim. The tax is claimed in respect of properties which fall into two groups. In the first group the taxpayer is charged with tax, not on the ground that he was the person assessed, but on a ground introduced by s. 12 (1) of the Finance Act, 1941, whereby an assessment is “ . . . valid as against all persons although not made on the person who should have been assessed . . . ”

Proceedings have been instituted against him "as having been the landlord" at the material times, and a notice has been served on him in accordance with Part I, para. 1, of sched. I to that Act, specifying the land and the amount of tax claimed against him. He has not given a notice of appeal from that notice. Under para. 5 of the schedule it is provided:

A "Where no appeal is brought . . . it shall be conclusively presumed that the person on whom the notice was served was the landlord of the land [at the material time] and that the amount of tax specified in the notice is due from him so far as it still remains unpaid . . ."

In the second group of properties the taxpayer has himself been assessed and charged. He has not given a notice of appeal within the twelve months permitted by para. 6 (3) of sched. X to the Finance Act, 1942.

B The taxpayer has made two affidavits. With regard to the first group of properties he swears that he never owned the properties, that he has never been in receipt of the rents or profits from them, that he is and has at all material times been an undischarged bankrupt, that he is not the landlord, and, therefore, that he ought not to be charged. With regard to the second group of properties he swears that he was at no time the owner, occupier or landlord of them. The issue which he raises in those affidavits is that he is not rightly chargeable with tax, for one or other of the reasons he has mentioned. The whole question in the case is whether that is an issue which the taxpayer is allowed to have tried in these proceedings in the High Court? The correct answer has been, I think, given by counsel for the Crown, namely, that the right way for him to have raised any of these matters was by appeal to the commissioners in the way provided by the Income Tax Acts, and, as he did not raise the matters by way of appeal, he is not allowed to raise them now. If we were to allow the taxpayer to raise these matters, it would mean that the High Court would become the tribunal to decide questions of fact and law on tax assessments, whereas they have been decided to the general satisfaction for a great many years now by the Commissioners of Income Tax, with an appeal on points of law by Case Stated to the High Court.

E The provisions which exclude the taxpayer from raising the question of liability are these. So far as the first group of properties is concerned, there is a conclusive presumption against him under sched. I, Part I, para. 5, to the Act of 1941. So far as the second group of properties is concerned, once there is an assessment duly made and not appealed from, then, under s. 169 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, the tax charged may be sued for and recovered from the person charged therewith in the High Court as a debt due to the Crown. In my opinion, therefore, all issues on the merits of these cases, as to fact or law, should have been determined on appeal to the commissioners and cannot be raised at this stage. If there has been no appeal to the commissioners the debts become absolute and conclusive, and their legal effect cannot be denied. The position was the same in the old days of the Latin information. I remember that in those matters G ROWLATT, J., refused to go into the merits. He always told the debtor that he ought to have appealed to the commissioners. So now, although since the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, the procedure—by writ in the High Court—is different, nevertheless, the assessment having been made, or the notice served, and no appeal made, the debt is absolute, and we have no alternative but to award judgment. In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

H MORRIS, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

R. v. WIMBLEDON JUSTICES. Ex parte DERWENT.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Pearson, JJ.), January 23, 1953.]

Housing—Purchase price—Limitation—House constructed under building licence—Condition limiting rent included in licence—Letting at excessive rent—Informations laid more than six months after date of letting—Competency of proceedings—Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945 (c. 20), s. 7 (1). A

A prosecution under the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, s. 7 (1), for letting a house constructed under the authority of a building licence at a rent in excess of the maximum rent permitted by the terms of the licence must be brought within six months from the date of the letting.

The fact that justices can be required to state a Case for the opinion of the High Court on a question of jurisdiction does not preclude an order of prohibition being issued prohibiting them from entertaining a proceeding in excess of their jurisdiction.

APPLICATION for writ of prohibition to issue to Wimbledon, Surrey justices, to prohibit them from proceeding with the hearing of seven informations.

On June 12, 1952, the seven informations were laid against the applicant by the Wimbledon Corporation under the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, s. 7 (1), charging that he had let seven sets of premises, in respect of which building licences had been issued, at rents in excess of the maximum rents permitted by the building licences subject to which they were issued. The building licences were issued to the applicant by the borough council on dates between Nov. 2, 1948, and Mar. 7, 1950, subject to the provision that the premises were not to be let at rents in excess of certain figures varying between £125 and £208 per annum according to the size and nature of the premises. On dates between Nov. 1, 1949, and Aug. 12, 1951, the applicant let the seven sets of premises in question at rents which exceeded the permitted rents by £23 to £25. E

It was contended on behalf of the applicant that under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 11, the justices had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the case, as the informations were laid in all cases more than six months after the lettings had taken place and that a letting was not a continuing offence. LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the applicant in these cases moves for orders of prohibition to justices for the county of Surrey sitting at Wimbledon, prohibiting them from continuing to hear seven summonses alleging offences by him against the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, s. 7 (1). H

Despite a very strenuous and clear argument by counsel for the justices I am of opinion that this case seems to me to involve a simple question of construction. Under the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, s. 7 (1), it is provided that where a person obtains a licence from a local authority enabling him to build a house the authority can impose a condition limiting the price at which the house may be sold or the rent at which it may be let. We have not gone into the merits of these cases, and we decide them on the ground of jurisdiction. The offence of selling or letting a house above the figure limited in the licence is made a summary offence by the sub-section. It is elementary that summary jurisdiction is entirely a creation of statute, and the proceedings of justices are governed by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. Section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, provides:

A “ . . . In all cases where no time is already or shall hereafter be specially limited for making any such complaint or laying any such information in the Act or Acts of Parliament relating to each particular case, such complaint shall be made and such information shall be laid within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint or information respectively arose.”

B It would seem to be clear from that section that, if a case is brought before justices and on the face of the proceedings it can be seen that the offence alleged to have been committed took place more than six months before the information was laid, justices have no power to enter on the matter at all, because they have no jurisdiction to sit as a court of summary jurisdiction in the case of an offence alleged to have been committed more than six months before.

C Therefore, what we have to consider is whether or not the offence which is laid here took place more than six months before the information was laid. On the information that was laid in the first case it was said that on Apr. 27, 1950, the defendant did unlawfully let a house known as 5, Church Hill, Wimbledon, for a term of seven years from Mar. 25, 1950, at a rent of £245 per annum exclusive of rates notwithstanding that it was a condition of the granting of the building licence dated June 30, 1949, under which the said house was erected, that the said house should not be let at a rental in excess of £220 per annum exclusive of rates, contrary to s. 7 (1) of the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945. The point was taken before the justices that they could not enter on the hearing of the case because on the face of the information the offence had been committed more than six months previously. Thereupon it occurred to the prosecution, in order to enable jurisdiction to be given to the justices, as they thought, to ask the justices to amend the information by inserting, immediately after the words “ at a rental in excess of £220 per annum exclusive of rates ”, these words: “ and that the said house continued to be and is still let at the said rent which is in excess of the rent so limited.”

D The question we have to decide is whether that discloses any offence under the Act. I need hardly say that there are many Acts of Parliament with which this court is very familiar in which a certain act is constituted an offence, and it is provided that for every day that act continues or remains unabated there shall be a continuing offence, and a penalty is fixed for every day, or week, or month, that the state of affairs exists. There are no such words as that, and it is not contended that there are, in this statute. The Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, s. 7 (1) is in these words:

E “ Where a house has been constructed under the authority of a licence granted for the purposes of a defence regulation (hereinafter referred to as ‘ a building licence ’) and the licence, whether granted before or after the passing of this Act, has been granted subject to any condition limiting the price for which the house may be sold or the rent at which it may be let, any person who, during the period of four years [which has now been extended to eight years by the Housing Act, 1949, s. 43 (1)] beginning with the passing of this Act, sells or offers to sell the house for a greater price than the price so limited (hereinafter referred to as ‘ the permitted price ’), or, as the case may be, lets or offers to let the house at a rent in excess of the rent so limited (hereinafter referred to as 'the permitted rent'), shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding the aggregate of—(a) such amount as will in the opinion of the court secure that he derives no benefit from the offence; and (b) the further amount of £100; or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or to both such fine and such imprisonment”, so it is a serious offence.

We are asked to say that the words “lets or offers to let” are to be construed as meaning that an offence is committed during the whole time of the lease. In my opinion, such a construction is impossible. A person lets a house once and for all when he demises the house by means of the lease, and it is conceded in this case—because counsel for the respondents could not argue otherwise—that in a case of sale the offence takes place once and for all when the house is sold, i.e., when the conveyance is executed, or even when the house is offered for sale. How can we possibly give a different construction to the words “sells or offers to sell” from the words “lets or offers to let”? It would be impossible. The words appear in the same section, and, if we gave a construction such as we are asked to give here in the case of “let or lets”, we should have to give the same construction to the word “sell”. Therefore, if a man sold a house in contravention of the section, years afterwards he might be prosecuted. We are asked to say that Parliament must have assumed that a local authority might not be able to find out that an offence had been committed at once, and, therefore, we ought to give some benevolent construction to the section and convert into an offence that which the statute does not say is an offence. I think it is much more probable, as these rents and prices have to be registered and are to be regarded as land charges and open for inspection (see s. 8 (1)), that Parliament assumed that intending lessees and intending purchasers would search the register of charges and find out if they were being overcharged. Then, if they were being overcharged, they would take proceedings to protect themselves. It seems to me that it would have been possible, though it would be putting a burden on local authorities, to have made it a condition of giving a licence that the local authority should have stipulated that before a house was let or a sale completed, the lessor or vendor should send them the documents so that they could see that the terms of the licence were being fulfilled. But, whether or not it is desirable that the law should be amended is not for this court. We can find nothing in this section which enables us to construe the words “lets or offers to let” as providing for a continuing offence for the purposes of this section, any more than, as is admitted, we can construe “offers to sell” as a continuing offence.

That is the short and conclusive answer to the question of construction which has been raised, and I do not think any of the cases that have been cited give any assistance. Stray v. Docker (1) was much relied on by counsel for the respondents, but that was a case under a different Act (the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920) and under quite different words. It was pointed out in the course of the argument that it would appear that ASQUITH, J., would have accepted the particular words as one finds them there and have decided the case differently from what he did.

Therefore, the court has no doubt on the true construction of this sub-section that the offence was committed once and for all when the house was demised, that is to say, when the lease was executed, which was on Apr. 27, 1950. But counsel for the respondents argues that we ought not to deal with these cases by way of prohibition. Earlier in my judgment I pointed out that the words of s. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, limit the jurisdiction of justices. They take away jurisdiction to deal with any case where the offence has been committed more than six months before the information was laid. If that is so, and justices have no jurisdiction, this court is entitled, and ought, to issue prohibition to

- prevent them from going on with a case. They most properly adjourned these cases in order that this point might be argued, so that, if prohibition were refused, they could continue the hearing of the cases, but now they will be prohibited from going on. It is certainly the most convenient course to take to prevent a lot of expense being incurred in hearing these seven summonses, and I think the applicant is entitled to this relief of prohibition because, if a court has no jurisdiction, no consent can give it jurisdiction. I do not deny that justices may, if
- A this court is not asked to prohibit them from doing it, proceed to hear a case, and the point can be taken before them: "You have no jurisdiction to convict in this case, and if you do convict, we shall ask for a Special Case." The statutory provisions which provide for the stating of Cases by justices enable Cases to be stated on questions of jurisdiction, but the fact that that can be done is no reason why, if the court is satisfied that there is a lack of jurisdiction in the justices, they should not issue prohibition, which is the very object with which that writ has been framed. It is the direction of a superior court to an inferior court to prevent the inferior court acting without jurisdiction, and it would be acting without jurisdiction if the justices convicted in these cases, where the offences have been committed more than six months before. It is an entirely different case from those which from time to time come before this court, for instance, proceedings of
- B a Rent Control Tribunal who, before they can say whether they have jurisdiction or not, have to inquire into certain facts. The well-known case on the subject entitling the court to say that a court may be entitled to inquire into facts to discover whether they have jurisdiction or not is the judgment of LORD ESHER in R. v. Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. (2), where he pointed out that it is legitimate when the jurisdiction of justices or inferior bodies depends on the
- C existence of certain facts for them to inquire into those facts to find out whether they have jurisdiction or not, and the court will then review the finding of fact because, if this court came to the conclusion that the facts were wrongly found, they would say that the justices acted without jurisdiction. But that is not this case because the defect appears on the face of the proceedings. The information clearly shows an offence which was committed once and for all on Apr. 27, 1950.
- D It follows, therefore, that the court has no jurisdiction to inquire into that offence when the information was not laid till June 12, 1952. The result is that the order will go in all these cases.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: The proceedings in this case started with an information on June 12, 1952, alleging, inter alia, that the applicant had unlawfully let a house, 3, Church Hill, Wimbledon, on June 7, 1951, for a term of

F seven years for a consideration which consisted of a total money rent in excess of that which was provided as being the maximum in a licence under s. 7 (1) of the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945. On the face of that information it was apparent, therefore, that the proceedings were being taken in respect of a matter which had arisen and an offence which had been committed more than

G six months before the information. On the point being taken before the justices, they adopted a method of getting rid of this, I should have thought, palpable, objection by amending the information so as to allege that the house continued to be and was still let—that is, at the date of the information—"for the said consideration which is in excess of the rent so limited." The justices decided that that amendment should be made and were, apparently, proceeding on that basis. (Perhaps it is worth just a passing observation that when justices are being

H invited to make an amendment which affects, or may affect, the liberty of the subject and there are penal consequences of the gravity of those which are indicated in s. 7 (1), they should proceed with very great hesitation and with very great caution). The result was an application to this court by the applicant by which he asked us to interfere by issuing an order of prohibition to prevent the justices going on with the amended information.

It has now been suggested by the respondents through their counsel that the proper construction of s. 7 (1) is that where a house has been let at an excessive rent, at any time when money in respect of that rent is payable an offence is still being committed. That means that a continuation of the original offence of the letting is being committed by the landlord. The answer to that, it seems to me, depends on the proper construction of s. 7 (1), which contains provisions which deal not only with the limitation of the rent of houses constructed under certain building licences, the terms of which are permitted by the statute, but also with sales, and, therefore, with limitations on the purchase prices of houses. With regard to both these subject-matters the legislature has provided that it is an offence either to sell or offer to sell or to let or offer to let at an excessive figure. It is said that when one comes to the words, "lets or offers to let", so long as the term continues, the house is still being let. I should have had great difficulty in appreciating, as a matter of construction, how those words in a penal provision in a statute of this sort could achieve that result, but my difficulties are considerably increased by the admission that, in the case of a sale, no such construction of the words "sell or offers to sell" is possible. I have read and re-read this part of s. 7 (1). I have looked at other sections which deal with other remedies, and I am unable to see, by any canon of construction with which I am acquainted, that it is possible to construe the words "lets or offers to let" as resulting in a continuing offence. As a general rule, the court is not eager to find continuing offences provided by a statute—certainly not without express words which make clear that that was the intention of the legislature when the statute was passed. I cannot see anything here which indicates anything of the sort. It would have been easy to put in some such provision as has been suggested by my Lord, to the effect that, if a contravention of the statute is not put right, there shall be deemed to be a continuing offence, and providing, for example, for a daily, weekly, or monthly penalty. There is nothing of that sort here. Such provisions in statutes are well known, and I think that this courageous effort to support the action of the justices fails. The defect in the informations as they originally were is not cured by the amendments which the justices allowed. In other words, the justices should be prohibited from continuing with the hearing of these matters in the form in which they have permitted them to be amended.

It is said as a sort of tabula in naufragio that the remedy of prohibition is not open to this court to impose, but I do not wish to add anything about that. I concur with my Lord's judgment.

PEARSON, J.: I agree. I think it is plain, when one considers carefully all the provisions of s. 7 (1) together with the provisions of the interpretation section, s. 9 (3) (b), that a person lets a house if he demises a house or agrees to demise it, and the offence under s. 7 (1) of letting a house at a rent in excess of the permitted rent is completed with the execution of the lease or the conclusion of the agreement to let the house. That appears strongly from the provisions of s. 7 (1), and support for it can be derived from the provisions of s. 7 (2), that in certain circumstances a house shall be deemed to have been let at a rent in excess of the permitted rent, which, of course, implies that it is something which has already taken place at a moment of time. There is similar wording in s. 7 (4), referring to the rent at which the house was let, showing that it is a past event which has occurred, and, again, in s. 7 (5), the wording is:

"In determining for the purposes of this section the consideration for which a house has been sold or let . . ."

There it is contemplated as a past event, already complete. Then there is an interesting instance in s. 7 (7) (b):

"... where any person is convicted of the offence of letting a house at a rent in excess of the permitted rent, the court may, if the interest created by the letting has not expired at the time of the conviction . . ."

I think the language of that paragraph, as well as the language of the Act in general, is carefully chosen and is accurate language. It means that the letting is a demise which creates an interest forthwith. It is the interest which continues and the act of demise has already taken place. I would say, finally, that I think that Stray v. Docker (1), operates to confirm the view which this court has taken of the meaning of the Act in this case because both HUMPHREYS, J., and ASQUITH, J., distinguish clearly between the two conditions which, under the

A Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 10, had to be fulfilled before the Act operated. HUMPHREYS, J., said ([1944] K.B. 355):

“The section prescribes that there must be a letting after a certain date, and it must also be proved that the rent charged, which includes payment in respect of the use of furniture, yields to the landlord a profit which, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, is extortionate.”

B He went on to say (ibid.):

“In my view, the real offence created by the section is not the letting of the dwelling-house to which the Act applies, although that must necessarily be an incident in the commission of the offence, but the charging to the C tenant of a rent which in all the circumstances yields to the landlord an extortionate profit.”

There is similar reasoning in the judgment of ASQUITH, J., in the same case. Having regard to those factors, I think it is clear that there is only one possible answer to the question of construction, and that is the answer which has been

D given, and so I concur in the order proposed.

Order of prohibition to issue.

HARRIS v. BRIGHT'S ASPHALT CONTRACTORS, LTD., ALLARD & SAUNDERS, LTD. (Third Parties).

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Slade, J.), January 13, 14, 15, 16, 19, 20, 1953.]

F Negligence—Damages—Personal injury—Measure of damages—Diminished expectation of life—Loss of future wages through death supervening—Work “above” fragile roof—Provision of scaffolds—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), reg. 5, reg. 31 (3) (a), (b).

G The plaintiff, an asphalter employed by the defendants, while repairing factory premises was removing an asphalt drip edge from the side of a flat roof. There was an asbestos roof adjoining and some two feet below, and to do the work the plaintiff knelt nine inches from the edge of the flat roof, leaning forward. Owing to some unascertained reason, while he was so working he fell on and through the asbestos roof, dropping some thirteen feet to the factory floor below, and sustaining serious injuries. At the time of the H hearing of an action for damages for negligence brought by him against the defendants for failing to provide a safe system of work and/or breach of a statutory duty, his expectation of life was eighteen months.

HELD: (i) on the facts, though the work was being carried out in a normal manner, the plaintiff was being subjected to an unnecessary risk which could reasonably have been foreseen by the defendants and reasonably could have been guarded against.

(ii) the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty under the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 5, to provide "scaffolds" for all work that could not safely be done "on or from the ground, or from part of the building, or from part of a permanent structure . . ."

(iii) there was no breach of reg. 31 (3) (a), which requires the provision of "ladders, duck ladders or crawling boards" where "workmen have to pass over or work above fragile roofs", since "above" in the regulations meant directly and vertically above.

(iv) in assessing damages for loss of expectation of life it was not proper to award an amount on the basis of the plaintiff's wages for the period between the date of his probable death and the age to which he was likely to have lived if he had not had the accident.

ACTION by the plaintiff, Thomas Harris, an asphalter, claiming damages for personal injuries from the defendants, Bright's Asphalt Contractors, Ltd., by whom he was employed in November, 1950, when the defendants were engaged in carrying out repairs to factory premises at 126-128 New King's Road, Fulham, occupied by the third parties, Allard & Saunders, Ltd.

The work to be done included work on a flat roof, at one side of which there was an asphalt drip edge which extended down eight and a half inches vertically and two feet below this was a gutter nine inches wide. From this gutter rose a second roof to a roof ridge, at an angle of thirty degrees. This roof had originally been glazed, and the glazing bars were two feet apart, but the glass had been replaced by sheets of asbestos laid between the glazing bars. On Nov. 24, 1950, the plaintiff, who had been instructed by his employers to strip the whole of the flat roof, and had been left temporarily in charge of the work, was engaged in chipping away the asphalt from the drip edge. He was doing this in a proper way, kneeling nine inches away from the edge of the roof, when, for an unexplained reason, he overbalanced and fell on to the asbestos roof some two feet below. This roof, being fragile, broke and he fell through to the floor of the factory about thirteen feet below and was injured. At the time of the hearing it was found as a fact that the plaintiff's expectation of life was eighteen months. The judge also found that the plaintiff knew that the asbestos roof was fragile, that in the circumstances there was a risk to the plaintiff, that it was an unnecessary risk which should have been foreseen, and could easily have been guarded against by the defendants, and that the plaintiff had not been guilty of contributory negligence.

A SLADE, J., stated the facts and continued: The first question I have to ask myself is: What is the duty which an employer owes to his servant? I am not dealing at the moment with his duty as an occupier of premises, but independently of such occupation. Counsel for the defendants cited Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. v. English (1), where the well-known definition of those duties by B LORD HERSCHELL in Smith v. Baker & Sons (2) was repeated with approval. In Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. v. English (1) LORD WRIGHT cites ([1937] 3 All E.R. 641) this passage from LORD HERSCHELL's opinion in Smith v. Baker & Sons (2):

C “It is quite clear that the contract between employer and employed involves on the part of the former the duty of taking reasonable care to provide proper appliances, and to maintain them in a proper condition and so to carry on his operations as not to subject those employed by him to unnecessary risk.”

D In case there is any doubt about the meaning of the word “unnecessary”, I would take the duty as being a duty not to subject the employee to any risk which the employer can reasonably foresee, or, to put it slightly lower, not to subject the employee to any risk that the employer can reasonably foresee and against which he can guard by any measures, the convenience and expense of which are not entirely disproportionate to the risk involved. I am prepared to approach this case on whichever of those definitions imposes the lowest duty on the defendants.

E I have to decide, therefore, whether the accident which happened to the plaintiff was one which the employers could reasonably have foreseen, and I find as a fact that it was. If I apply the unnecessary risk test, I find that it was a risk which could reasonably have been foreseen and which should have been foreseen, and that it was unnecessary in the sense that it could have been prevented or guarded against by the simplest measures. If the test is whether the duty is not to expose an F employee to a risk which can be reasonably foreseen, I find as a fact that this was such a risk. If the test is that an employee should not be exposed to those types of risk which can be reasonably foreseen, and which also could have been guarded against without undue inconvenience or expense, again I find that this was such a risk. I find it could have been guarded against, as I say, in the simplest manner by the provision of three or four nine inches wide boards at an G angle to the ridge on which the plaintiff could have stood to do the chipping of the drip edge. It seems to me almost impossible to contend that there is not a risk in kneeling in a position only nine inches from an edge with a fall of thirteen to fifteen feet to a surface sufficient to cause the terrible injuries which the plaintiff suffered. In the result, therefore, it becomes, strictly speaking, unnecessary for me to decide the question of breach of statutory duty, but I said I would H do so in case this matter goes further.

It is conceded that the Building Regulations apply to the work in this case, and the breaches alleged are, first, one of reg. 5. It is admitted that reg. 5 applies to the defendants. Before reading reg. 5 I should say that I have read the definition of “scaffold” in reg. 3. I note that it is expressed, among other things, to include “any working platform”, and that it means “any temporary structure on or from which persons perform work”. I interpret that to mean that, if the three or four boards which I have mentioned were used to catch a man who overbalanced from a leaning position, that would not constitute a scaffold, but, if they were used as a platform on or from which to do the work, they would constitute a scaffold within the meaning of the definition, and I so hold. Regulation 5 provides:

“Suitable and sufficient scaffolds shall be provided for all work that cannot safely be done on or from the ground or from part of the building, or from part of a permanent structure . . .”

For the same reason that I have found that the defendants were in breach of their common law duty, I find that, so far as planks could have been used as a platform on or from which to do the work, there was a breach of the statutory duty imposed by reg. 5 in the sense that the work could have been done—I will not say “should have been done” because the evidence shows it was perfectly proper to do it from the kneeling position—but in the sense that the work could have been done with complete safety by the use of three or four boards and by the plaintiff doing the drip edge from the security of those four boards—in other words, the kneeling method is a normal method of doing work on a roof when, if the workman overbalances, which is a foreseeable risk, he can come to no appreciable harm by virtue of the distance which he can fall, but it is not a normal or proper way of doing it when, if he overbalances, he will fall a substantial distance to the ground and risk very serious injuries.

With regard to the other two breaches alleged, they are both breaches of reg. 31 (3). In both cases I have looked at the obligations under the regulations which are set out in reg. 4 and noted that it shall be the duty of every contractor and employer of workmen to which the regulations apply to comply with reg. 5, and with such requirements of reg. 31

“as relate to any work, act or operation performed or about to be performed by such contractor or employer of workmen.”

Regulation 31 (3) reads in this way:

“Where work is being done on or near roofs . . . covered with fragile materials through which a person is liable to fall a distance of more than ten feet—(a) where workmen have to pass over or work above such fragile materials, suitable and sufficient ladders, duck ladders or crawling boards, which shall be securely supported, shall be provided and used.”

The words “pass over” are, in my view, inapplicable to the present case. If, therefore, this regulation is to apply it must be that the plaintiff had to work above a fragile roof. What does the word “above” mean? Does it mean above in the vertical plane of the fragile roof, or does it mean above merely in the sense of at a greater height? I think it means the former, and I think that the argument of counsel for the defendants to that effect is reinforced by the fact that the three protections required, namely, ladders, duck ladders or crawling boards, are appropriate only to someone passing over the fragile roof or working above it. In my view, obviously they are designed to protect a man from falling through the fragile roof, and he will not be protected from doing so if he is not working vertically above the roof, but is liable to slip forward into the vertical plane of the fragile roof. At any rate, I hold that “working above” means working over in the sense of higher than the fragile roof in the vertical plane from the fragile roof, and, therefore, that reg. 31 (3) (a) is inapplicable, and the defendants committed no breach of it.

I now look at reg. 31 (3) (b) which provides:

“Prominent notices stating that the coverings are fragile shall be affixed at the approaches thereto.”

It is not necessary for me to decide precisely what the words “approaches thereto” mean. I should have thought that they applied to work being done on or near roofs. "Approach" can only mean something of such a character that, if a notice were affixed to it, it would give a warning to a person who was about to work on or near the roof. I am satisfied here that there was a breach of this regulation in that no notice, prominent or otherwise, stating that the coverings were fragile had been affixed anywhere, but I hold that the claim fails so far as there was a breach of that regulation, because I hold that the breach of the regulation had no bearing whatever on the accident. The plaintiff knew at the material time that the roof was fragile, and, therefore, it would be a work of supererogation to acquaint him by means of notices of that of which he already knew. It would not be so, of course, if he merely ought to have known and did not know; but if he actually knew it was fragile, a warning would be purely otiose. I, therefore, find as a fact that breach of this regulation was not a cause in any shape or form of the accident.

- B [HIS LORDSHIP considered the evidence, found as a fact that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, and continued:] That brings me to the question of damages, which I regard as the most difficult point of all that I have to decide in this case. The plaintiff has an expectation of life which the doctors put at a minimum of six months and a maximum of two years. At the time of the accident the plaintiff was thirty-five, and his health was excellent. He is now thirty-seven. Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that in dealing with the general damages I must deal with the loss of earnings for the period between the plaintiff's death—at the latest, I am told, at the age of thirty-nine, and the age to which he would have lived if he had not had the accident. I have before me no actuarial figures, but I shall take judicial notice that a man in first class physical health would normally live to an age of at least sixty. That means that counsel D for the plaintiff was inviting me to award as part of the general damages some sum to represent the loss of earnings when the plaintiff was no longer alive for twenty-one years, from thirty-nine to sixty. When I expressed some little surprise counsel for the plaintiff countered by referring me to the headnote in Roach v. Yates (4), a decision of the Court of Appeal, and binding on me, which, if I thought that the headnote of the report in the LAW REPORTS was supported E by the judgments, I should, of course, unhesitatingly follow. The headnote in the report in the LAW REPORTS reads in this way:

F "In a collision between a pedal bicycle ridden by the plaintiff, a bricklayer thirty-three years of age, and a car driven by the defendant, occasioned by the negligence of the latter, the plaintiff sustained serious injury to the brain rendering him permanently, not only unfit for work, but incapable of looking after himself and dependent both day and night upon the care of a nurse, and shortening his expectation of life from thirty to sixteen years."

Therefore, his loss of expectation of life was fourteen years. At the time of the accident he was earning an average wage of £3 10s. a week, which is £182 a year. That meant that in the course of the following sixteen years he would have been G able to earn sixteen times £182 if his wages had remained the same, and, if the argument of counsel for the plaintiff was right, he would be entitled to damages for the remaining fourteen years that he did not live also at £3 10s. a week. The headnote continues:

- H "The plaintiff having brought an action against the defendant for damages for personal injury, it was agreed between the parties that the plaintiff's pecuniary losses and expenses by reason of the accident down to the date of the action amounted to £542 and in respect thereof and of all his other damage past and prospective the trial judge awarded him the sum of £2,742 in all."

Subtracting the £542 special damages, that means that the general damages awarded by the trial judge were £2,200.

"The plaintiff, being dissatisfied with that sum, appealed: Held, by the Court of Appeal, that in assessing the amount due to the plaintiff a proper, though not necessarily the only, method to adopt was to allow him (i) the special damages of £542; (ii) in respect of his prospective loss of wages the sum which he would have earned during what, but for the accident, would have been his normal life according to actuarial tables, subject to deductions for all contingencies, that sum to be not less than £2,000."

I emphasise those words, "the sum which he would have earned during what, but for the accident, would have been his normal life." His normal life was another thirty years. In fact, of those thirty years he was going to be alive for sixteen and dead for fourteen if the prognostications of the medical men proved correct. Therefore, the Court of Appeal are saying, according to this headnote, that you have to base the damages on sixteen years loss of wages during life (which, of course, would be an indisputable head of damages) and also on the further fourteen years that the plaintiff would not be alive. Further, it was held:

"(iii) in respect of nursing attendance, a sum sufficient to cover a reasonable weekly payment for that purpose during the period of his life as shortened by the accident, that sum being estimated at upwards of £2,000; and (iv) in respect of his past and future physical and mental pain and suffering, and the shortening of his life, a sum, in estimating which the following considerations should be kept in view . . ."

namely, that no amount of money, however large, could fully compensate the plaintiff for his injuries.

I propose to take those four heads of damages. No. (i), as I have said, is the special damages, and no question arises on that. With regard to No. (ii) I have been with counsel most carefully through the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Roach v. Yates (4), and that portion of the headnote which is stated to have been held by the Court of Appeal seems to me to be wholly unsupported by the judgments. In the judgment of GREER, L.J., I can see no reference at all to assessing the value of imaginary earnings after the death of the injured party. There was no separate judgment on the part of MACKINNON, L.J., who merely said that he agreed. There are observations in the judgment of SLESSER, L.J., which do lend support to the proposition stated in para. (ii) of the headnote, but I am satisfied that they were merely dicta. What I think happened was this. GREER, L.J., at the end of his judgment said ([1937] 3 All E.R. 446):

"My brothers and I . . . have to decide what shall be awarded in this case as damages to this unfortunate man, and we have come to the figure of £6,542. [i.e., £6,000 apart from special damages]; that is the figure that, independently, each member of this court thinks is a proper figure to award in this case."

I read GREER, L.J., as having arrived at that sum without any reference to imaginary earnings after death, and that SLESSER, L.J., was saying no more than that he agreed that that was the proper sum, particularly when one bore in mind the loss of earnings after death, and took into consideration that that element derived some assistance from the decision in Phillips v. London & South Western Ry. Co. (5). Moreover, so far as it is possible to glean from the arithmetic in Roach v. Yates (4), I cannot think that the figure of £6,000 could have been arrived at by taking into consideration the imaginary earnings of the plaintiff for the fourteen years that he ought to have been alive, but would be prevented from being alive by the accident. The wages being, as I have said, £182 a year, it is indisputable that he would be entitled to general damages for the loss of earnings from the date of judgment for the ensuing sixteen years, i.e., £2,912. One would have to take into consideration, of course, all the hazards of life apart from the accident, and that figure might properly be discounted to £2,000. Item (iii) accounted for "upwards of £2,000", and then there was pain and suffering and loss of expectation of life in item (iv), the damages in respect of which I take to have been £2,000. It looks to me as though the item in para. (ii) of the headnote was £2,000. If one takes the sixteen years of life only, one gets the figure of sixteen times £182, which is £2,912, and that might properly be discounted to a figure of £2,000, but if one has to take into consideration another fourteen years, one has thirty times £182, subject to being discounted, and £2,000 would seem to be more apt on the footing that the remaining fourteen years were excluded. At any rate, it is sufficient for me to say that I am unable to find from the judgments in Roach v. Yates (4) that the Court of Appeal decided any such thing as is ascribed to them in para. (ii) of the headnote, and so I think that the matter is res integra.

I have, however, looked at the case to which SLESSER, L.J., referred: Phillips v. London & South Western Ry. Co. (5). This was a claim by a doctor who was injured in a railway accident. It was tried with a special jury before FIELD, J., who, in summing-up to the jury, referred to the prospect of the plaintiff's speedy death. Whether "speedy" meant speedy in the literal sense or much earlier than the normal expectation of life because of the accident I am not clear. The plaintiff was proved to have been earning between £6,000 and £7,000 a year. The jury assessed the damages at £7,000. The plaintiff appealed to the Queen's Bench Division on the ground that the verdict of £7,000 damages was grossly inadequate. The Queen's Bench Division ordered a new trial, and the defendants appealed from that order to the Court of Appeal. The defendants argued in the Court of Appeal that no misdirection had been found by the Queen's Bench Division and that an appellate court ought not to interfere with the jury's verdict in the absence of misdirection. The Court of Appeal held that the Queen's Bench Division were right in ordering a new trial, and they did so, as I understand the decision, not on the basis that there was any misdirection by FIELD, J., but on the basis, which has now become so very well known and was stated, among other places, by GREER, L.J., in Flint v. Lovell (6), that the award of damages was so grossly inadequate as to lead to the inference that it was entirely erroneous. In dealing with the summing-up of FIELD, J., JAMES, L.J., did, I think, use expressions which are capable of being construed as referring to damages being allowable in respect of a period after death and during the period the injured party would have lived but for the accident, but, in doing so and citing from the passages of the summing-up of FIELD, J., JAMES, L.J., says (5 Q.B.D. 87):

"The case could not have been put more favourably for the plaintiff than it was thus put by FIELD, J."

I think he is merely saying there that, so far as misdirection was being alleged by the respondents in the Court of Appeal, there was nothing in their argument on misdirection because it could not have been put more favourably for them, and that the ground on which the order of the Queen's Bench Division for a new trial was upheld was that, in the view of the Court of Appeal, to award only the equivalent of one year's salary, without including the salary for whatever period the plaintiff would live and a sum for all his pain and suffering, was so inadequate that the jury must have omitted to take into consideration matters which they ought to have taken into consideration, and that on that ground they agreed with the Queen's Bench Division that a new trial should be ordered.

I am unable to find anything in that case which would be binding on me as laying down the principle that a plaintiff in circumstances like those in the present case is entitled to have taken into consideration the fact that he is prevented from earning wages over the period between the date of his death and the date to which he would normally have lived but for the accident. I, therefore, award no general damages on that basis because I do not think it is a matter which

I am entitled to take into consideration. Nothing one can do can lengthen the plaintiff's life by the period by which it has been shortened as a result of the accident—restitutio in that sense is impossible—and I cannot think it right that I should give damages for loss of earnings during a period during which ex hypothesi he will not be alive to earn them. If I were to give them, I would not know on what basis to assess them. The plaintiff might normally have been expected to live for twenty-one years longer than he is now likely to live. If I were to take his wages as remaining the same and multiply £494 a year by twenty-one, discount that by a large amount because the capital sum would then be in his hands and it would not become payable, so to speak, for the first year until he actually died, and discount it by all the other hazards of life, and supposing I arrived at a purely hypothetical figure of £5,000 after allowing for all the discounts, as a dead man has not got himself to keep and cannot spend the money, I would be giving him the £5,000 not only on the footing that he was alive and able to earn the salary, when in fact he was dead, but also on the footing that the money would not be spent.

This point was present to the mind of LORD ATKIN in Rose v. Ford (7), where he says ([1937] 3 All E.R. 363):

“Can the damages include a calculation of loss of income which the deceased would have received during normal expectation of life, but would not have saved so as to increase his estate? I express no opinion.”

Of course, in Rose v. Ford (7), LORD ATKIN was dealing, not with a person who was still alive, but with a claim under the Fatal Accidents Acts, and I am fully alive to the provisions of s. 1 (2) (c) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, which provides that where the death of a person has been caused by the act or omission which gives rise to the cause of action, the damages shall be calculated without reference to any loss or gain to his estate consequent on his death, but it is at least strange, if the argument submitted to me based on Roach v. Yates (4) is correct, that no one has yet thought it necessary to argue in a case where the injured person has died that damages of that kind do not arise consequent on death as do the loss of a life interest, the cesser of an annuity, or funeral expenses, but are something which accrued to the injured party, as, indeed, it is suggested that they pass to a plaintiff where the action is commenced after his death by virtue of the statutory abolition by this Act of the actio personalis. In my judgment, therefore, save in so far as the loss of earnings after death is to be considered under the item of damages for loss of expectation of life, in the sense that they are one of the elements which indicate that a person earning a reasonable livelihood is more likely to have an enjoyable life, I must exclude from the general damages any sum for loss of wages between the date of death and the date of the plaintiff's normal expectation of life apart from the accident. They fall to be taken into consideration in assessing the damages for loss of expectation of life.

I now have to quantify the damages that I ought to award under the head of prospective loss of wages, limiting that to the actual duration of life. It, accordingly, becomes necessary for me to determine on the evidence how long the plaintiff is likely to live. On the evidence I find that eighteen months is a fair period. I, therefore, take a year and a half, that is seventy-eight weeks, at his present wage of £9 10s. 1d. a week, less £224 4s. 6d., deducted under the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act, 1948, making a figure of £517 2s. 0d. With regard to future nursing attendance, the plaintiff is in hospital, and I think that the possibility of such an expense being incurred is so remote that its possibility will be adequately met by an award of the sum of £25. Dealing with the shortening of life, in Benham v. Gambling (8) the figure was reduced from £1,200 to £200. It concerned a child of three, a child of very tender years. I think so far as it is humanly possible to assess these damages on any basis whatever, the proper figure to take in the case of the plaintiff, with an A1 prospect of life, thirty-five years of age at the time of the accident, and bearing in mind the fact that he would have continued to receive wages sufficiently adequate not to cause him to live in penury or anything of that kind, for damages for loss of expectation of life is £500, and I award that figure. The most serious item is past and future physical and mental pain. I am concerned with the distressing amount of pain and suffering, both physical and, I emphasise, mental, which this poor man has now suffered for just over two years and which, on the forecast that I have accepted, he will go on suffering for a further eighteen months, making a total of three years and eight months. Not only did he suffer a fracture dislocation of the spine with spinal cord injury resulting in complete paralysis of the lower limbs, but he has had tremendous pain and trouble in connection with his bladder, from recurrent bedsores as a result of the immobility of the lower limbs, and from urinary infections. He has had a suprapubic operation and another operation on the neck of the bladder. His abdomen is grossly distended, there is great enlargement of both the spleen and the liver, he is incontinent of urine, and the pressure sores are still septic. It is impossible that he should ever recover sufficiently to be a useful member of the community or even to lead a life that gives pleasure to himself or his family. I remember what I have been enjoined to remember by case after case in the higher courts, that no amount of damages would compensate him for what he has suffered, for what he has lost, and for what he will continue to suffer and lose. I do not pretend to award a sum which will do so, but I have to award a sum for this terrible physical and mental suffering over the last two years and two months and the next one year and six months, and I assess it at £5,000.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon, Lord Porter, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Reid, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone), December 10, 11, 15, 16, 17, 18, 1952, February 5, 1953.]

F Estate Duty—Passing—Property deemed to pass—Money received under a policy of assurance—"Interest purchased or provided"—Beneficial interest arising—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 2 (1) (d)—Finance Act, 1939 (c. 41), s. 30 (1).

On May 3, 1904, the deceased took out a policy of assurance on his life for £30,000 with profits in consideration of the payment of annual premiums. In 1907, on his marriage, the deceased brought into his marriage settlement the policy together with other property, and covenanted with the trustees to pay the premiums on the policy. In 1930 the trusts of the marriage settlement were terminated, and by a deed of re-settlement dated June 10, 1930, the trust property, including the policy, was settled on such trusts as the deceased and the plaintiff (the deceased's eldest son) should by deed jointly appoint, and in default of and until and subject to the any appointment on trusts therein specified. The deceased covenanted in the re-settlement to pay the premiums on the policy. On Nov. 10, 1934, the deceased and the plaintiff appointed that the policy and also certain other property (derived from the deceased) should be held in trust for the plaintiff absolutely, and the deceased was released from his covenant to pay the premiums. The deceased paid all the premiums on the policy falling due prior to Nov. 10, 1934, but thereafter until the maturity of the policy the premiums were paid by the plaintiff. On Apr. 14, 1940, the deceased died, and the Crown claimed estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (d), as extended by the Finance Act, 1939, s. 30, in respect of the proceeds of the policy (or part thereof).

HELD: the "interest purchased or provided" within s. 2 (1) (d) was the benefit of the policy and not the proceeds of the policy; the "beneficial interest" referred to in the paragraph was a beneficial interest in the policy; the whole of that interest passed to the plaintiff in 1934; and, therefore, no beneficial interest in the policy "accrued or arose on the death of the deceased", and s. 2 (1) (d) did not apply to render estate duty payable on the amount of the policy moneys.

APPEAL by the taxpayer from an order of the Court of Appeal dated July 16, 1951, reported [1951] 2 All E.R. 543, discharging an order of VAISEY, J., dated Dec. 20, 1950, reported [1951] 1 All E.R. 240, dismissing the Crown's claim for estate duty made under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), or, alternatively, under s. 2 (1) (d) of that Act as extended by the Finance Act, 1939, s. 30 (1), in respect of moneys payable under a policy of assurance on the life of Sir Osmond D'Avigdor-Goldsmid, Bt., deceased.

VAISEY, J., held that the Crown's claim, both under s. 2 (1) (c) and also under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Act of 1894, was bad. The Court of Appeal (SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., JENKINS and BIRKETT, L.JJ.) upheld the decision of VAISEY, J., in relation to s. 2 (1) (c), but reversed his decision in relation to s. 2 (1) (d), and gave liberty to apply in chambers for an inquiry as to the extent of the claim having regard to the Finance Act, 1939, s. 30. The taxpayer appealed against the decision of the Court of Appeal so far as it related to the claim under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Act of 1894. The Crown did not cross-appeal in respect of the decision on s. 2 (1) (c) of that Act.

The House took time for consideration.

Feb. 5. The following opinions were read.

VISCOUNT SIMON: My Lords, this is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., JENKINS and BIRKETT, L.JJ.), which discharged an order dated Dec. 20, 1950, made by VAISEY, J., in the matter of a policy of assurance on the life of the plaintiff's father, Sir Osmond D'Avigdor-Goldsmid, Bt., deceased, on an originating summons wherein the appellant was the plaintiff and the respondents were the defendants. The question at issue in this appeal is whether estate duty should be paid on a sum of money amounting to £48,765, which was received in discharge of a life policy taken out by the deceased on May 3, 1904, for £30,000 with profits, under annual premiums of £695. At the time when the deceased took out the policy he was unmarried, but on his marriage in 1907 he brought into his marriage settlement the policy, together with certain freehold estates and investments. By the settlement the policy, with all bonus additions, was assigned by the deceased to trustees on trust to receive the policy moneys at maturity and hold the same on the trusts therein declared, and the deceased covenanted with the trustees to pay the premiums on the said policy, which he did, as long as he had any interest in it. By subsequent dispositions, which it is not necessary to set out, the appellant, who was his eldest son, became absolutely entitled to the policy as from Nov. 10, 1934, more than five years before the death of his father, which occurred on Apr. 14, 1940. The appellant paid out of his own moneys the premiums under the policy from the time he became absolute owner of it.

The Crown claimed estate duty on the £48,765, either under s. 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894, or under s. 2 (1) (d). As regards the first claim, VAISEY, J., decided that no estate duty arose. The Court of Appeal came to the same conclusion and this conclusion is not now challenged by the respondents. But on the alternative claim to duty under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Act of 1894, the Court of Appeal reversed the decision of VAISEY, J., that no duty was payable and held that the sum in question was property which must be deemed to pass on the death of the deceased within para. (d).

Paragraph (d) brings within the charge of estate duty

“any annuity or other interest purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person, to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased.”

Assuming, therefore, that the life policy is covered by the words “other interest” in para. (d) it lies on the Crown to prove that it was “provided by the deceased” and also that a “beneficial interest” in the policy accrued or arose on the death of the deceased. The policy was taken out and kept up by the deceased and assigned to the appellant with other assets in circumstances which made it the absolute property of the appellant in 1934 and onwards, and it may, therefore, be regarded as an “other interest . . . provided by the deceased”. The crucial question in the case is whether a beneficial interest in the policy arose at the deceased's death. The appellant contends that it did not, and if he is right the Crown's claim must fail.

A life policy is a piece of property which confers on the owner of it the right, if certain conditions continue to be satisfied, to claim and be paid the policy moneys on the death of the person whose life is assured. These rights, therefore, belonged to the appellant from 1934 and were the beneficial interest in the policy which belonged to him from that moment. When the death occurred, he held these rights, and the quality of these rights was not changed by the death, which was merely the occasion when the rights were realised. There was, therefore, no new or additional beneficial interest in the policy which arose on the death of the appellant's father. For six years past, he had had absolute and unfettered ownership of the policy. As VAISEY, J., pointed out ([1951] 1 All E.R. 248), he "could have sold it, mortgaged it, given it away, destroyed it, settled it, or (being a policy on his father's life) he could have surrendered it at the moment when his father was in extremis, at the point of death."

If he had done any of these things, the Crown could not have claimed to aggregate the policy moneys with the rest of the estate for the purposes of duty. It follows that no estate duty is payable on the £48,765, for no beneficial interest in the policy accrued or arose on the death of the deceased.

I prefer to base my decision on this simple ground by taking the words of the statute and seeing whether the Crown brings the case within the section. We were referred to a large number of previous decisions which were alleged to throw light on the problem raised. It is enough to say that the Scottish decision of Lord Advocate v. Hamilton's Trustees (1) is in line with the conclusion at which I have arrived, and the argument in LORD WARK's opinion sets out a course of reasoning which I accept and apply in the present case. The judgment of PALLES, C.B., in A.-G. v. Robinson (2) has received the close attention which is proper to be given to any pronouncement of that very learned judge, and the Chief Baron nine years later thought it right in Richardson v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3) ([1909] 2 I.R. 624) to add some observations on his decision in Robinson's case (2) on the ground that it had been misapprehended. I confess that I do not find it easy to grasp the Chief Baron's argument and in particular do not appreciate the meaning of his statement ([1901] 2 I.R. 90) as to "an exact description of money secured by a policy of insurance". The liability of the subject under a taxing statute ought not to be arrived at by a course of subtle and sophistical argument and, even in the case of the most learned judicial pronouncements, it is well to recognise that on rare occasions bonus dormitat Homerus. I move that the appeal be allowed with costs.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion which the noble Lord on the Woolsack has just delivered. I agree with it and have little to add.

It is plain that the Court of Appeal reached their conclusion by following the reasoning of PALLES, C.B., in A.-G. v. Robinson (2), a case which has, I think, influenced a number of decisions in this country, but has not been the subject of any direct approval in your Lordships' House. Indeed, in Tennant v. Lord Advocate (4), LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN expressly leaves open the question whether it correctly construes the language of the relevant Acts. He says ([1939] 1 All E.R. 675):

"For myself, I am not prepared to accept without some further consideration the correctness of the first step. Three authorities were cited as establishing it—namely, A.-G. v. Dobree (5), A.-G. v. Robinson (2) and Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Scott's Trustees (6). No doubt language is used in some of the judgments in those cases which might give colour to the view that what passed on the death was the cash, and not the policy, or the value of the policy, but in none of those cases was it material that any such question should be decided."

The property referred to in those cases was a policy or policies of life insurance, and the first step to which the noble Lord referred was the proposition that the property which was subject to the duty consisted of the policy moneys, i.e., of the cash payable and paid by the insurance company and of nothing else. In other words, the property was the policy moneys, not the rights existent in the contract of insurance. That was, I think, undoubtedly the opinion of the Chief Baron, and it seems to have received a degree of acceptance by some of those members of other courts, and of the Court of Appeal in the present case, who hold that the "interest" consists of the right to receive the policy money when it becomes due at the death of the assured, and that the beneficial interest in that interest accrues or arises for the first time on the death. The Chief Baron in Robinson's case (2) expresses this view in plain terms when he says ([1901] 2 I.R. 89):

" 'Interest . . . to the extent of the beneficial interest', is not a very happy expression; but the meaning is clear. The thing subjected to taxation is 'the beneficial interest accruing or arising, by survivorship or otherwise, on the death of the deceased, in any annuity or in any other interest in property purchased or provided by the deceased', as mentioned in the section. The words 'accruing or arising' are used in contradistinction to 'passing'. They indicate, not the transfer upon death to another of something which the deceased or some other person had before or at the death, but the springing up, upon the death, and the then vesting in another, of property which previously had not been existing in any one. This is an exact description of money secured by a policy of insurance."

His further explanation of the grounds for his decision, which are to be found in A.-G. v. Smyth (7), gives rise to certain difficulties, but in no way affects this part of his opinion.

If it is accurate to say that the interest which is aimed at in s. 2 (1) (d) is the policy money when received and not the contract of insurance represented by the policy, there does spring up for the first time on the death of the assured an interest which then and then only arises or accrues, and the Crown's contention is right. But, in my opinion, LORD RUSSELL's doubts are fully justified, and I cannot accept the view that some fresh interest accrues or arises in the beneficial holder of a policy on the death of the deceased life. From the date of the assignment to him in 1934, the appellant was the absolute owner of the policy and, subject to payment of the premium, entitled to receive the sum insured, with any bonus, when the stipulated time of payment, viz., the death, had been reached. He did not get a new interest: he obtained the fruition of the interest which he already held. As one of your Lordships expressed it in the course of argument, the value of the chose in action is increased, the interest of the beneficiary is not altered.

The Crown's claim under s. 2 (1) (c) of the Act of 1894 has been dropped and I find myself in agreement with the views of VAISEY, J., as respects the claim under s. 2 (1) (d). Like him, I prefer the decision and the principle laid down in the Scottish case Lord Advocate v. Hamilton's Trustees (1) to those enumerated on behalf of the Crown, which I refrain from discussing further since they have been analysed in the opinion about to be delivered by LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON and I cannot usefully add to his remarks.

There is, however, another aspect of the case put forward by the Attorney-General which requires some consideration. He presented it in the following form:

"If the 'other interest' was the policy and not the money payable and paid under its terms on the death, and no new beneficial interest then arose or accrued, in that case, on the principles laid down in your Lordships' House in Adamson v. A.-G. (8) and on the arguments presented on behalf of the appellant, there was an increase in the value of the interest and that interest, however small, fell to be taxed even in the state of the law as existing when Adamson's case (8) was decided. That sum would no doubt have been small at that time, but today that fact is immaterial inasmuch as it has now been provided by s. 28 of the Finance Act, 1934, that—

“ For the purposes of para. (d) of sub-s. (1) of s. 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, where an annuity or other interest has been purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or . . . by arrangement with any other person, the extent of any beneficial interest therein accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased shall be ascertained, and shall be deemed always to have been ascertainable, without regard to any interest in expectancy the beneficiary may have had therein before the death.”

The result is, says the Attorney-General, that the whole value of the dutiable property is subject to tax.

My Lords, the difference in value between the moment when an assured man is in articulo mortis and the moment of his actual decease must be infinitesimal and I am not convinced, as at present advised, that the law would pay attention to so minute a sum. But there is, in my opinion, another reason for rejecting the argument. In Adamson's case (8) there was, as the majority of their Lordships held, a change in the interest of the beneficiaries: before the death they had a contingent interest which might have been divested; after it they had a vested interest. The reasoning is best seen in the observations of LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE ([1933] A.C. 277). He says:

“ In the present case the interest of each child was unquestionably provided by the deceased, and is therefore to be deemed to be included in the expression ‘ property passing on the death of the deceased ’, but only to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising on the death of the deceased. Before his death each child had a beneficial interest, but one that might be destroyed either by an exercise of the power of appointment or by the death of the child in the lifetime of the deceased: on his death without exercising his power the beneficial interest of each child became absolute and indefeasible.”

Your Lordships' House so decided in Adamson's case (8), and LORD WARRINGTON's words set out the ground on which the decision was based. On that reasoning there was as a result of the death a change in the rights which each child enjoyed. Until it occurred he might have got all or nothing or some intermediate sum: afterwards his rights were finally determined. The case differs from the present one in which the rights of the appellant have not changed. He is, and has been since 1934, full and absolute owner of the policy. All that has happened is that, though its value is greater, his interest is the same. It follows that, in my view, this alternative argument, like that previously presented, should not succeed. I would allow the appeal.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, immediately before Oct. 22, 1907, Sir Osmond Elim D'Avigdor-Goldsmid (hereafter referred to as “ Sir Osmond ”) was the owner of a policy of assurance on his own life for the sum of £30,000 with profits. He had already paid the first four annual premiums. Sir Osmond was married once only, on Oct. 23, 1907. The appellant was the eldest son of the marriage, and was born on June 10, 1909. On and in consideration of his marriage Sir Osmond made a settlement dated Oct. 22, 1907. By the settlement, Sir Osmond settled certain freehold estates, certain investments, and the said policy of assurance on certain trusts, and covenanted to pay the premiums on the policy. This covenant was repeated in the re-settlement hereafter mentioned. By virtue of (a) the Goldsmid Estate Act, 1928, (b) an appointment by Sir Osmond dated June 10, 1930, (c) a disentailing deed of the same date, (d) a re-settlement of the same date, the policy and a freehold property No. 27, Wood Street, in the city of London, came to be held by trustees on such trusts and in such manner generally as Sir Osmond and the appellant should from time to time by any deed or deeds revocable or irrevocable jointly appoint, and in default of and until and subject to any such appointment on the trusts mentioned in the re-settlement. By a deed of appointment dated Nov. 10, 1934, under the hands and seals of Sir Osmond and the appellant, in exercise of the joint powers of appointment conferred by the re-settlement, they appointed that (i) the policy and (ii) the said premises No. 27 Wood Street should thenceforth be held by the trustees and Sir Osmond respectively in trust for the appellant absolutely and in fee simple for his own use and benefit, discharged from all the trusts powers and provisions declared by the re-settlement. The trustees, by the direction of the appellant, and the appellant thereby released and discharged Sir Osmond from all his covenants in the re-settlement contained for the payment of premiums on and otherwise relating to the policy and it was provided that a term of ninety-nine years limited by the re-settlement should as regards the premises affected by that appointment cease and be extinguished. The effect of this appointment was that, upwards of five years prior to the death of Sir Osmond, the appellant became the absolute beneficial owner of the policy and of No. 27 Wood Street, to the entire exclusion of Sir Osmond. The legal estate in No. 27 Wood Street was vested in the appellant soon after the said appointment, and the policy was assigned to him. As from the date of the appointment, the appellant could at any time have surrendered or sold the policy had he so desired, but he preferred to keep it up, which he did until it matured. Sir Osmond died on Apr. 14, 1940, and thereupon the policy moneys became payable, and the appellant received the sum of £48,765 thereunder.

Sir Osmond, pursuant to his covenant in the settlement, paid twenty-three premiums in addition to the four paid by him before the settlement was executed. After the re-settlement and before the appointment he paid a further four premiums pursuant to his covenant in the re-settlement. Six premiums became payable after the policy appointment, and all of these were paid by the appellant.

At the date of the appointment, No. 27 Wood Street was let under a lease dated July 25, 1934, for a term of twenty-one years from Mar. 25, 1934, at a yearly rent of £700. This property was destroyed by enemy action in 1940 and the lease was disclaimed on Dec. 25, 1940. The total rent received by the appellant from this property between the date of the appointment and the said disclaimer was £3,083 15s. 3d., of which £464 0s. 3d. was received after the death of Sir Osmond.

The respondents put forward a claim to estate duty on the policy moneys. This claim was based originally on the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (d), as extended by the Finance Act, 1939, s. 30 (1). In the later correspondence, however, the claim was based primarily on s. 2 (1) (c) of the said Act and limited to duty on 27/33rd parts of the money received, but the claim under s. 2 (1) (d) was maintained as an alternative claim. In consequence of these claims to duty the appellant as plaintiff on Sept. 3, 1949, issued an originating summons in the Chancery Division making the respondents the defendants. The summons raised the question whether on the death of Sir Osmond estate duty became payable as claimed by the respondents on the policy or the said sum which became payable thereunder (A) under s. 2 (1) (c) or (B) under s. 2 (1) (d) aforesaid, and if under (A) on what proportion of the policy moneys or whether (as claimed by the appellant) no duty became payable. VAISEY, J., held that no estate duty became payable on the death of Sir Osmond in respect of the policy, or on the value of it or any part of such value, or on the said sum of £48,765. On an appeal by the present respondents the Court of Appeal (SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., JENKINS and BIRKETT, L.JJ.) declared that estate duty became payable on the death of Sir Osmond in respect of the whole value of the policy, by virtue of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (d), as extended by the Finance Act, 1939, s. 30 (1), subject to the reduction provided for by the last-mentioned sub-section and it was ordered that the parties were to be at liberty to apply in chambers for an inquiry as to the amount of such duty. The Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of VAISEY, J., with regard to the claim for duty under s. 2 (1) (c) on the ground that the appellant was not a "donee", since he derived his title under the marriage settlement and was within the marriage consideration. The appellant was given liberty to appeal, and the respondents were given liberty to enter a cross-appeal. There is no cross-appeal, and, accordingly, the only question before your Lordships' House is as to the claim for estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (d). I agree with VAISEY, J., that this claim is unfounded, and I suspect that the Court of Appeal might have arrived at the same conclusion if that court had felt itself unfettered by authority. The Master of the Rolls, in delivering the judgment of the court, referred to a number of cases and expressed himself thus ([1951] 2 All E.R. 562):

"In this state of the authorities, and, particularly, in view of the express and unqualified approval accorded to A.-G. v. Robinson (2) by this court in A.-G. v. Murray (9), it seems to us that, notwithstanding Lord Advocate v. Hamilton's Trustees (1), our duty is to apply to the present case the law as laid down in A.-G. v. Dobree (5) and A.-G. v. Robinson (2)."

My Lords, it will be necessary shortly to refer to these and other cases, but for the moment I shall address my mind simply to the words of s. 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act, 1894. That sub-section is as follows:

"Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say:— . . . (d) Any annuity or other interest purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person, to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased."

An exemption from this provision was referred to in the course of the argument. It is contained in s. 15 of the Act of 1894, which exempts by sub-s. (1):

" . . . a single annuity not exceeding £25 purchased or provided by the deceased . . . for the life of himself and of some other person and the survivor of them, or to arise on his own death in favour of some other person . . ."

There are three conditions which must be satisfied in order to give rise to a claim for duty under s. 2 (1) (d), viz., (i) there must be an annuity "or other interest"; (ii) it must have been purchased or provided by the deceased either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with some other person; and (iii) a beneficial interest therein must accrue or arise by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased. I have inserted the word "therein" in condition (iii), although it does not appear in the paragraph, because it is manifest from the wording of the section that the duty is payable only if a beneficial interest in the "annuity or other interest" accrues or arises on the death of the deceased. If there were any doubt on this point it would be removed by the use of the word "therein" twice in the Finance Act, 1934, s. 28. The relevant part of that section is as follows:

"For the purposes of para. (d) of sub-s. (1) of s. 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, where an annuity or other interest has been purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person, the extent of any beneficial interest therein accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased shall be ascertained, and shall be deemed always to have been ascertainable, without regard to any interest in expectancy the beneficiary may have had therein before the death."

A As to condition (i), I am content to assume, for the purposes of this appeal, that the policy is an "other interest" within the meaning of the paragraph, although I have long felt, and still feel, grave doubt whether the legislature ever intended this curious phrase to apply to the absolute beneficial ownership of a policy of assurance. There is no decision of this House on the point, and it is to be noted that "money received under a policy of assurance" is singled out from other property and expressly subjected to estate duty in certain circumstances, by s. 2 (1) (c) of the Act of 1894, incorporating the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11.

B Condition (ii) is admittedly satisfied, in accordance with, and subject to, the provisions of the Finance Act, 1939, s. 30, by reason of the inclusion of No. 27 Wood Street in the property appointed to the appellant on Nov. 10, 1934.

C Has condition (iii) been satisfied in the present case? In my opinion, it has not. The only "other interest" purchased or provided by the deceased (Sir Osmond) was the policy. That was what he owned in October, 1907, that was what he settled on Oct. 22, 1907, and that was what was appointed to the appellant on Nov. 10, 1934. The question to be decided is whether a beneficial interest in the policy accrued or arose on Sir Osmond's death. To that question there can, in my view, be only one answer. The whole beneficial interest in the policy passed to the appellant absolutely in 1934. No interests in expectancy were created, and the beneficial interest of the appellant in the policy immediately after his father's death was exactly the same as his beneficial interest in the policy immediately before his father's death. True it is that the property in which the appellant had a beneficial interest became more valuable by reason of the death, but he had at all material times the same beneficial interest in that property. The Attorney-General, if I understood him correctly, described this as a "metaphysical conception", but, to my mind, it is a plain statement of fact; and if it is a correct statement of fact it is manifest that condition (iii) is not satisfied in this case. I think that confusion has arisen in certain earlier cases because the court has regarded the moneys ultimately paid under the policy, instead of the policy itself, as the "other interest purchased or provided".

F The first case to which reference should be made is A.-G. v. Dobree (5). In that case, the deceased settled a policy on his own life in trust for his wife for life with remainders over. He covenanted to pay the premiums and did so. The wife survived him and a Divisional Court (DARLING and CHANNELL, JJ.) held that estate duty was payable, under s. 2 (1) (d), on the sum payable under the policy. Dobree's case (5) differs from the present case, for neither the wife nor her legal personal representatives could take anything unless she survived her husband, whereas in the present case it was certain, from 1934 onwards, that the appellant or his legal personal representatives would take the whole of the policy moneys, whether or not he survived Sir Osmond. It may be necessary to decide hereafter whether this difference was enough to justify the decision in Dobree's case (5). For the moment I would only observe that both DARLING, J., and CHANNELL, J., appear to have thought that the "other interest" provided by the deceased was the sum paid by the assurance company on the death of the deceased and not the contractual right conferred by the policy. With this view I cannot agree. In one respect at least Dobree's case (5) would seem to be wrongly decided, for if any beneficial interest accrued or arose on the death of the deceased, it was the wife's beneficial interest for her life, and duty was only payable on the principal value of the interest, ascertained in accordance with the Finance Act, 1894, s. 7 (5). Curiously enough, this point seems to have been overlooked in certain later cases to which our attention was directed.

A.-G. v. Robinson (2) must be more fully considered, as the decision of the Court of Appeal in the present case was based largely on it. In that case, the court (PALLES, C.B., and JOHNSON and BOYD, JJ.) had to decide (inter alia) whether estate duty became payable under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (d), on the death of John Robinson, who died on Dec. 17, 1898, in respect of four policies of assurance. By his marriage settlement dated June 8, 1843, the deceased settled the four policies and his intended wife settled a sum of £3,500 belonging to her. The trusts, as stated in the report and in the judgment of PALLES, C.B., were as follows:

"upon trust as to the moneys secured by the policies (when received) to pay the income thereof to the wife for life and after her death as to the principal moneys for the children of the marriage; and the trusts of the intended wife's moneys were to apply, after the marriage, so much of the income thereof as might be necessary to pay the premiums upon the policies, and to pay the residue thereof to the deceased, the intended husband, for life, and after his death to the intended wife for life, and after the death of the survivor in trust for the children of the marriage."

From the date of the marriage the policies were kept up out of the income of the wife's moneys. The wife predeceased the husband, and the husband by his will appointed the moneys which should become payable under the policies as to £500 to one of his two sons and the balance in equal shares to his other son and to his daughter. It will be observed that the trusts in favour of the children are very briefly stated, but it is clear that the survivor of the husband and wife had power to appoint among the children (and possibly remoter issue) of the marriage, and it may fairly be assumed that in default of appointment the children took the policy moneys in equal shares.

The case is distinguishable from the present case. Immediately before the death of their father, the children were defeasibly entitled, in equal shares, to the policy and the fruits thereof. Their father's will took effect at his death. Thereupon the children became entitled absolutely and indefeasibly, but in different shares. In such a case it may be that beneficial interests accrued or arose on the father's death, within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (d), but the reasons given by the learned Chief Baron for his decision are open to criticism. My noble and learned friend on the Woolsack has already referred to one passage ([1901] 2 I.R. 90). I share his difficulties as to this passage, and I would add that I find it equally difficult to understand the reasoning by which, in Richardson v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3) ([1909] 2 I.R. 624) the learned Chief Baron sought to explain his finding that the deceased "purchased or provided" the policy moneys. I have studied the judgment of the Chief Baron (with which his brethren agree) with the care and respect which is due to any utterance of that great judge, but I can derive no assistance from it in the present case.

A.-G. v. Hawkins (10) is not directly in point, but it is interesting to note that both members of the court mentioned, by way of contrast, the case of an absolute assignment of the whole beneficial interest in a policy to a beneficiary, and clearly took the view that such a case would not fall within s. 2 (1) (d): see per KENNEDY, J. ([1901] 1 K.B. 292, 293), and per PHILLIMORE, J. (ibid., 295, 296). In reading the latter passage, it is necessary to note the "errata" which appear at the beginning of the volume.

In A.-G. v. Murray (9) the decision of the Court of Appeal was directed to the question whether a policy of assurance effected by a father on his son's life and settled on his son's marriage was or was not "purchased or provided" by the son in concert or by arrangement with the father, within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (d), but in the course of the case it was argued that a policy was not an "other interest" within s. 2 (1) (d) and also that:

"The whole beneficial interest in the contingent debt passed under the settlement on the marriage, and the wife had no greater beneficial interest in it by reason of the husband's death than she had as soon as the marriage took place";

and reference was made to A.-G. v. Dobree (5) and A.-G. v. Robinson (2). COZENS-HARDY, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said ([1904] 1 K.B. 172):

"Secondly, it is contended that a policy of insurance is not an interest within sub-s. (1) (d). We have not been able to appreciate this argument. A policy is plainly property within the scope of s. 2, and we can see no ground for excluding it from sub-s. (1) (d). We are content to adopt the reasoning of PALLES, C.B., in A.-G. v. Robinson (2), and we do not think any good object would be attained by attempting to further elaborate it."

The Court of Appeal in the present case read the last sentence just quoted as "express and unqualified approval accorded to A.-G. v. Robinson (2)". It will have appeared already that I cannot share that approval.

In Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Scott's Trustees (6) the Inner House had to consider the terms of a settlement of policies by a father on somewhat unusual trusts for the benefit of his daughters and their issue. The facts differed widely from the facts of the present case, and need not be set out at length, but I share the doubts expressed by LORD SANDS as follows (1918 S.C. 726):

"These policies belonged, after the creation of the trust, to certain trustees for behoof of certain beneficiaries. Now, no doubt when a man dies who has insured his own life the policy upon his life is part of his estate, and in respect of that part of his estate a beneficial interest accrues to his executors. But I confess I entertain some doubt as to whether, where one already holds as one's own property a policy of insurance on the life of another party, any beneficial interest that was not in the holder before accrues to him at the time of the death of the person whose life is insured. The policy which he had in bonis simply matures."

I would add that even if estate duty was payable in Scott's case (6)—as to which I express no opinion—I see no reason why it should have been payable on the whole of the policy moneys, rather than on the principal value of the daughters' life interests.

I gratefully adopt the words of the Master of the Rolls in summarising the next three cases.

In A.-G. v. Pearson (11), liability to duty under s. 2 (1) (d) on the policy moneys in question was not disputed, but it was claimed that the exemption from aggregation afforded by the Finance Act, 1894, s. 4, to property in which the deceased never had an interest was applicable. ROWLATT, J., held that the exemption did not apply. The question with which we are now concerned was, therefore, not in issue. But ROWLATT, J., said of s. 2 (1) (d) ([1924] 2 K.B. 387):

"That the policy moneys in a case like this are liable to duty under that sub-section is clear upon the authorities beginning with the Irish case of A.-G. v. Robinson (2)."

Tennant v. Lord Advocate (4) was another case on the question of aggregation, liability to duty under s. 2 (1) (d) being admitted. LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN said ([1939] 1 All E.R. 675):

"For myself, I am not prepared to accept without some further consideration the correctness of the first step."

(He was referring here to a contention that what passed on the death was "the cash payable by the insurance company and nothing else".)

"Three authorities were cited as establishing it—namely, A.-G. v. Dobree (5), A.-G. v. Robinson (2), and Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Scott's Trustees (6). No doubt language is used in some of the judgments in those cases which might give colour to the view that what passed on the death was the cash, and not the policy, or the value of the policy, but in none of those cases was it material that any such question should be decided. Indeed, it is not easy to see how the question can ever become material. The policy must, if valued, be valued as a matured policy, and with reference to the solvency of the insurance company, with the result that the value of the policy will be the same as the value of the moneys payable thereunder. However, I would wish to keep the question open, in case it should ever hereafter be necessary to decide between the two alternatives."

With respect to these observations, it is proper to note that counsel for the Crown had not been called on to argue. His Lordship went on to decide that the policy moneys were aggregable, expressing agreement with the decision of ROWLATT, J., in A.-G. v. Pearson (11).

In Westminster Bank, Ltd. v. A.-G. (12), the point at issue was again aggregation, and was decided in favour of the Crown on the authority of Tennant v. Lord Advocate (4) which had been decided between the conclusion of the hearing and the delivery of the reserved judgment of the Court of Appeal. But CLAUSON, L.J., delivering the judgment of the court, said ([1939] 2 All E.R. 74):

"The first step is to ascertain with precision what it is that is deemed to pass, on the death of Sir Frederick, in respect of the policy moneys by reason of the operation of s. 2 (1) (d). The answer is in the words of the sub-section: ' . . . [the] interest . . . provided by the deceased . . . to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising . . . on the death of the deceased '. The interest provided by the deceased is the amount of the policy moneys, including the bonuses. It is not, however, the whole of that sum which is deemed to pass. That sum is deemed to pass only to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising on the death of the deceased. In the present case, the extent of the beneficial interest so arising is commensurate with the life interests which spring into being on the death of Sir Frederick—that is to say, the life interests, whether vested or contingent, on attaining twenty-one or marrying, of the five children of Mrs. Van der Goes living at the testator's death. It follows that that which passes in respect of the policy moneys is so much thereof as is equivalent to the value of those life interests therein."

No one of these three cases is directly in point, but if ROWLATT, J., and CLAUSON, L.J., took the view that the "interest provided" was the policy moneys and not the policy itself, I cannot agree with them, and I do not think LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN would have agreed with them, if it had been necessary for him to decide the point.

Lastly, I come to Lord Advocate v. Hamilton's Trustees (1). In that case the deceased, who died in 1936, had in 1912 settled certain policies on his life on trusts for the benefit of his sons and daughter. The sons were to become absolutely entitled on attaining the age of twenty-five and the daughter's share was settled on her for life with remainders over. The trust deed stated that these provisions in favour of the children "shall vest in them respectively at the date hereof". The policies became fully paid in 1914 and 1915, and the premiums payable in the meantime were borrowed by the trustees from the deceased. On the deceased's death, duty was claimed under s. 2 (1) (d) on the amount of the policy moneys less the amount borrowed from the deceased by the trustees in order to pay the premiums, and the claim was rejected by the Inner House, affirming the Lord Ordinary (LORD KEITH) on the grounds that

(i) "in the circumstances the property sought to be charged had not been provided by the deceased", and that

"(ii) there was no beneficial interest accruing or arising on the death of the deceased, in respect that the whole interest in the policies had passed to the beneficiaries twenty-four years before the truster's death, their interest having fully vested."

A It is unnecessary for the present purpose to consider the first of these two grounds, but, in my view, the second ground was correct. LORD KEITH used language which applies very aptly to the present case. He said (1942 S.C. 434):

B "In the present case, it is undoubted that an interest vested in the beneficiaries under the deed of trust at the date thereof, and the death of the truster made no difference to that interest. If the sons had pre-deceased their father, their shares of the proceeds of the policies would have been paid over to their executors. I have difficulty in seeing how a beneficial interest accrued or arose to them, by survivorship or otherwise, on the death of the deceased. What accrued to them or to the trustees was a present right to demand payment from the insurance company in respect of a previously existing beneficial interest."

C I agree with the reasoning which I have just quoted. I would allow the appeal and restore the order of VAISEY, J.

D LORD REID: My Lords, in 1934 there were transferred to the appellant an insurance policy on the life of Sir Osmond D'Avigdor-Goldsmid and also property the income from which was sufficient to pay the insurance premiums. The appellant was under no obligation to keep up the policy or to retain the property transferred to him: he became the absolute owner of both the policy and the property. In fact, he paid the premiums and kept up the policy, and on the death of Sir Osmond in 1940 he received from the insurance company £48,765. Estate duty is claimed on this sum under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (d). That sub-section is in the following terms:

E "Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say:— . . (d) Any annuity or other interest purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person, to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased."

F I shall assume that the policy (or the money payable under it) was an "other interest" within the meaning of this enactment and it was conceded that, in view of the Finance Act, 1939, s. 30, this interest must be regarded as having been provided by Sir Osmond. The only question to be decided in this case is whether any beneficial interest within the meaning of the sub-section arose or accrued on the death of Sir Osmond. I think that the terms of the sub-section make it reasonably clear that what is meant is a beneficial interest in or in respect of the interest provided. If "beneficial interest" merely meant a financial benefit, then the Crown must succeed because the policy was obviously worth much more immediately after the death of Sir Osmond than it had been immediately before. But I have no doubt that that is not its meaning. In the first place the words "beneficial interest" in s. 2 (1) (d) are in marked contrast with the word "benefit" in s. 2 (1) (b) where the phrase used is "to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises": in the absence of strong reasons to the contrary one must assume that when Parliament uses different words in similar contexts in the same section it means different things, and I find nothing in the Act to rebut this presumption. And, secondly, in the decided cases that has not been held to be its meaning. In the cases where the Crown has succeeded it has been because it was held that some right or property of a different kind from that previously enjoyed by the beneficiary arose or accrued on the death or the right of the beneficiary was in some way enlarged or altered and not merely because the beneficiary's existing right became more valuable after the death.

In the present case, the appellant was absolute and unfettered owner of the policy before Sir Osmond's death, and he remained absolute and unfettered owner after the death. That is not disputed. The argument of the Attorney-General, as I understood it, was twofold. In the first place he argued that the interest provided by Sir Osmond was not the policy, but the money paid under it, and that this money (or the right to receive it) came into existence for the first time on the death of the assured. There is high authority for this, but, with all respect to the learned judges who have expressed that opinion, I find it hard to understand. If the sum assured were the interest to which the sub-section refers, then the rest of the argument might be valid. But that would seem to involve as a consequence that the interest did not exist and, therefore, could not be provided before the death. To my mind, it is plain that something did exist and was provided in 1934 when the policy was assigned to the appellant: indeed, as the policy had been taken out in 1907 it must have been of very considerable value in 1934 either by way of surrender value or as a realisable asset. And, moreover, it appears to me to be equally plain that nothing was provided after 1934. So I find it impossible to avoid the conclusion that what was provided was the policy, and to say that the policy was provided is merely a short way of saying that what was provided was the contractual right against the insurance company which the assured obtained when he entered into a contract with the company or took out the policy. That contractual right was assigned to the appellant, and it was by virtue of that contractual right alone that the appellant ultimately obtained payment of the £48,765. It is true that the company was only bound to pay if the assured, and, in his turn, the appellant, fulfilled their part of the contract by paying premiums, etc., but, this having been done, the contractual right originally acquired by the assured remained in force until the date of payment arrived and the money was paid.

It was then argued that, if what was provided was the policy, a new beneficial interest in respect of it arose at the death, because then for the first time there arose a right to sue for the sum due under the policy: before the death the appellant only had a contingent future right, but after the death he had a new and different right—a right to get the money. This argument is not based on any peculiarity of a contract of insurance, and if it is right it seems to me necessarily to lead to the conclusion that, whenever a creditor is owed money payable at a future date, his right after the date of payment has come is a new right different from the right which he had before that date. That seems to me to be a novel doctrine, and to neglect the fact that the rights of contracting parties flow from the contract: a new right would require a new contract. From the beginning the creditor's right was to be paid on a certain day, and the coming of that day does not create a new right, it merely enables him to enforce his old right, and I do not see why it should make any difference if the date of payment is determined, not by the calendar, but by the occurrence of an event, such as death, whose date cannot be predicted. Nor do I see why it should make any difference that the creditor has had to perform his part of the contract between the date when it was made and the date of payment. I must, therefore, also reject this argument.

The Attorney-General also submitted an argument based on the analogous case of an annuity. He argued, in effect, that if the policy transferred to the appellant had not been for payment of a lump sum on the death of Sir Osmond, but had been for payment of an annuity payable to Sir Osmond's executors or assigns for a period of, say, ten years commencing at Sir Osmond's death, then s. 2 (1) (d) would certainly have applied. If that were so, it would be a strong argument because, looking to the initial words of the sub-section "any annuity or other interest", it would be difficult to hold that Parliament intended that a different rule should apply merely because the policy moneys were payable in ten instalments instead of in a lump sum. But I am not at all convinced that this argument with regard to annuities is right: in that case also no duty is payable unless a beneficial interest accrued or arose on the death. The Attorney-General laid stress on the terms of s. 15 of the Act of 1894.

A That section exempts certain small annuities from duty. It does not say, and I do not think that it means, that, no matter what the circumstances may be, every annuity of the kinds which it mentions would necessarily fall within the scope of s. 2 but for its provisions. It is an exempting section, and it appears to me to be more natural to read it as meaning that an annuity which would otherwise fall within the scope of s. 2 is exempted if it complies with the requirements of s. 15. That would leave it open to say, in a particular case, that an annuity does not need to be exempted because the circumstances are such that it never came within the scope of s. 2.

B I shall not detain your Lordships by discussing the authorities again. They cannot all be reconciled, and I have thought it desirable to examine the whole matter afresh and to deal as directly as I could with the main arguments submitted for the respondents. I agree with your Lordships that this appeal should be allowed.

LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE (read by LORD REID): My Lords, I respectfully concur with the opinions, which I have had the advantage and pleasure of reading in print, of the noble viscount on the Woolsack and of LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON. Disengaged from certain clinging and obscur-ing draperies, the point seems to me a short one. It turns on the meaning, in the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (d), of two terms: "other interest" and "beneficial interest". "Other interest" in this context seems to me to cover, and on the facts of this case specifically to denote, the benefit of the policy: viz., the contractual rights conferred by it, whether on its original holder or its assignée. These rights included the right to exact payment of the insurance moneys in an agreed and specified event, viz., the death of Sir Osmond. The policy, the vehicle of this right, was assigned out and out, to Sir Osmond's son, the appellant, over five years before his father's death.

E

The "beneficial interest" referred to in the concluding lines of the material paragraph was a beneficial interest in the "other interest" referred to in its opening lines. It is a clumsy collocation of terms, no doubt, but it must mean a beneficial interest in a contractual right to exact £x if and when Sir Osmond should die. This beneficial interest has never altered in quality from the time of the assignment till the day of Sir Osmond's death, or until the day after it. The death has not generated a new beneficial interest. What it has done is to enhance the value of the "other interest" in which the beneficial interest subsisted. The "other interest" (consisting of the contractual rights under the policy) bore in its womb the "promise and potency" of this enhancement from the start. To say that the "beneficial interest" therein sprang into life "on the death" seems to me wholly false. If I buy an apple tree and it subsequently bears fruit, I was beneficially interested in the fruit from the start.

F

In these circumstances, I can see no answer to the reasoning which has moved my Lords to allow the appeal and like them I would allow it.

COUTTS & CO. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Earl Jowitt, Lord Porter, Lord Reid, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone), May 19, 20, 21, 1952, February 5, 1953.]

Estate Duty—Passing—Property deemed to pass—Policy of assurance—Premiums paid by trustees of settlement—Death of assured—Cesser of payment of premiums—Claim on capital needed to produce premiums—Cessation of “interest” in property—Interest of remaindermen—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 2 (1) (b). A

Trustees under a deed of appointment and re-settlement held policies of assurance on the life of B., and, in accordance with directions in that deed, they paid out of the annual income of the trust the premiums on those policies. B. died in 1946, and, as no further premiums were payable, the income of the tenant for life, H.B., was increased by the amount which had previously been required to pay the premiums. At B.'s death H.B. had no issue, and three daughters of B. would become entitled under the settlement if, as happened, nothing occurred to defeat their rights. The Crown claimed estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (b), in respect of the “slice” of the trust fund required to produce the income necessary to pay the premiums, it being contended that B.'s daughters had a beneficial interest within s. 2 (1) (b) in the sums paid as premiums which ceased on the cessation of the payment of the premiums on B.'s death, and so the benefit to H.B. arose by the cesser of their interests in the premiums. B C

HELD: the real interest of the daughters was not in the premiums, but in the sums assured, and they lost nothing when the premiums ceased to be paid; a person's “interest” could not cease within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (b) unless he lost something of actual or potential value which he might have had if the deceased had lived longer; the right of the daughters with regard to the premiums was in substance only an ancillary right for the protection of their real interest, and once that interest required no further protection, rights for its protection came to an end; and, therefore, there was no cesser of an interest within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (b), and the Crown was not entitled to claim and receive estate duty. The appellants contended that the “interest” under s. 2 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1894, was the right to receive the sum assured and that the payment of the premiums was merely incidental to that interest.

Feb. 5. EARL JOWITT: My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the opinions about to be delivered by my noble and learned friends, LORD PORTER and LORD REID. I agree with them, and have nothing to add. I beg
A to move that the appeal be allowed.

The following opinions were read.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, the circumstances of this case are stated in the opinion about to be delivered by my noble friend LORD REID and need not be repeated, but for clarity's sake it is desirable to set out one or two salient facts. The dispute concerns the right of the Crown to estate duty on the death
B of Captain Brassey. On his death those entitled to his estate, so far as concerns the claim in this case, were one Hugo Brassey, who was immediately interested. In certain events, however, the estate would pass to his three sisters, daughters of Captain Brassey. It is admitted that at the death these ladies had a vested right in the property. Part of that property consisted of four policies, for
C £40,000 in all, on the life of Captain Brassey, and all of it was the subject of a trust of which the appellants were trustees. By the terms of that trust they were directed to, and did in fact, purchase the policies for £11,000 as representing, or approximately representing, their surrender value at the date of purchase and were also directed to pay, and did pay, the premiums necessary for keeping on foot the four policies, but were not to be responsible for any omissions or neglect to keep up or restore them. Under the provisions of the trust both
D Captain Brassey and Hugo Brassey had certain powers of disposition which might have put an end to the ladies' interest. Hugo, however, never exercised his powers, and though Captain Brassey did exercise his by will, thereby substituting a testamentary interest in the ladies in lieu of their previous interest, it may be stated with sufficient accuracy for the determination of the matter now in issue that Hugo Brassey was entitled to the present enjoyment of the E income of the estate, but, inter alia, subject to a liability to pay the premiums on the policies, amounting to £1,976 13s. 4d. a year. In these circumstances, no doubt, the ladies could have applied during Captain Brassey's life to the appropriate court to compel performance of the obligation to pay the premiums and to maintain the policies, an application to which, in a proper case, the court would, no doubt, have acceded, though whether they would have done
F so in the present case is a matter of controversy. I will, however, assume that it would have done so. The position, therefore, before Captain Brassey's death was that Hugo Brassey was entitled to the whole of the income subject to certain obligations which are immaterial to the present case, but was under a liability to pay the yearly premiums in favour of the cestuis que trustent who, for this purpose, consisted of himself and the three ladies. After the G death he was entitled to the whole income discharged from such a liability.

In these circumstances the Crown claims estate duty under the terms of s. 2 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1894, calculated in accordance with the provisions of s. 7 of that Act. If the Crown is right, admittedly the sum due must be ascertained in accordance with the provisions of s. 7, and no more need be said
H about it except that the result would be that the maintenance of the policies would, in a monetary sense, result in an obligation to pay estate duty far in excess of the insurance money recoverable.

Whether the Crown's claim is or is not justified, depends on the correct construction of s. 2 (1) (b) in the light of the facts of the case. That section reads as follows:

"Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say:— . . (b) Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased, to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest . . .”

If it is to succeed, the Crown must establish that there is property in which some person had an interest and that the interest ceased on the death of the deceased. In the present instance the other persons are the three ladies, and, undoubtedly, they had an interest in certain property, but what that interest was, and whether it had ceased on Captain Brassey's death, is a matter of dispute. The Crown say that the property is the whole property included in the trust, and that the interest is the right to have the premiums paid thereout, that the ladies are interested in the payment because without it the policies would lapse, that that interest ceased on the death of the assured, and, therefore, under the plain terms of the Act, the Crown is entitled to claim and receive estate duty. The appellants, as I understand them, agree that the property is that whole property, but contend that the interest is the right to receive the sum assured and that the payment of the premiums is merely incidental to that interest. What the sisters are interested in is, they maintain, the sum assured and nothing else; the right to receive that sum in certain events always subsisted in the ladies and their interest has not changed; they do not hold a different interest or hold it in a different capacity as a result of Captain Brassey's death; the only change effected thereby is that, whereas before it the policy money was not immediately payable, afterwards it became an accrued debt. If, they say, there had been no question of insurance and premium, but merely a debt “debitum in praesenti” but not “solvendum” until the death of a particular person, there would be no cesser of interest—from first to last the interest would be the money receivable on the death and that interest would not have changed its character as a result of becoming immediately payable.

Does it, then, make a difference that it was necessary to pay the premiums in order to keep the property in being? The answer to this question appears to me to depend on what is the interest which the other person possesses in the property. If it be the expectation of receiving the capital sum payable on the death, the destination of the property has not been altered nor has its character changed: the only effect of the death has been to make it presently payable. The right to receive it has not ceased. If, on the other hand, it be the right to have the premiums paid, then, of course, the ladies' interest in that right has ceased. If property is to be deemed to pass, still there must be not only property and a person or persons interested but also a cessation of that interest. The first inquiry, therefore, is in what does that interest consist? I cannot think that in any ordinary sense the interest is the right to have the premiums paid. What the ladies were interested in was the receipt of the policy money. The death did not affect that interest so as to make it cease, it removed a prerequisite to the insurance company's liability. It was merely an event on which the insurance money became payable. The ladies' interest was unchanged. If the question were whether Hugo Brassey had obtained an advantage by reason of the death, undoubtedly he did, but the benefit accruing or arising is but one element towards the establishment of the Crown's claim. An interest in property and a cesser of that interest are further requisites for the respondents' success.

The accumulation cases, Re Hodson's Settlement (1) and Westminster Bank, Ltd. v. A.-G. (2), are in a different category. In each case the decision was that the property was deemed to pass under s. 1 of the Act and not under s. 2, because the persons ultimately entitled ceased to enjoy the right to have a portion of the estate, which might ultimately pass to them, increased by an accumulation of the income and the person immediately entitled benefited by the receipt of income which he was no longer obliged to accumulate by way of addition to the capital of the fund. Such a decision has, in my view, no direct application to the facts of the present case. The ladies have not ceased to enjoy anything. On the contrary, the property in which they are interested has become more valuable.

A Having regard to the opinion which I have expressed I have not found it necessary to discuss the alleged remoteness of the ladies' interest or to consider the effect, if it has any, of the circumstance that Captain Brassey did, as he was entitled, appoint an ultimate interest to the ladies by his will in place of their interest under the settlement. Both circumstances are, I think, irrelevant to the question involved in this case. I would allow the appeal.

B LORD REID: My Lords, the appellants, who are trustees under a deed of appointment and re-settlement of 1935, held policies for £40,000 on the life of Captain Brassey. In accordance with directions in that deed they paid out of the annual income of the trust premiums on those policies amounting to £1,976 per annum. Captain Brassey died in 1946, and on his death, as no further premiums were payable, the income of the tenant for life, Hugo Brassey, was increased by the amount which had previously been required to pay the premiums. The Crown contends that, in consequence of that change, estate C duty became payable on a sum of over £100,000 and the amount of duty claimed is over £60,000. In general, if it is alleged that a statutory provision brings about a result which is so startling one looks for some other possible meaning of the statute which will avoid such a result, because there is some presumption that Parliament does not intend its legislation to produce highly inequitable results. But I do not think that that is the proper way to approach D this case.

When estate duty was introduced by the Finance Act, 1894, the rates of duty were low. For an estate of between £100,000 and £150,000 the rate of duty was six per cent. and even for the largest estates it was only eight per cent. The Act provided a method of valuation of benefits accruing on the E cesser of an interest which generally inflated the real value of such benefits and often resulted in the statutory valuation very greatly exceeding any possible real value. No doubt this was administratively a convenient course, and, as the rates of duty were such that the additional burden thrown on the taxpayer was in any case relatively small, it may have been thought that practical F convenience outweighed any small injustice which might result. But, as the rates of duty were increased from time to time, the effect of the disparity became more serious. This was, of course, well known to those who advised G Parliament in these matters, but, nevertheless, Parliament has not chosen to make any alteration. In my view, the glaring disparity which appears in the present case cannot properly be attributed to the Act of 1894, but must be attributed to the fact that Parliament has not chosen to make any change to meet vastly different circumstances, and it is, therefore, not a matter which can properly be regarded as material in construing the Act of 1894. That Act is a taxing statute and must be construed as such, but it ought not to be more strictly construed because of the effect of subsequent enactments. LORD DUNEDIN, in A.-G. v. Milne (3), said ([1914] A.C. 778): " . . . the expressions used must be given fair play " even if the result of combining them with later H enactments is to produce claims such as that made by the Crown in this case.

The Crown's claim is based on s. 2 (1) (b) of the Act of 1894 which is as follows:

" Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say:— . . (b) Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased, to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest; but exclusive of property the interest in which of the deceased or other person was only an interest as holder of an office, or recipient of the benefits of a charity, or as a corporation sole."

The deceased, Captain Brassey, had no interest in the property, but it is said that other persons had such an interest, that it ceased on his death, and that by its cessation a benefit accrued to Hugo Brassey.

It was admitted for the Crown that, in order to bring the sub-section into operation, there must have been some living person who had an interest which ceased on the death of the deceased. Those first entitled on the death of Hugo Brassey were his issue, but at the date of Captain Brassey's death he had no issue, and it is admitted that, unless there had happened to be someone alive at that date with a more remote interest under the settlement, the Crown would have had no claim. But it so happened that there were three daughters of Captain Brassey who would ultimately have become entitled under the settlement if nothing occurred to defeat their rights. Those rights could have been defeated in a number of ways: first, by the exercise by Captain Brassey and Hugo Brassey of an overriding power under the settlement; secondly, by Hugo Brassey barring the entail; thirdly, by Hugo Brassey exercising his general power of appointment in default of issue; and, lastly, by Captain Brassey exercising a power of appointment by will. It was argued for the appellants that this made the sisters' rights so remote that they ought to be disregarded, but I cannot accept that argument. It was conceded that they had a vested right and whether the defeasance of that right was more or less likely cannot, in my judgment, be material. So it is necessary to see what the interest of the three sisters was. No doubt, they had an interest in the sense that, if nothing occurred to prevent them, they would in due course take beneficial rights under the settlement. It so happens that this interest did cease at the date of Captain Brassey's death, because he exercised his testamentary power of appointment. But the Crown's case is not based on that. Even if that were regarded as the cesser of an interest in the statutory sense, it would not bring the sub-section into operation because it had nothing to do with the benefit which accrued to Hugo Brassey and it is that benefit which the Crown is seeking to tax. The benefit to Hugo Brassey was the increase of his income when he became entitled to the money which had previously been required to pay the premiums, and he would have got that benefit on Captain Brassey's death whether Captain Brassey died testate or intestate or whether he exercised his power of appointment or not. The Crown's case is based on the cesser of quite a different interest which the sisters are said to have had during Captain Brassey's life. They are said to have had a "beneficial interest in possession" in the sums paid as premiums. The argument, as I understand it, is that on Captain Brassey's death payment of premiums ceased, and, therefore, this interest ceased also: the benefit to Hugo Brassey arose because the premiums were no longer payable, and, therefore, arose by the cesser of the sisters' interest in the premiums. Counsel for the respondents, in his lucid argument for the Crown, made it clear that he was not concerned with the sisters' right ultimately to come into enjoyment of anything under the settlement. He was only concerned with their right during Captain Brassey's life in relation to the money for the premiums, and he argued that this was a separate and independent right and that his case would have been just the same if Captain Brassey had not exercised his testamentary power of appointment and the sisters had retained their rights in remainder under the settlement after Captain Brassey's death. So the Crown's case depends on the right of tenants in remainder with regard to money for premiums being a separate and independent "interest" within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (b). The Act is an Act which applies to the United Kingdom, and the word "interest" is an ordinary word of the English language. So one ought not to give to the word a technical meaning peculiar to English or Scots law unless there is some indication that such a technical meaning is intended. I can find no such indication in this Act. The Act gives some assistance in determining what is meant by an "interest". Section 2 comes into operation if the property does not "pass" under s. 1. So an "interest" is some right with regard to the property, e.g., an annuity payable out of the income from it, which can cease without the property passing. Then a benefit to someone must accrue or arise by the cesser of the interest. That would be satisfied if, by reason of the cesser of the annuity, the person who previously got the income from the property less the amount necessary to pay the annuity now gets the whole income. It was argued for the appellants that there cannot be an interest within the meaning of the sub-section unless the person who had the interest before the death was actually enjoying something which ceased to be payable to him on the death and thereafter went to benefit someone else. In the ordinary case that would be so, but I do not think that it is necessary in this case to decide whether that must be so in every case. One can imagine a case in which a sum out of the income from the property is being accumulated during the life of A so that the benefit of the accumulations will later go to X. It might not be difficult then to say that X had an interest ceasing on A's death in the sums which were being accumulated. X would get the benefit of them ultimately and the longer A lived the more he would get. If that be so, it might be that, even if there were only a chance of X ever taking any benefit, X could still be regarded as having an interest. But the facts of this case are, to my mind, essentially different. In this case the real interest of the tenants in remainder was not in the premiums, but in the sums assured. Payment of the premiums was only a means to an end. The tenants in remainder lost nothing when the premiums ceased to be paid: on the contrary they gained by the addition of £40,000 to the capital. I find it very difficult to see how a person's "interest" in any real sense can cease unless by the cesser he loses something of actual or at least of potential value which he might have had if the deceased had lived longer. Whatever may have been the technical nature of the right of the tenants in remainder with regard to the premiums it was in substance only an ancillary right for the protection of their real interest which was to get in the £40,000. Once that interest required no further protection (because the money was paid) rights for its protection came to an end, but I cannot regard that as the cesser of an interest within the meaning of the Act. If this be right it is unnecessary to express any opinion about the decisions in Re Hodson's Settlement (1) and Westminster Bank, Ltd. v. A.-G. (2). In my judgment, this appeal should be allowed.

My noble and learned friend LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE is unable to be present this morning. He has asked me to say that he has read the speech which I have just delivered and that he agrees with it.

Appeal allowed.

Re A JUDGMENT SUMMONS (No. 25 of 1952).

Ex parte HENLYS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.),
January 12, 26, 1953.]

Debt—Committal—Bar to committal order—Extortion—Creditor requiring payment of costs of bankruptcy notice—Debtors Act, 1869 (c. 62), s. 5.

Creditors served a bankruptcy notice on the debtor in respect of a judgment debt amounting, with taxed costs, to £449. Negotiations ensued on the terms on which the notice should be withdrawn, and it was agreed inter alia that the debt should be repaid by instalments. When the first instalment was paid, the solicitors for the creditors insisted that in addition the debtor should bear certain costs, which they described as "additional costs of the bankruptcy notice", and also the costs of the arrangement under which payment by instalments was being made, and they claimed that £12 12s. be added to the debt. The debtor's solicitors reluctantly paid that amount in addition to the instalment. The debtor failed to maintain payment of the instalments and the creditors presented a bankruptcy petition against him. The petition was dismissed on the ground that the demand and payment of the additional £12 12s. was extortion. The creditors now applied for an order under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, committing the debtor to prison for his failure to pay the debt.

HELD: (i) notwithstanding s. 107 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (under which in certain circumstances the court may, on an application under s. 5 of the Act of 1869, make a receiving order against the debtor), procedure under s. 5 of the Act of 1869 was not available only in respect of a judgment or order on which the judgment creditors might have founded a petition in bankruptcy, and proceedings under s. 5 (until converted under s. 107 (4) of the Act of 1914) were wholly distinct from bankruptcy proceedings; as the dismissal of the petition did not extinguish the judgment debt, there was in existence a judgment under which a debt was due to the judgment creditors in the payment of which the debtor had made default within s. 5; and, accordingly, the court had jurisdiction to make an order under that section.

(ii) in exercising its discretion under s. 5 of the Act of 1869, the court was not constrained to refuse to entertain proceedings at the instance of the judgment creditors merely because the bankruptcy petition presented by them in respect of the same debt had been dismissed on the ground of extortion.

Decision of HARMAN, J. ([1952] 2 All E.R. 772), reversed.

APPEAL by creditors against an order of HARMAN, J., dated Oct. 20, 1952, and reported [1952] 2 All E.R. 772, dismissing a judgment summons.

HARMAN, J., held that the doctrine under which extortion operated as a bar to a bankruptcy petition applied equally in an application under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, and, the creditors having been guilty of extortion, the court, in the exercise of its discretion, should dismiss the application.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 26. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : I will ask JENKINS, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

The following judgments were read.

JENKINS, L.J. : The judgment debt in question had previously been the subject of abortive proceedings by the judgment creditors against the debtor in bankruptcy, and the issue in the appeal is, in effect, whether the judge was right in holding, as he did, that, in view of the course and outcome of those proceedings, he ought not, in the exercise of his discretion, to entertain the judgment creditors' application under the Debtors Act, 1869, in respect of the same debt.

C

The judgment to which the summons relates was dated Apr. 25, 1951, and remained wholly unsatisfied on Nov. 16, 1951, when a bankruptcy notice in respect of it was served by the judgment creditors on the debtor. The service of this bankruptcy notice was followed by negotiations between the parties, the upshot of which was that the judgment creditors agreed to withdraw it on terms that the debtor should pay £100 forthwith and the balance of the debt by monthly instalments of £50 payable on Dec. 1, 1951, and thereafter on the first day of each calendar month until the whole amount was satisfied. These terms were offered on behalf of the judgment creditors by a letter from their solicitors to the debtor's solicitors dated Nov. 20, 1951, which concluded:

"If your client accepts the proposition we shall be glad to receive cash for £100 or a draft or your cheque by return, and confirmation that the monthly arrangement will be adhered to."

This offer of the terms I have mentioned was accepted on behalf of the debtor by his solicitors on the following day (Nov. 21, 1951) both orally and by a letter enclosing their cheque for the initial payment of £100. On Nov. 22, 1951, the judgment creditors' solicitors replied acknowledging the debtor's solicitors' cheque and insisting on the introduction into the bargain embodied in the two earlier letters of the following new term:

"We must also insist that our additional costs of the bankruptcy notice and these arrangements be paid by your client, and as we have had to instruct Messrs. Flowerdews to serve and we have incurred expense thereby in addition to the expense of preparing and issuing the bankruptcy notice and the subsequent correspondence with you, our costs will be £12 12s. which must be added to the amount of the debt."

To this new demand the debtor's solicitors replied on Nov. 23, 1951, enclosing the £12 12s. with the following comment:

"... as our client cannot afford to commit an act of bankruptcy or run the risk of having a bankruptcy petition presented against him it is with great reluctance that we enclose you cash for the £12 12s. demanded by you in the last paragraph of your letter."

In the course of the hearing before us it was argued (though, perhaps, somewhat faintly) on behalf of the judgment creditors that, inasmuch as the agreement for payment of the debt by instalments was concluded before the demand for the £12 12s. costs was made, the payment of that sum by the debtor was a purely voluntary payment forming no part of the conditions on which the bankruptcy notice of Nov. 16, 1951, was withdrawn. I cannot accept this argument. It is plain from the debtor's solicitors' letter of Nov. 23 that they regarded the debtor as having no option but to comply with the demand for the £12 12s. if he was to stave off the prospect of being after all made bankrupt on a petition by the judgment creditors. It is also plain from the peremptory terms of the demand for the £12 12s. contained in their letter of Nov. 22, that this was precisely the impression which the judgment creditors' solicitors intended to produce, or, in other words, that they were using the threat of bankruptcy proceedings based on the notice of Nov. 16 as a means of exacting payment of the £12 12s. The threat having been successfully applied, it can hardly lie in the mouths of the judgment creditors to say that the payment was a purely voluntary payment on the part of the debtor, inasmuch as the threat was an empty one which could not have been carried into execution in view of the agreement previously reached for payment of the debt by instalments. It may be that this agreement, which outside bankruptcy would have been a mere nudum pactum from which the judgment creditors could have resiled at any time, might have been relied on by the debtor as a compounding for the judgment debt to the satisfaction of the judgment creditors within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 2, and as constituting, accordingly, a compliance with the notice of Nov. 16, but it was clearly not so treated by either side when the additional demand for the £12 12s. was made and acceded to, and if the point had been raised at the time on behalf of the debtor it would, I think, have been at least open to argument. In my view, therefore, the matter must be judged on the footing that as a condition of withdrawing the bankruptcy notice of Nov. 16 the judgment creditors exacted from the debtor £12 12s. in respect of costs which were not lawfully due from him.

The debtor failed to pay the instalment of £50 due on Jan. 1, 1952, and the judgment creditors served on him a second bankruptcy notice in respect of that amount, erroneously described as the balance of the judgment. The debtor complied with this notice, but once more failed to pay the instalment due on Feb. 1, on which second default the judgment creditors served on him a third bankruptcy notice in respect of the whole balance of the judgment debt and costs. The debtor failed to comply with this third notice, and a bankruptcy petition founded on such failure was presented against him by the judgment creditors. The petition was resisted on the part of the debtor on the ground that the exaction of the £12 12s. costs as a condition of the withdrawal of the first bankruptcy notice amounted to "extortion" within the meaning of the authorities hereinafter referred to, and, therefore, in accordance with those authorities, disqualified the judgment creditors from founding a bankruptcy petition on the debt to which the offending bargain related. This objection was upheld by the registrar, who on May 2, 1952, dismissed the petition with costs. The papers before us include no note of the registrar's reasons for his decision, but it is not in dispute that this was the ground on which he proceeded.

The rule applied by the registrar is well-established so far as proceedings in bankruptcy are concerned. There have been numerous decisions bearing on it, but I only find it necessary to refer to two of them. In Re Shaw. Ex p. Gill (1) a creditor had fraudulently proposed to the debtor that he (the creditor) should consent to a composition offered by the debtor to his creditors, the debtor secretly paying him the balance of his debt. This fraudulent scheme was rejected by the debtor, and thus frustrated. It was, nevertheless, held in the Court of Appeal (reversing a decision of the Divisional Court) that the creditor who had made the dishonest proposal (albeit without success) had by his conduct disqualified himself from presenting a petition founded on the act of bankruptcy constituted by the debtor's declaration of his insolvency at the meeting of creditors at which the composition had been offered, such conduct constituting "sufficient cause" for refusing a receiving order within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 7 (3). The petition had been presented jointly by the offending creditor and an innocent one, but, inasmuch as the debt owing to each of them taken alone was below the statutory minimum of £50, the innocent creditor could only succeed if the offending creditor was entitled to do so. The facts in Re Shaw (1) were, of course, widely different from those in the present case, but the following passages from the judgment of RIGBY, L.J., are of assistance (83 L.T. 755):

"The question therefore, and I think the sole question in substance in this appeal, is whether the other creditor, Gill, has so conducted himself that he has no right in accordance with the rule in bankruptcy to avail himself of an act of bankruptcy committed on July 23, 1899, that act of bankruptcy being a declaration of insolvency made at a meeting of creditors, or whether he has, within the meaning of cases that have already been decided or according to the principle on which those cases have been decided, precluded himself from relying upon that act of bankruptcy. Now, it was admitted, and could not be denied, that if a creditor goes to his debtor and says: 'You owe me so much, I can proceed in bankruptcy against you; you will not like that; pay me something extortionate, something altogether beyond what you owe me at law, or I will file a petition,' that petition cannot be made the basis of a receiving order; and very properly, for though the petition itself will only be that which is within the right, so far as there is a right, of a creditor, and will only have the effect of distributing the property according to the rules of bankruptcy, yet the previous conduct of the creditor would make it plain that he was using, or attempting to use, the bankruptcy proceedings as the means of unduly extorting what was not due to him . . . Now, the fact of the proposed fraud is not in any way denied, but certain suggestions are made which I must altogether repudiate. I am not going in any way to assume that because a man has proposed or even carried out a fraud he is to be deprived of rights which he has at law in general. I do not suggest that PHILLIMORE, J., was rather hasty in using the word 'outlaw'; but no one proposes to make the person concerned an outlaw at all. The only question is whether, after what he did under the circumstances in which he did it, he has a right to present a petition against Shaw founded on an act of bankruptcy committed at the meeting of July 23, or, perhaps I may add, whether he can give any further right than he would have had to Sutcliffe, the other petitioner. I say he could not . . . It is not necessary to bring the case within that doctrine that the petition should actually have been presented at the time the fraud is attempted. If in the same transaction the fraud has been attempted, I think that a debt which has been used as a means of extortion cannot afterwards be made use of as a means of getting a receiving order. That being so, I do not think we have any discretion but to reverse the decision of the Divisional Court and to restore matters to the position in which they were left by the registrar when he refused to make a receiving order."

Somewhat nearer in its facts to those of the present case is the case in this court of Re Debtor (No. 883 of 1927) (2). There the petitioning creditors had obtained judgment against the debtor for £500 and costs in respect of a dishonoured cheque. They had also obtained judgment with costs against other parties in related litigation for which last mentioned costs the debtor was plainly in no way liable. The petitioning creditors presented a bankruptcy petition against the debtor founded on his non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice in respect of the judgment for £500 and costs. Negotiations ensued, in the course of which the petitioning creditors offered to consent to the dismissal of their petition on terms that the debtor should pay £100 in reduction of the judgment debt of £500, should provide the guarantee of a specified individual in respect of the balance, and should pay as between solicitor and client the whole of the costs, not only of the action against him, but also of the related action against other parties, the amount of all such costs being put at £160. The debtor did not accede to the whole of these demands, but he did make payments on account of £50 and £144 15s. 4d., of which latter sum £94 15s. 4d. was in respect of solicitor and client costs, so that £100 only out of these two payments went in reduction of the judgment debt of £500. Agreement was later reached for payment of the balance of £400 by instalments, but the debtor made default in payment of the instalments agreed, and the petitioning creditors served a further bankruptcy notice and presented a further petition in respect of the balance of the debt. This second petition was opposed on behalf of the debtor on the ground that the petitioning creditors' demands for the payment by him as between solicitor and client of costs for which he was only liable as between party and party, and for the payment by him as between solicitor and client of costs for which he was not liable at all, amounted to extortion. It should be noted that while the costs actually extracted from the debtor in excess of the amount properly due came in the result to only £15, being the difference between solicitor and client and party and party costs of the action against him, the petitioning creditors had attempted to make him pay in respect of costs no less than £160 as compared with a legitimate claim amounting to no more than some £80. The court upheld the debtor's objection.

In the course of the judgments the earlier authorities, including Re Shaw (1), were reviewed. LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said ([1928] Ch. 206):

"As I have already said, the debtor ought to be made a bankrupt, and in the ordinary course the receiving order would have been a perfectly right order to be made by the registrar; but there is a principle which must be jealously guarded—namely, that the process of the Bankruptcy Court must not be abused. A number of cases have established that. In Re Otway. Ex p. Otway (3) the petitioning creditor endeavoured to obtain £25 from a debtor as a condition for agreeing to adjournment of the petition. The attempt failed; but although the petitioning creditor did not succeed the court held that he had attempted to extort money from the debtor for his own purposes, and it declined to allow him to have the advantage of using the process of the court in bankruptcy against the debtor. That is a case where an unsuccessful attempt was made, and yet the creditor was debarred from making use of bankruptcy proceedings . . . It is said here that all that was done was that some £15 was obtained from the debtor in respect of costs which he did not owe, costs which were the difference between party and party costs and solicitor and client costs. That is not an accurate way of putting it; the attempt was to obtain not only those costs but also a further sum of £160 in respect of costs which the debtor had no concern with at all. The whole principle of bankruptcy is that when an act of bankruptcy has been committed there shall be a fair distribution between all the creditors, and it is for that reason that the title of the trustee relates back to the earliest act of bankruptcy; and thus where in Ex p. Edwards. Re Chapman (4) payments were made as the price of an adjournment to the petitioning creditor's solicitor, and he paid them away to the petitioning creditor and agreed to the adjournment, he was held liable to replace the money, as what had been done gave an advantage to the particular creditor, which would not be shared on the basis of equality in bankruptcy proceedings."

Finally, he said (ibid., 209):

"In these circumstances, it appears to be quite impossible that the court should allow the misuse of its procedure by saying that a receiving order ought to be made in this case. The case falls within the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 5 (3), as being one where the court is satisfied that for sufficient cause no order ought to be made."

SARGANT, L.J., said (ibid.):

A "I now come to what appears to me to be the ground on which the appeal succeeds. It relates to the action of the petitioning creditor in obtaining a sum of £15 in excess of the costs to which he was legally entitled, and, what is much more important, the attempt to obtain £160 for costs as between solicitor and client in respect of a matter for which the debtor was in no way liable. To my mind, that was a demand which comes within the B phrase 'extortion', as it has been used in the cases to which the Master of the Rolls has referred and to which I will not refer again . . . To my mind the attempt to obtain so large a sum as £160 for costs due from some other person for which the debtor could not by any stretch of imagination be deemed to be personally liable, was a very strong instance of an attempt to use bankruptcy proceedings—the threat of bankruptcy—for the purpose
C of obtaining a collateral advantage unconnected with the bankruptcy for the benefit of the petitioning creditor. It is said that the possible defect in the proceedings was cured, because the petition on which adjudication was asked for was a subsequent petition commenced after the sum of £15 had been provided and the demand for £160 refused. To my mind, looking at the facts in this case, I think there is such a connection between the two petitions by the same creditor against the same debtor, with the debt alleged in the second petition increased by the treatment of this sum of £15 as part of D what was due and remained due from the debtor, that the circumstance that the material petition is a subsequent petition and not the original petition makes no real difference. The petition seems to me to be tainted just as in Re Shaw (1), and to a very aggravated extent, having regard to the large amount of the sum sought to be added to the liability of the debtor."

E LAWRENCE, L.J., said (ibid., 211):

"It cannot, in my opinion, be too clearly understood that bankruptcy proceedings, which are in their nature quasi criminal, must not be used for the purpose of obtaining a collateral advantage. An attempt to do so, even though unsuccessful, will be sufficient to disentitle a petitioning creditor to F an order, and, therefore, the fact that in the present case the debtor refused to pay the costs of the Sherbourne Trust, Ltd., and that that demand was not insisted upon, does not absolve the petitioning creditors from the consequences of having made that demand. The principle upon which the court acts in these cases is that it treats a demand of this nature as evidence that bankruptcy proceedings were taken not with the bona fide intention of G obtaining adjudication but for some collateral purpose."

It may be observed that the bargains held "extortionate" in Re Shaw (1) and Re Debtor (2) both had reprehensible features going far beyond anything to be found in the present case, the former involving actual fraud and the latter a demand for costs which could not unfairly be characterised as "extortionate" in the ordinary sense of the expression. The bargain in the present case was not H fraudulent, nor, viewed without regard to the authorities, could it, to my mind, fairly be described as "extortionate" in the ordinary sense. That is not to say, however, that it may not have been in a technical sense "extortionate" within the meaning attributed to that expression by the authorities, and as such obnoxious to the well-established rule. For the present purpose I find it unnecessary to express any concluded opinion one way or another on this aspect of the case. The registrar held in the bankruptcy proceedings that the bargain here in question did infringe the rule. There has been no appeal from his decision, and for the purposes of the present proceedings between the same parties it must, in my view, be taken as conclusively established that the bargain was extortionate within the meaning of the rule, and, accordingly, had the effect of disqualifying the judgment creditors from taking any proceedings in bankruptcy founded on the debt to which it related.

On the dismissal of their petition on the ground of "extortion", the judgment creditors procured the issue of the summons under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, to which the present appeal relates, in respect of the unpaid balance of their judgment debt. Before HARMAN, J., what was called a preliminary objection to the jurisdiction of the court was taken on behalf of the debtor, to the effect that the dismissal of the judgment creditors' petition on the ground of extortion, which disqualified them from presenting any further petition in respect of the same debt, deprived the court of jurisdiction to entertain at their instance a summons under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, in respect of the debt in question. The formal order of Oct. 20, 1952, recites the preliminary objection to the jurisdiction, declares the court to "uphold the said preliminary objection", and dismisses the summons. This is unfortunate, for the judge, while deciding in favour of the debtor, was at pains to explain in his judgment that he did so, not as a matter of jurisdiction, but as a matter of discretion. The concluding paragraph of his judgment is in these terms ([1952] 2 All E.R. 775):

"It seems to me that I am bound to hold that this act [the demand and the receipt of the £12 12s.] is one of which the court of bankruptcy, in its bankruptcy jurisdiction, would disapprove. It seems to me that I ought logically to exercise the jurisdiction under s. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, in the same sense and to hold that the vice which would debar a petition in bankruptcy also bars a judgment summons. In that case, it is not, I think, that I have no jurisdiction to make this order, as it was submitted to me, but that, in the exercise of my discretion, guided by the analogy of the bankruptcy authorities which are binding on me, I ought to hold that this is a relief to which the creditors have disentitled themselves, and I so hold. I, therefore, dismiss the summons."

Earlier in his judgment he had discussed the bankruptcy rule in regard to "extortion", and expressed agreement with the registrar's view that the demanding of the £12 12s. amounted to "extortion" within the meaning of the rule, while acquitting the judgment creditors or their solicitors of any "moral obloquy" in the matter. I think the judge was right in holding that the so-called "preliminary objection" went to the discretion, not the jurisdiction of the court, and before us the argument on behalf of the debtor was mainly directed to the question of discretion. But in view of the form of the order, and as both aspects of the case were canvassed in the course of the hearing of the appeal, I think I should deal with both in this judgment.

The alleged want of jurisdiction, in my view, clearly cannot be substantiated. The Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, provides:

"Subject to the provisions hereinafter mentioned, and to the prescribed rules, any court may commit to prison for a term not exceeding six weeks, or until payment of the sum due, any person who makes default in payment of any debt or instalment of any debt due from him in pursuance of any order or judgment of . . . any . . . competent court. Provided . . . (2) That such jurisdiction shall only be exercised where it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that the person making default either has or has had since the date of the order or judgment the means to pay the sum in respect of which he has made default, and has refused or neglected, or refuses or neglects, to pay the same. Proof of the means of the person making default may be given in such manner as the court thinks just; and for the purposes of such proof the debtor and any witnesses may be summoned and examined on oath, according to the prescribed rules . . . For the purposes of this section any court may direct any debt due from any person in pursuance of any order or judgment of . . . any . . . competent court to be paid by instalments, and may from time to time rescind or vary such order."

A The dismissal of the petition on the ground of extortion plainly did not have the effect of extinguishing the judgment debt, but merely disqualified the judgment creditors from presenting a bankruptcy petition founded on it. They still had a valid unsatisfied judgment in respect of which they could have proved in any bankruptcy of the debtor brought about by the petition of some creditor other than themselves, and outside bankruptcy they could still avail themselves of any remedy in the way of execution against the property of the debtor open to them as unsatisfied judgment creditors. It follows, in my view, that at the time when the summons was issued, and at the time when it came before the judge, there was still in existence an effective judgment in pursuance of which a debt was due from the debtor to the judgment creditors, and in payment of which debt the debtor had made default, within the meaning of s. 5 of the Act of 1869. Prima facie, therefore, the judge had jurisdiction under the Act, if he thought fit to do so, to make an instalment order, and also (subject to proof to his satisfaction of the debtor's means to pay in accordance with proviso (2) to s. 5) to make an order for committal.

C The main argument against this conclusion consists in the contention that the procedure under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, is only available in respect of a judgment or order on which the judgment creditor might have founded a petition in bankruptcy, and that, in view of the dismissal on the ground of extortion of the petition founded on the present judgment debt, and its consequent disqualification as the foundation of any subsequent petition in bankruptcy by the judgment creditors, the judgment debt here in question does not answer that description. This contention turns on the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 107 (4), which provides:

F "Where, under s. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, application is made by a judgment creditor to a court having bankruptcy jurisdiction for the committal of a judgment debtor, the court may, if it thinks fit, decline to commit, and in lieu thereof, with the consent of the judgment creditor and on payment by him of the prescribed fee, make a receiving order against the debtor. In such case the judgment debtor shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy at the time the order is made, and the provisions of this Act except Part VII thereof shall apply as if for references to the presentation of a petition by or against a person there were substituted references to the making of such a receiving order."

H According to the argument I am now stating, this provision has the effect of confining the operation of s. 5 of the Act of 1869 to cases in which, independently of s. 107 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, a receiving order might have been made at the instance of the judgment creditor if he had proceeded by way of petition in bankruptcy and not by way of summons under s. 5 of the Act of 1869. I do not agree. In the first place, I think the words "may, if it thinks fit" in s. 107 (4) are wide enough to enable the court to have regard to all relevant circumstances, including the question whether the debt is one on which a bankruptcy petition might properly have been founded, and that the sub-section is, therefore, not incompatible with the position that there may be some debts which can properly be made the subject of proceedings under s. 5 of the Act of 1869 although they would not have been available for the purpose of founding a bankruptcy petition. Secondly, non constat that the power conferred by s. 107 (4) is limited to cases in which a receiving order could have been made independently of that provision: see Re Clark: Ex p. Clark (5). Thirdly, I am not satisfied that the disqualification of a judgment creditor on the ground of "extortion" from presenting a bankruptcy petition founded on a given judgment debt would necessarily preclude the court from making a receiving order in lieu of committal on a summons under the Debtors Act, 1869, issued on his application in respect of the same debt, for such a receiving order is made by the court of its own motion in the interests of the debtor (see Re Clark (5)) and not at the instance of the judgment creditor, although it can only be made with his consent. Finally, this argument seems to me inconsistent with Re Otway. Ex p. Otway (6) where it was held that an order for payment of alimony pendente lite could be the subject of proceedings under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, although the sum ordered to be paid was not a judgment debt in respect of which a receiving order could be made under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 103 (5) (corresponding to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 107 (4)).

A further argument, which, perhaps, goes to the discretion rather than to the jurisdiction of the court, is to the effect that an application under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, is a form of proceeding in bankruptcy, and that the court would stultify itself if, after disqualifying a judgment creditor from presenting a bankruptcy petition on the ground of extortion, it admitted the same creditor to a different form of relief in bankruptcy in respect of the same debt. It is, no doubt, true that there are certain administrative links between the two forms of proceeding. The jurisdiction of the High Court under s. 5 of the Act of 1869 (except in relation to orders of the Divorce Division) is assigned to the judge in bankruptcy. The Bankruptcy Rules include provisions in regard to proceedings under the Act of 1869, and proceedings under that Act may be converted into proceedings in bankruptcy by an order under s. 107 (4) of the Act of 1914. On the other hand, the jurisdiction under s. 5 of the Act of 1869 with respect to orders of the Divorce Division is assigned to that Division, which, of course, has no jurisdiction in bankruptcy, and there are county courts without jurisdiction in bankruptcy to which jurisdiction under s. 5 of the Act of 1869 is nevertheless assigned. Moreover, unless and until converted into bankruptcy proceedings properly so called by an order under s. 107 (4) of the Act of 1914, proceedings under s. 5 of the Act of 1869 are wholly distinct and different from bankruptcy proceedings properly so-called in nature, object and effect, and I see no sufficient reason in the administrative links to which I have referred for holding that circumstances held sufficient to disqualify a creditor from maintaining the latter should automatically also disqualify him from maintaining the former. In my view, therefore, the objection based on jurisdiction fails.

As to the submission that the judge was right to refuse to entertain the summons in the exercise of his discretion, I have no doubt that the jurisdiction under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, is discretionary, nor would I dispute that there may be cases in which the conduct of a judgment creditor has been such as to make it right for the court in the exercise of its discretion to refuse him any assistance under that section, but the proposition here is, in effect, that whenever it is shown that the judgment creditor has presented a bankruptcy petition in respect of the same debt and such petition has been dismissed on the ground that he has been guilty of "extortionate" conduct in the sense in which that expression is used in the authorities above referred to, or, indeed, whenever the court is apprised of conduct on the part of the judgment creditor which would in bankruptcy proceedings have been held to amount to extortion in that sense, the court ought in the exercise of its discretion to refuse his summons under s. 5 of the Act of 1869 without considering whether the conduct in question was in fact such as to make it unfair, oppressive, or unconscionable to allow him to proceed under that section. This proposition seems to me untenable. As I have said, the two forms of proceeding are wholly different in nature, object and effect. The object of proceedings in bankruptcy is to make the debtor's assets available for rateable distribution amongst his creditors. No creditor is entitled to have recourse to such proceedings for the purpose of obtaining some collateral advantage for himself. Moreover, the threat of bankruptcy, with the deprivation of property and status which it involves, may be a potent instrument of oppression and of "extortion" in no mere technical sense. These, in effect, are the considerations dwelt on in the authorities to which I have referred, and they amply account for the strictness of the rule against "extortion" which has been laid down and firmly maintained by the courts in bankruptcy, and for the penalty for breach of that rule which it has been found necessary to provide in the shape of disqualification from founding any subsequent bankruptcy proceedings on any debt in relation to which a charge of "extortionate" conduct has been made

To proceedings under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, wholly different considerations apply. In such proceedings the questions for the court are in effect: (i) Is there a judgment or order against this debtor for the payment of money in respect of which he is in default? If so, (ii) Has he now or has he since the date of the judgment or order had means to pay the amount in respect of which he is in default? If so, (iii) Has he refused or neglected, or does he now refuse or neglect, to pay such amount? And finally, (iv) Given affirmative answers to the three preceding questions, is there any sufficient reason why he should not be committed to prison by way of punishment for such refusal or neglect? In practice, the court in the first instance almost invariably makes an order for payment by instalments estimated to be within the means of the debtor and only proceeds to committal in the event of the debtor refusing or neglecting to pay the instalments and being proved to have, or to have had at the relevant time, the means to pay them. It is, no doubt, true that from the judgment creditor's point of view the summons affords a means of enforcing payment of his debt, but in law the issue is not whether the court should take measures to enforce payment of the debt for the benefit of the judgment creditor, but whether (on proof of means and default) the judgment debtor merits punishment in the form of committal for his refusal or neglect to comply with the judgment or order. The function of the judgment creditor is to bring the facts to the notice of the court. Once that is done, the issue is between the court and the debtor.

That being, as I understand it, the nature of proceedings under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, why should the court be constrained, in the exercise of its discretion under the section, to refuse to entertain such proceedings at the instance of a judgment creditor merely because a bankruptcy petition presented by him in respect of the same debt has been, or, in the view of the court, would have been, dismissed on the ground of "extortion" in the sense in which that expression is used in the bankruptcy cases? There is certainly nothing in the cases to suggest that the disqualification consequent on "extortionate" conduct extends beyond proceedings in bankruptcy, so as to apply to proceedings of a wholly different nature, such as those under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, or that any conduct which would be deemed "extortionate" in bankruptcy should by analogy disqualify a judgment creditor from making any application under that section. I see no sufficient reason for such extension or analogous application and reject it as unwarranted by principle or authority.

It should be borne in mind that, as appears from the cases to which I have referred, and, indeed, from the present case, there may be "extortionate" conduct in the bankruptcy sense even though the collateral benefit obtained is trifling in comparison with the amount of the debt, and, what is more, even though there was no more than an attempt at "extortion" which in fact resulted in no advantage at all.

If the court is bound in the exercise of its discretion under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, to treat the existence of a disqualification in relation to proceedings in bankruptcy (actual or potential) on account of "extortionate" conduct on the part of the judgment creditor as extending to proceedings under that section, the extraordinary result would ensue that a judgment debtor summoned under s. 5 could say to the court (in effect): "It is true that there is an unsatisfied judgment against me for £500; it is true that I have ample means to pay, but I do not choose to pay, and you, in the exercise of your discretion, must not order me to pay or commit me to prison for not doing so, because the judgment creditor served me with a bankruptcy notice in respect of this debt, and offered to withdraw it on my undertaking to pay in addition to the debt £25 for costs for which I was not legally liable. In fact, I gave no such undertaking, and paid him nothing, but the bankruptcy petition founded on that notice, which he later presented, was dismissed on the ground that his offer amounted to extortionate conduct. You must, therefore, let me go scot free." To bring the example nearer home, the registrar's decision in the present case should in principle have been the same, and, on the view of the matter taken by the judge, he would (as he himself in effect recognised) have been equally constrained to dismiss the summons in the exercise of his discretion if the £12 12s. had been merely demanded and never, in fact, paid. In the absence of authority requiring me to do so, I decline to subscribe to a view of the law which is capable of producing such results. A B

For the reasons I have endeavoured to state, I think the judge was wrong in holding, as I understand him to have done, that the mere fact that there had been conduct on the part of the judgment creditors which amounted to extortion within the meaning of the bankruptcy rule obliged him to exercise his discretion adversely to them. I would, therefore, allow the appeal and remit the case to the judge in bankruptcy to be dealt with on the merits. What account (if any) should be taken of the £12 12s. (e.g., by deducting it from the unpaid balance of the judgment for the purposes of any instalment order made) is entirely a matter for him, as to which I say nothing. C

MORRIS, L.J.: For the purposes of the present appeal it can be assumed, though it need not be decided, that the demand which was made for £12 12s., which was in fact followed by the payment of that sum, should be regarded as an "extortion" within the meaning of that word as it has been used in bankruptcy law when considering whether a receiving order should be made. D

The Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 5 (3), provides that:

"If the court is not satisfied with the proof of the petitioning creditor's debt, or of the act of bankruptcy, or of the service of the petition, or is satisfied by the debtor that he is able to pay his debts, or that for other sufficient cause no order ought to be made, the court may dismiss the petition." E

In Re Debtor (2) it was held that there would be sufficient cause to satisfy the court that no receiving order ought to be made if extortion amounting to an abuse of the process of the court was shown to have taken place or to have been attempted. LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said ([1928] Ch. 206): F

"... but there is a principle which must be jealously guarded—namely, that the process of the bankruptcy court must not be abused. A number of cases have established that. In Re Otway (3) the petitioning creditor endeavoured to obtain £25 from a debtor as a condition for agreeing to adjournment of the petition. The attempt failed; but although the petitioning creditor did not succeed the court held that he had attempted to extort money from the debtor for his own purposes, and it declined to allow him to have the advantage of using the process of the court in bankruptcy against the debtor. That is a case where an unsuccessful attempt was made, and yet the creditor was debarred from making use of bankruptcy proceedings." G H

In the earlier case of Re Shaw (1), RIGBY, L.J., said (83 L.T. 755):

"If in the same transaction the fraud has been attempted, I think that a debt which has been used as a means of extortion cannot afterwards be made use of as a means of getting a receiving order."

Though in the present case the judge negatived any conclusion that the demand made involved any moral obloquy, I proceed on the assumption that the court would not make a receiving order based on a petition in respect of the debt owing to the creditors. But the debtor, who does not contend that any merits march with the point he takes, submits that because the debt has been used as a means of what the Bankruptcy Court has felt obliged to regard as an "extortion", the court should not afterwards allow such a debt to be the basis of an application under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5. It is, apparently, further submitted that the court will not lend its aid for the recovery of the debt by any means which can only be invoked by leave of the court. This seems to me to involve some sort of notion that the debt has become tainted for all occasions when the contact of the court with it demands any exercise of discretion. But the debt represents the balance of what the court has adjudged to be due, and the concern of the court must be to assist a creditor to obtain just satisfaction by all proper means. Because those who acted for the creditors, all unwittingly (as the judge held), brought about the position that a bankruptcy petition could not now successfully be presented, is the court to be fettered in coming to a conclusion on an application under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5 ? Though the judge did not uphold a contention that he had no jurisdiction, he did hold, as I read his judgment, that he was obliged to refuse relief. He said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 775):

"... it is not, I think, that I have no jurisdiction to make this order, as it was submitted to me, but that, in the exercise of my discretion, guided by the analogy of the bankruptcy authorities which are binding on me, I ought to hold that this is a relief to which the creditors have disintituled themselves, and I so hold. I, therefore, dismiss the summons."

The view formed by the judge made it unnecessary for him to hear evidence as to whether the debtor had or had had since the judgment the means to pay the debt due from him. If the judge had been satisfied that there had been wilful default on the part of the debtor, yet he would have felt obliged to decline to make an order.

It is common ground that the point now raised is a novel one and that there is no reported authority on the subject. That being so, it seems to me that there is nothing which precludes the creditors from invoking the procedure of the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, and nothing which need fetter or limit or pre-dispose the exercise by the court of the discretion vested in it by s. 5 when all the evidence is available and examined and when all the facts and circumstances are considered.

It was not suggested that the creditors will be denied such a remedy as the issue of a writ of fieri facias. It seems to me to be strange and illogical if the creditors may have the general assistance of the court but must inevitably be denied it in any form which may require the active exercise of a discretion. Though the court will jealously and zealously guard against any abuse of process, and though the creditors have placed themselves by their own action in difficulties so far as the court of bankruptcy is concerned, yet a debt remains which the court has adjudged to be due and the court must be concerned to see that there is no wilful and deliberate failure or refusal to comply with its orders. I can see no let or hindrance to the operation of and the applicability of the Debtors Act, 1869, and I am not persuaded that reasoning compels the view that the creditors have disintituled themselves from having a judgment summons heard. I would, therefore, allow the appeal.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. : I also am of the same opinion. For the reasons which have been stated by my brethren, I do not think, by reason of the procedural affinity which exists between bankruptcy proceedings, on the one hand, and proceedings under the Debtors Act, 1869, on the other, including the terms of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 107 (4), that where circumstances exist which would be regarded as extortion in bankruptcy proceedings, and would, accordingly, disqualify the petitioning creditors from obtaining a receiving order in respect of their debt, it, therefore, follows that the jurisdiction of the court under the Debtors Act, 1869, must be exercised by refusing relief to the petitioning creditors in respect of the same debt. I also agree with JENKINS, L.J., that the question whether the £12 12s. ought or ought not wholly or in part to be deducted from the amount of the debt now owing for any purpose is a matter for the discretion of the judge when the present summons comes to be re-heard. I think the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

LONDON & COUNTRY COMMERCIAL PROPERTY INVESTMENTS, LTD. v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), January 16, 20, 21, 22, 23, 1953.]

Money—Borrowing—Treasury control—Issue of shares and debenture stock in consideration of sale of land—Borrowing (Control and Guarantees) Act, 1946 (c. 58), s. 4 (2) (a)—Control of Borrowing Order, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 945), art. 2 (1).

L., Ltd., agreed to sell to a property company, and the property company agreed to purchase, freehold and leasehold properties described in the schedule to the agreement. The consideration for the sale was the issue by the property company to L., Ltd., of (a) 400,000 ordinary shares of £1 each in the capital of the property company credited as fully paid up, and (b) £750,000 debenture stock of the property company to be constituted and secured by a trust deed. The trust deed provided that as and when the stock or any part thereof ought to be redeemed or satisfied in accordance with the conditions indorsed on the stock certificates as set out in the schedule thereto, or on such earlier date as the security thereby constituted should become enforceable as thereafter provided, the property company would pay to the trustees the principal amount of the stock which ought to be redeemed or satisfied, together with such premium thereon as might be payable in accordance with the said conditions, and would in the meantime pay to the trustees interest on the stock for the time being outstanding at the rate of five per cent. per annum half-yearly. Further, by the trust deed the property company mortgaged to the trustees the properties the subject of the transaction as security for the service of the stock, and granted a floating charge over the undertaking, the property, and the assets for the time being of the property company.

HELD: the transaction was not the "borrowing of money" within the Borrowing (Control and Guarantees) Act, 1946, s. 4 (2) (a), or within the Control of Borrowing Order, 1947, art. 2 (1), because it was not a transaction which had a cash consideration that was allowed to remain unpaid.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS under R.S.C., Ord. 54A, r. 1A, to determine whether, on the true construction of the Borrowing (Control and Guarantees) Act, 1946, and the Control of Borrowing Order, 1947, made thereunder, the plaintiff company, London & Country Commercial Property Investments, Ltd., was entitled, without the consent of the Treasury, to issue 400,000 ordinary shares of £1 each and £750,000 debenture stock by way of consideration for the acquisition by the company of certain freehold and leasehold properties without contravening any provision of the said order within the meaning of para. 1 of the schedule to the Act.

London, Q.C., and K. B. Suenson-Taylor for the plaintiffs.

Denys B. Buckley for the Attorney-General.

UPJOHN, J.: This is a summons under R.S.C., Ord. 54A, seeking the construction of the Borrowing (Control and Guarantees) Act, 1946, and the Control of Borrowing Order, 1947, which was made under the powers conferred on the Treasury by the Act. The Act and the order provide that certain financial transactions can only be carried out with Treasury approval and the question I have to consider is whether a proposed transaction does require Treasury approval on the true construction of the Act and the order. If a transaction where Treasury approval is required is carried out without such approval, then serious penalties are imposed by the Act. Large fines may be imposed and on indictment imprisonment up to a maximum of two years may be inflicted on the offender, but it is expressly provided that the legal rights of the parties under any prohibited transaction are not to be affected. I, therefore, had serious doubts whether this court ought to exercise the powers which it undoubtedly has under Ord. 54A of making a declaration as to the rights of the parties, for that is a matter which must ultimately be tested in the criminal courts. However, counsel for the Attorney-General says that in the view of the Attorney-General this is a point of some general importance and he has no objection to my determining the matter. In those circumstances, although the parties must recognise that my decision will not be binding on any criminal court, I think it right to entertain this application.

The proposed transaction is quite simple. There are necessarily a number of blanks in the proposed agreement, but I think the right course is for me to treat it as though it was an actual agreement and consider whether, on the footing that it is an actual agreement, it infringes the provisions of the Act and the order. The agreement, then, is made between Littlewoods Mail Order Stores, Ltd., defined in the agreement as Littlewoods, and I shall so refer to them, of the first part; the plaintiff company, defined therein as the property company, and I shall refer to the plaintiff company as the property company, of the second part; the Alliance Assurance Co., Ltd., referred to as the trustee company, of the third part; and the companies whose names, with the addresses of their registered offices, are set forth in the first and second columns respectively of sched. I, called the purchasing companies, of the several other parts. I do not think I need read any part of the recital. The operative parts are as follows:

"1. Littlewoods hereby agree to sell and the property company hereby agrees to purchase for the consideration mentioned in cl. 2 hereof" certain freehold and leasehold properties which were described in sched. II to the agreement. Clause 2 is the vital paragraph:

"The consideration for the said sale shall be the issue by the property company to Littlewoods or its nominee or nominees of (a) 400,000 ordinary shares of £1 each in the capital of the property company credited as fully paid up and (b) £750,000 debenture stock of the property company referred to in cl. 3 hereof to be created and issued as fully paid by the property company."

Clause 3 is in these terms:

"The property company will create £750,000 debenture stock to be called the said £750,000 five per cent. first debenture stock 1962/80 (and hereinafter called 'the stock') and shall constitute and secure the stock by a trust deed in the form of the draft trust deed expressed to be made between the property company of the one part and the trustee company of the other part a copy of which is attached hereto."

Clause 5 and cl. 6 complete the story of the proposed transaction but are not, I think, strictly relevant to the matters I have to consider. Clause 5 provides that on completion of the transaction the property company will let and Littlewoods will take leases of all the properties for ninety-nine years from, I suppose, the date of completion. Clause 6 is to the effect that Littlewoods agrees with the persons mentioned in sched. I to sell the stock to those persons at par on the completion of the sale. Clause 7 deals with completion of the transaction:

"The sale and purchase hereby agreed to be made of the said properties the sale of the stock and all other transactions hereby provided for shall be completed and effected on or before the [blank] day of [blank] 1952 at the office of [blank] when the consideration aforesaid consisting of shares and debenture stock of the property company shall be satisfied and when Littlewoods and all other necessary parties (if any) shall at the expense of the property company execute and do all such assurances and things as may be reasonably required by the property company for vesting the said properties in it."

That, then, is the transaction. It is, I repeat, quite simple, providing for the purchase by the property company of certain real and leasehold properties in consideration of an issue of debenture stock and of shares which are to be issued as fully paid. I must, however, turn to the debenture trust deed for, as counsel for the Attorney-General has rightly submitted, it is referred to, and, indeed, attached to the agreement, and, therefore, must be read as one with the agreement, to see what is the true nature of the transaction between the parties. The parties to the trust deed are the property company and the Alliance Assurance Co., Ltd., to whom I shall refer as the trustees. Clause 1 of the trust deed contains a number of definitions and cl. 2 provides:

"As and when the stock or any part thereof ought to be redeemed or satisfied in accordance with the conditions indorsed on the stock certificates as set out in sched. I hereto or on such earlier date as the security hereby constituted becomes enforceable as hereinafter provided the company will pay to the trustees the principal amount of the stock which ought to be redeemed or satisfied together with such premium thereon (if any) as may be payable in accordance with the said conditions and will in the meantime and until all the stock shall have been redeemed or satisfied pay to the trustees interest on the stock for the time being outstanding at the rate of five per cent. per annum half-yearly . . ."

In cl. 3 it is provided:

"The stock may be issued to such persons at such times and on such terms and either at par or at a premium or a discount as the company may think fit."

Clause 4 provides for the issue of stock certificates which were to be in the form set out in sched. I. By cl. 6 the property company mortgaged the properties the subject-matter of the transaction to the trustees as security for the service of the stock. In cl. 7 the property company further granted a floating charge over the undertaking, the property and assets for the time being of the property company. Clause 10 provided for the security to become enforceable in certain events, i.e., on default in making payment of the moneys due on liquidation, and on other events, the clause in fact being in what may be said to be, I think, common form. There are the usual provisions for the trustees to realise the property when the security becomes enforceable and to hold the proceeds of realisation on trust after payment of costs, and so forth, for the holders of the debenture stock.

The form of the certificate and the conditions indorsed thereon are set out in the trust deed. The conditions are, briefly, that the stock is to be redeemed with accrued interest (which was five per cent. per annum) in 1980, but there is to be provided a sinking fund of one per cent. of the stock outstanding at any moment, and that sinking fund is to be used each year either to purchase the stock at or under par in the market or to redeem the stock by annual drawings. There is a power by which at any time on or after Jan. 1, 1962, the company could redeem the stock at 101 per cent. That is a familiar form of debenture stock. I should add that it is plain that the stock is to be a negotiable instrument and a marketable instrument in the ordinary sense of the term.

That is the transaction which, it is said, infringes the provisions of the Borrowing (Control and Guarantees) Act, 1946, and the order made thereunder. I must, therefore, turn to the Act and consider its terms. Its title is:

“An Act to provide for the regulation of the borrowing and raising of money, the issue of securities, and the circulation of offers of securities for subscription, sale or exchange, to enable the Treasury to guarantee loans in certain circumstances, and for purposes connected with the matters aforesaid.”

Section 1 (1) provides:

“The Treasury may make orders for regulating, subject to such exemptions as may be specified in the orders, all or any of the following transactions, that is to say: (a) the borrowing of money in Great Britain where the aggregate of the amount of money borrowed under the transaction and of any other amounts so borrowed by the same person in the previous twelve months (including any period before the passing of this Act) exceeds £10,000; (b) the raising of money in Great Britain by the issue, whether in Great Britain or elsewhere, by any body corporate, of any shares in that body corporate; (c) the issue for any purposes—(i) by any body corporate of any shares in or debentures or other securities of that body corporate, if either the body corporate is incorporated under the law of England or Scotland or the shares, debentures or other securities are or are to be registered in England or Scotland: or (ii) by any government, other than His Majesty’s government in the United Kingdom, of any securities of that government which are or are to be registered in England or Scotland . . .”

Sub-section (3) provides:

“The provisions of the schedule to this Act (which relate to enforcement and penalties) shall have effect in relation to orders made under this section but the rights of the persons concerned in any transaction shall not be affected by the fact that the transaction was in contravention of any such orders.”

Section 4 is the important section in this case. It is a definition section and provides so far as relevant:

“(1) In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby assigned to them, that is to say

... 'security' includes shares, bonds, notes, debentures, debenture stock and units under a unit trust scheme; 'share' includes stock and any perpetual debenture or perpetual debenture stock . . . (2) Any reference in this Act to the borrowing of money—(a) includes a reference to the making of any arrangement by which a sum which would otherwise be payable at any date is payable at a later date, and includes in particular the making of any arrangement by which the whole or any part of the price of any property is allowed to remain unpaid either for a fixed period or indefinitely, but (b) does not include a reference to the acceptance by a person carrying on a banking undertaking of moneys to be placed to the credit of a current or deposit account."

Sub-section (2) is the vital provision. I must deal briefly with the schedule which contains the provisions as to enforcement and penalties. Paragraph 1 provides:

"Any person who contravenes any provision of any order made under this Act shall be liable—(a) on summary conviction to imprisonment for not more than three months or to a fine not exceeding £500 or to both such imprisonment and such fine."

Paragraph 3 provides that no proceedings for an offence under the Act are to be instituted in England except with the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions. Sub-paragraph (4) of para. 3 is important and is in these terms:

"Where an offence under this Act has been committed by a body corporate (other than a local authority), every person who at the time of the commission of the offence was a director, general manager, secretary or other similar officer of the body corporate, or was purporting to act in any such capacity, shall be deemed to be guilty of that offence, unless he proves that the offence was committed without his consent or connivance and that he exercised all such diligence to prevent the commission of the offence as he ought to have exercised having regard to the nature of his functions in that capacity and to all the circumstances."

Under the powers conferred under that Act the Treasury made the Control of Borrowing Order, 1947, which came into operation on June 16, 1947. Part I is headed "General extent of control", and art. 1 provides:

"Borrowing in Great Britain. (1) Subject to the exemptions contained in Part II of this order, a person shall not, without the consent of the Treasury, borrow money in Great Britain where the aggregate of the amount of money borrowed and of any other amounts borrowed in Great Britain by that person in the previous twelve months (including any period before the coming into force of this order) exceeds £10,000."

Article 2 (1) provides:

"In this order references to the borrowing of money include:—(a) references to the making of any arrangement by which any money borrowed or any money due under a security (other than money representing interest or dividends), which would otherwise be payable at any date, is payable at a later date except where the money is payable by instalments and the arrangement is for the postponement of the payment of any instalment, other than the last instalment, to a date not later than that fixed for the payment of the last instalment; and (b) references to the making of any arrangement by which the price of any property except—(i) the price of goods sold by a person in the ordinary course of his business, and (ii) the price of any undertaking under a sale thereof to a private company, is allowed to remain unpaid either for a fixed period or indefinitely but charged on the property, but do not include references to the making of any other arrangement by which a sum which would otherwise be payable at any date is payable at a later date; and references to loans shall be construed accordingly."

There are definitions in art. 8 (5) which I must read:

A "In this article, the expression 'the amount involved' means—(a) in relation to the borrowing of money, the amount of money to be borrowed . . . (d) in relation to an arrangement for the postponement of payment of any money, the amount the payment of which is to be postponed."

B The correspondence, to which I need not refer in any detail, makes it quite clear that the whole of the Treasury case on this matter depends on bringing the transaction within the extended definition of the borrowing of money contained in s. 4 (2) of the Act and in art. 2 (1) of the order made thereunder. It is not suggested that the issue of securities infringes any part of the order. There was in the Act ample power given which would enable the Treasury in express terms to have prohibited the issue of securities on a transaction such as this. It is equally clear, and, indeed, it is not disputed, that in art. 2 (1) of the order there is no prohibition of the issue of securities in this particular transaction. Section 4 (2) of the Act and art. 2 (1) of the order are substantially in identical terms, but there are two differences. In C the Act there is a reference in s. 4 (2) (a) to "the whole or any part of the price of any property". In the order in art. 2 (1) (b) the reference is to "the price of any property" without any qualifying words. The only other difference is that, although the definition in s. 4 (2) (a) of the Act is in general terms and relates to any arrangement by which a sum which would be payable at any date is payable at a later date, art. 2 (1) (b) of the order relates only to any arrangement whereby the sum allowed to remain unpaid is charged on the property. D In construing these provisions I must have in mind the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 31, which provides that in an order made under powers conferred by an Act, the same words must have the same meanings unless a contrary intention appears.

E The first question I have to consider is what are the principles of construction which I must adopt in construing this Act and this order. I have to bear in mind that this is a penal statute. Indeed, I suppose that it represents the high-watermark of the Parliamentary invasion of the traditional rights of the subjects of this realm. Not only does it impose on offenders substantial penalties—no objection could be taken to that—but what is so serious from the point of view of the subject is that where a body corporate has been found to be an F offender, then directors, general managers, secretaries, or other similar officers of the body corporate, including persons who are purporting to act in those capacities, are deemed to be guilty unless they prove the offence was committed without their consent or connivance, thereby reversing the usual and traditional view of this country that a man is innocent until he is proved guilty. Not G only that, but proof that he is innocent will not avail him, because he has to go further and show that he exercised all such diligence to prevent the commission of the offence as he ought to have exercised, having regard to the nature of his functions in that capacity, and to all the circumstances. However, that is what Parliament has thought fit to enact, and, of course, I abide by it. Nevertheless, it is what counsel for the property company described as a highly H penal statute.

In those circumstances, what are the proper canons of construction? I do not propose to refer to the authorities at any length. I think the proper approach to the construction of such a statute as this is that I must construe it as I would any other instrument, i.e., I must look at all the surrounding circumstances, I must look at the mischief intended to be remedied, I must, above all, give effect to the words that have been used in the section. That is plain from the Privy Council case of Dyke v. Elliott. The Gauntlet (1), and, particularly, from the language of JAMES, L.J. (L.R. 4 P.C. 191) who delivered the judgment of the Board. If, in construing the relevant sections of the Act and of the order, there appears any reasonable doubt or ambiguity, then, as it is a penal statute, I must apply the principles laid down succinctly by LORD ESHER, M.R., in Tuck & Sons v. Priester (2). LORD ESHER, M.R., says (19 Q.B.D. 638):

"But then comes the question whether the plaintiffs are also entitled to recover penalties under s. 6 [of the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862.] We must be very careful in construing that section, because it imposes a penalty. If there is a reasonable interpretation which will avoid the penalty in any particular case we must adopt that construction. If there are two reasonable constructions we must give the more lenient one. That is the settled rule for the construction of penal sections."

There is another principle that I must have in mind, and that is that a man is entitled so to order his affairs as to avoid the provisions of the order. This is a genuine transaction. There is nothing colourable about it. The whole question I have to determine is whether, on the true construction of the Act and the order and on the true interpretation of the acts and deeds of the parties, that transaction falls fairly and squarely within the provisions of the Act and the order. In St. Aubyn (L. M.) v. A.-G. (No. 2) (3), LORD SIMONDS was dealing with a taxing Act, but his remarks apply, in my respectful view, a fortiori to a penal statute when he says ([1951] 2 All E. R. 485):

"The question is not at what transaction the section is according to some alleged general purpose aimed, but what transaction its language according to its natural meaning fairly and squarely hits."

I have to see whether, construing the Act and the order and giving the words their natural meaning, the Act and the order fairly and squarely hit this transaction. The case has rightly been elaborately argued before me, and I am indebted to counsel for their careful submissions and for their painstaking researches into the many authorities that have been cited to me. In a matter of this sort naturally there has been much reference to hypothetical examples of analogous transactions. I think, however, that it is undesirable for me to go outside the particular transaction which I have to consider. I do not propose to review the arguments because, after all, the case depends on a very few words in the Act and in the order.

I turn once more to the Act, and, in particular, to s. 4 (2):

"Any reference in this Act to the borrowing of money—(a) includes a reference to the making of any arrangement by which a sum which would otherwise be payable at any date is payable at a later date . . ."

It seems to me that what the Act is trying to hit is this. In order to repay one's existing creditors, one may borrow money, but another way of dealing with the matter is to persuade one's existing creditors to permit one to repay them at a later date. No borrowing in the ordinary sense occurs if the latter course is followed, but the Act plainly hits that sort of arrangement. Section 4 (2) continues " . . . and includes in particular"—those words are important, because, while I find it unnecessary to decide whether they show that what follows falls within and is a particular example of what has gone before, at all events they do show that the Act is now going to deal with a case closely analogous to that which has gone before—

"the making of any arrangement by which the whole or any part of the price of any property is allowed to remain unpaid . . ."

It is conceded by counsel for the Attorney-General that the reference to price is appropriate in an Act of this sort only to a money consideration, using money in the strict sense of cash; it is not appropriate to describe some consideration other than cash. What do I have to find in order that the Act should cover the transaction? I have to find a cash consideration being paid for a property, i.e., a contract of sale and purchase for cash. I have to find an arrangement by which that cash is to remain unpaid. I do not think I need refer in any detail to the order, because with the exceptions I have just mentioned the words are exactly the same. I look then at the transaction. Is this a transaction which has a cash consideration which is allowed to remain unpaid?

- With all respect to the arguments of counsel for the Attorney-General, I should have thought that this was plainly described in legal language as a transaction for a consideration which consisted in the issue of debentures. The Act plainly draws a distinction between the issue of securities and the borrowing of money. The order makes the difference even plainer, as appears from the various cross-headings. One can only make this a transaction for a cash consideration which is allowed to remain unpaid by saying that, looking at the transaction as a whole, one finds that, on its true interpretation, a sum of cash is to be paid on the terms of the debenture trust deed in the future, and that what really is happening is that there is a consideration of £750,000 payable in cash which is to be allowed to remain unpaid until 1980 or such earlier time as the security is redeemed under those provisions which I have already read. That seems to me to be a most strange and unnatural interpretation of the transaction.
- There is, in fact, no cash consideration here at all. No money is being allowed to remain unpaid. This is quite a different transaction. This is a transaction in consideration of the issue of a series of debenture stock secured by a debenture trust deed. Under that trust deed, of course, moneys become payable from time to time in accordance with the provisions of the trust deed to the holders from time to time of the stock certificates. How that can be said to be allowing money to remain unpaid when one is dealing with provisions which in essence are merely extending the meaning of the word "borrowing", I do not understand. It would have been easy for the Treasury, by making appropriate orders, to have dealt with this type of transaction. It has not thought fit to do so, and, in my judgment, it can only bring this transaction within the provisions which I have dealt with by giving to this transaction a most strange and unnatural construction.
- It follows, therefore, if the Treasury is wrong in that view, that this transaction does not infringe the Control of Borrowing Order, 1947. At the same time, I think, having regard to the facts to which I have already referred, that this is really a question for the criminal courts. My declaration ought to be very narrow. I, therefore, propose to declare that the arrangement proposed is not a transaction whereby the price of any property is allowed to remain unpaid within the meaning of art. 2 (1) (b) of the Control of Borrowing Order, 1947.

Order accordingly.

PRACTICE NOTE.

KANGOL INDUSTRIES, LTD. v. ALFRED BRAY & SONS, LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), November 11, 1952.]

Design—Practice motion—Undertaking to deliver up machines and drawings—Enforcement.

MOTION.

The plaintiffs claimed (i) an injunction to restrain the defendants from disclosing or making any use of (a) any information received from the plaintiffs relating to the construction of knitting machines, and (b) any improvements made by the defendants relating to such knitting machines, and (ii) an order that the defendants should deliver up to the plaintiffs all knitting machines similar to those made by the defendants for the plaintiffs, and all parts, drawings, jigs and patterns relating thereto which were in their possession, power, or control. On July 29, 1952, the plaintiffs moved the court for an interlocutory injunction, but the defendants offered an undertaking in the terms of claim (i) in the writ, and also undertook to deliver up on or before Aug. 5, 1952, to the plaintiffs the articles claimed in claim (ii). The plaintiffs undertook to lodge £365 in court and to take no further step in the action which was pending between the parties. The undertakings were embodied in the order made on the motion. The plaintiffs now moved the court for an order that “(i) the defendants do within seven days after the date of this order make and file a full and sufficient affidavit by their proper officer stating whether they have or have had in their possession or power any and (if any) what drawings or copies thereof relating to any knitting machines made, or similar to those made, by the defendants for the plaintiffs and accounting for the same, and (ii) the defendants do within seven days after filing such affidavit deposit at [a bank] in the joint names of the solicitors for the plaintiffs and the defendants any such drawings or copies not already so deposited which are in their possession or power.”

Shelley, Q.C., and Aldous for the plaintiffs.

Raymond Jennings, Q.C., and Van Oss, for the defendants, objected that the court had no jurisdiction to order delivery up on oath on an interlocutory application. They also pointed out that the plaintiffs had undertaken to take no further step in the action.

DANCKWERTS, J., made the order asked for by the notice of motion. He said that, having regard to the correspondence, which showed that, either through foolishness or lack of appreciation of the seriousness of the situation, or a quibbling kind of dishonesty, the defendants had failed to make an effort to comply with the undertaking promptly. He was not surprised that the plaintiffs had lost faith in the defendants' intention to fulfil their undertaking. While it might be true that, if on the original motion relief had been resisted, the plaintiffs could not have obtained an order on interlocutory application for delivery up of the drawings and patterns, the order had been made by consent. The defendants had given an undertaking that they would hand over the drawings and patterns, and so it was too late to take an objection of that nature. The court was entitled to require that some statement should be made by the defendants to the effect that they had complied with their undertaking. The application did not constitute a further step in the action. The costs would be the plaintiffs' in any event. [After discussion the time for filing the affidavit was extended to fourteen days.]

STRUTT v. PANTER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.),
January 26, 1953.]

Rent Restriction—Statutory tenant—Previous order against tenant's mother for possession of other premises on condition that landlord provided alternative accommodation—Death of mother while in occupation of alternative accommodation—Claim by daughter to protection as statutory tenant—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g).

On Feb. 7, 1950, an order for possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied was made against the widow of a tenant, she having become a statutory tenant on her husband's death by virtue of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. It was a term of the order that the landlord should "let" to the widow alternative accommodation at a comparable rent. The landlord complied with that condition, and the widow went into possession of the alternative accommodation. On Dec. 17, 1951, the widow died and her daughter who had resided with her, remained in possession of the alternative accommodation. On a claim against the daughter for possession of that accommodation, HELD: the effect of the order of Feb. 7, 1950, was to create in the mother a new contract of tenancy of the alternative accommodation, and, therefore, the daughter was entitled to remain in possession by virtue of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920.

Observations by SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., on the terms of an order for possession on condition that the landlord provides suitable alternative accommodation.

FOR THE INCREASE OF RENT AND MORTGAGE INTEREST (RESTRICTIONS) ACT, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g) and s. 15 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, p. 999, and p. 1017, respectively.

APPEAL by the landlord from an order of His Honour JUDGE HODGSON made at Kingston-upon-Thames County Court on Nov. 21, 1952, dismissing the landlord's action for possession of a dwelling-house.

S. Terrell for the landlord.

Lubbock for the tenant.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The tenant claims to be entitled to the possession of a house, No. 59 Station Road, Chertsey, by virtue of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. She is in occupation of the house in the following circumstances. On Feb. 7, 1950, in an action brought by the landlord against the tenant's mother, Mrs. Beard, for possession of another house, No. 48 Station Road, Chertsey, JUDGE KONSTAM made an order for possession of that house on the terms, by way of satisfying s. 3 (1) (b) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, that the landlord would let—and, so far as we can tell, those were the vital words—No. 59 Station Road to Mrs. Beard at a comparable rent, 10s. 11d. a week. That was done. At the time of the order Mrs. Beard was the statutory tenant of 48 Station Road, having survived her husband, the previous tenant, and taken advantage of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920. If, therefore, Mrs. Beard had remained at 48 Station Road and had died there—in fact, she died at 59 Station Road on Dec. 17, 1951—the present tenant could not have invoked that same provision in order to preserve for herself a right of continued occupation. If, however, the effect of the order was to create in Mrs. Beard a new contract of tenancy of 59 Station Road, then the fact that she had herself succeeded to the tenancy of 48 Station Road under s. 12 (1) (g) ceases to have any further relevance, and the present tenant is now entitled, by virtue of s. 12 (1) (g), to remain in possession of 59 Station Road after her mother's death. I would add that the intention of JUDGE KONSTAM was that everything would remain as nearly as possible exactly as it was on Feb. 7, 1950, with the mere substitution for 48 Station Road of No. 59, so that Mrs. Beard's statutory tenancy of No. 48 would, so to speak, be translated to No. 59.

I agree with JUDGE HODGSON that that is not a possible consequence. As I understand the position, a statutory tenancy can only come into existence, to use the language of s. 15 (1) of the Act of 1920, by the circumstance that a contractual tenant retains possession of the subject-matter of the tenancy after the contract has been determined. Therefore, it seems to me impossible to create a statutory tenancy when no previous contractual relationship of landlord and tenant in respect of the premises has ever existed. If that is right, it seems to me that other consequences follow. I have no doubt that, in their notable efforts to give effect to the rent restriction legislation, county court judges are from time to time faced with the need to order alternative accommodation for a tenant as a condition of making an order for possession, and, when doing so, try to put the tenant as nearly as may be in the same position as he or she was before the order for possession took effect, but, in my judgment, a court cannot create a tenancy, as it were, out of the void, and, if an order of this kind is made, it is, perhaps, desirable that further consideration should be given to the precise intent behind it. Thus, if what happened on the order of Feb. 7, 1950, taking effect was to bring into operation a contractual tenancy at 10s. 11d. a week of 59 Station Road, and nothing more was said, it may well have been—though I do not so decide—that on the very next day the landlord could have served a notice to quit as a preliminary to increasing the rent to the recoverable limit of 13s. 10d. If that is to be prevented, it may be that orders of this kind should contain an undertaking on the part of the landlord, that, so long as the tenant remains in occupation and complies with all the terms of the newly created tenancy, he (the landlord) will not serve a notice determining the contractual tenancy with a view to increasing the rent without the leave of the court or on such terms as the county court judge may think proper. In making orders of this kind, no doubt, county court judges will also consider the possible effect, so far as succession under s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920 is concerned—though it does not, perhaps, happen very often—that the person against whom the order is being sought is himself or herself a “successor” under s. 12.

Those observations are, however, by the way. The present appeal raises only the limited question whether the learned judge was right in holding, as he did, that no order for possession could now be made on these proceedings against the tenant. In my judgment, the learned judge was right in that conclusion, and I think the appeal ought to be dismissed.

SMITH v. CHESTERFIELD & DISTRICT CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), January 28, 29, 1953.]

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Rolling machine in bakery—Guard leaving space for operator's hand to go underneath it—Operator putting hand through in breach of instructions—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 14 (1).

A machine which rolled out puff pastry at a bakery was provided with a guard to protect the operator from coming into contact with the rollers. The guard came down to within three inches of the bed of the machine. Disregarding instructions which had been given to her, the plaintiff, while operating the machine, put her hand under the guard to press against the rollers pieces of dough which had escaped them, her hand came in contact with the rollers, and she was injured. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendants, her employers, for damages for negligence and/or breach of their statutory duty securely to fence the machine as they were required by s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, OLIVER, J., held that, as the plaintiff had deliberately put her hand underneath the guard, that was equivalent to breaking or taking away the guard, and, therefore, the defendants were not liable. On appeal, HELD: that, while the question whether a machine was securely fenced was one which fell to be decided on the facts of the particular case under consideration, it must also be decided according to the right principle of law, and the ground on which OLIVER, J., had come to his decision placed too limited a duty on the defendants under s. 14 (1); the conduct of the plaintiff, unreasonable as it was, was reasonably foreseeable by the defendants, and, as the guard which was provided was such that the plaintiff could put her hand beneath it and so come into contact with the rollers, the rollers of the machine were not securely fenced within the meaning of s. 14 (1); and, therefore, the defendants were in breach of their duty under that sub-section.

APPEAL by the plaintiff against an order of OLIVER, J., dated July 19, 1952, dismissing an action for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants on a machine which rolled out puff pastry at their bakery. The machine was provided with a guard which came down to within three inches of the bed of the machine, leaving enough space for the operator to put her hand underneath it. In order to roll small pieces of dough which had been left behind after layers of dough had passed through the machine, the plaintiff, in contravention of instructions given to her by the defendants, put her hand under the guard to push the dough against the rollers and her fingers came into contact with the rollers and were injured.

OLIVER, J., held that the guard was a sufficient protection against anything except a deliberate act and that, therefore, the machinery was "securely fenced" within the meaning of s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and the defendants were not in breach of their statutory duty under that sub-section.

Hylton-Foster, Q.C., and R. W. Sykes for the plaintiff.

Beresford, Q.C., and Seuffert for the defendants.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is an appeal from an order of OLIVER, J., in an action in which the plaintiff claimed damages for injury to her hand caused by an alleged breach of statutory duty on the part of the defendants. The plaintiff was employed at a bakery, on a rolling machine which rolled puff pastry. The pastry is made by placing a layer of margarine on a layer of dough, folding the layer of dough over and putting it through the machine, repeating this operation several times, until a slab of material about three inches thick is made. The plaintiff's duty is to manipulate the dough by rolling it or beating it with a hand roller, and then, as it is very heavy, putting it through the mechanical roller. The mechanical roller comprises a fixed bottom roller and a top roller which will move slightly up and down, according, I suppose, to the thickness of the dough which is being put through. When dough is going through the machine small pieces are left which have not been drawn in by the rollers and rolled out. It is the plaintiff's duty to stop the machine, collect these small pieces of dough, put them again into a lump, roll them with a hand roller, and then add them to the dough when it goes through the machine again, in the reverse direction to that in which it went through in the first instance. The rollers have a guard over them which comes down, leaving a space of over three inches between the bottom of the guard and the bed of the machine. The object of the guard is to prevent the operator's fingers coming into contact with the rollers. The operators who work these machines are given special directions and training, and they are forbidden from time to time to put small pieces of dough which have escaped the rollers back into the machine for rolling. They are told to roll them with a rolling pin, because, if small pieces have to be pushed tight against the rollers when they are working, there is a danger that the fingers may come into contact with the rollers. A careless or thoughtless operator can put her hand under the guard and come in contact with the rollers, and that is what happened to the plaintiff. The plaintiff collected the bits of dough, and, because it was rather heavy work to roll them out by hand, she put them back, and contrary to her instructions put her hand under the guard to push the dough up against the rollers while the machine was working. As a result her fingers were cut and she was injured.

It has been said that the provisions of the Factories Acts regarding fencing are not meant only to prevent accidents to careful workmen. It is recognised that people in factories are not always careful, but, on the contrary, they are often thoughtless and sometimes they do things deliberately which they ought not to do and which involve themselves in injury. Fencing is intended to protect the careless and the ignorant as well as the careful and the well-instructed. In Burns v. Joseph Terry & Sons, Ltd. (1) SOMERVELL, L.J. ([1950] 2 All E.R. 990) cited a passage from the Lord President's opinion in Lyon v. Don Brothers, Buist & Co., Ltd. (2) in which LORD NORMAND said (1944 S.C. (J.) 5):

"It can be appositely said that the standard to be observed is a fence which will prevent accidents from occurring in circumstances which may be reasonably anticipated, but the circumstances which may be reasonably anticipated include a great deal more than the staid, prudent, well-regulated conduct of men diligently attentive to their work, and the occupiers of factories are bound to reckon on the possibility of conduct very different from that. They are bound to take into account the possibility of negligent, ill-advised or indolent conduct on the part of their employees, and even of frivolous conduct, especially where young workers are employed. If the fencing is to secure operatives against injury which may reasonably be anticipated in that sense, then I am of opinion that there was a contravention of the section of the Act."

A The guard in the present case was provided to prevent operatives from touching or getting their fingers up against the rollers, but a girl could put her hand under it and steps might have been taken to prevent that happening. Counsel for the defendants called our attention to the proviso to s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, which I think is against the defendants' case. Section 14 (1) requires all dangerous parts of machinery to be "securely fenced"—not merely "fenced"—and as with some machinery a permanent fence is impracticable, the proviso provides that:

B "in so far as the safety of a dangerous part of any machinery cannot by reason of the nature of the operation be secured by means of a fixed guard, the requirements of this sub-section shall be deemed to have been complied with if a device is provided which automatically prevents the operator from coming into contact with that part."

C If this guard had come down when the dough was no longer there and touched the bed of the machine so as to prevent a person's hands going through, it would have been a sufficient guard, and if an operative deliberately picked up such a guard and put her hand through the machine very different considerations would apply.

D We are asked to say that there are here findings of fact by the learned judge with which we should not interfere. He held that, because the plaintiff deliberately put her hand underneath this guard, i.e., through the space which was left between the guard and the bed of the machine, that was equivalent to breaking or taking away the guard, and that, therefore, the employers were not liable. With all respect to the learned judge, I do not agree with that view. It was possible for an operator, without breaking the guard, to get her hand in contact with the rollers. Therefore, it seems to me that it is impossible to say that the dangerous part of the machine, the moving rollers, was "securely fenced".

E For this reason I think that there was a breach of statutory duty on the part of the defendants. The plaintiff, however, was guilty of contributory negligence, because she did a deliberate act against which she had been warned and which she ought to have known was highly dangerous. That the danger was foreseeable by the employers is clear, both because the guard was provided to prevent it and because the employees were instructed about it. The guard was not adequate, but the plaintiff was guilty of folly in doing what she did, in direct disobedience of orders. Therefore, she cannot recover the whole of the damages, and the court has come to the conclusion that she should be given forty per cent. of whatever sum may be awarded. We have no information or evidence before us on which we can assess the damages, and so, in default of agreement, the case will be sent to the registrar of the Leeds County Court to assess the damages.

H JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. Counsel for the defendants argued that whether this machine was "securely fenced" or not in accordance with the requirements of s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, was a question of fact on which the learned judge had reached his conclusion after hearing and seeing the witnesses, and so this court ought not to interfere with it. Whether any particular machine is "securely fenced" in accordance with the statutory duty must be judged with reference to the facts of each particular case. That is a truism, but the question must also be judged by reference to the right principle of law, and, to my mind, the learned judge was in error when he said:

"But on those facts how can she succeed in an action under the Factories Acts? I do not think that she can. The essence of the provisions of s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, from what I know of the cases and from what has been cited to me, seems to be that there should be a fencing against accident and not a fencing against deliberation."

The learned judge, having laid down that principle for his guidance, came to the conclusion that the plaintiff's deliberate act was tantamount to a breaking of the fence and involved no breach of statutory duty on the part of the defendants, inasmuch as the fence provided was a sufficient protection against anything except a deliberate act amounting to a breaking of the fence.

To my mind, this statement of the principle of law by which the learned judge was guided puts far too narrowly the duty of an employer under s. 14 (1). It is plain from the passage from the opinion of LORD NORMAND in Lyon v. Don Brothers, Buist & Co., Ltd. (2) (1944 S.C. (J.) 5), cited in Burns v. Joseph Terry & Sons, Ltd. (1) in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J. ([1950] 2 All E.R. 990), that the security to be provided by means of the fencing extends not merely to protection against accidental occurrences, but also to protection against "negligent, ill-advised or indolent conduct"; and it extends further, in my judgment, to conduct such as that of the plaintiff in the present case. The test, as was said by DU PARCQ, J., in Walker v. Bletchley Flettons, Ltd. (3) is this ([1937] 1 All E.R. 175):

"In considering whether machinery is dangerous you must not assume that everybody will always be careful . . . a part of machinery is dangerous if it is a possible cause of injury to anybody acting in a way in which a human being may be reasonably expected to act in circumstances which may be reasonably expected to occur."

This applies in considering whether machinery is "dangerously fenced". I may add this comment from REDGRAVE'S FACTORIES, TRUCK & SHOPS ACTS, 18th ed., p. 32:

"This, which is the test now most commonly applied, is, it is submitted, the correct one. In spite of the first sentence of the test, the same learned judge had in Stimson v. Standard Telephones & Cables, Ltd. (4) to complain that the test had in some quarters been misunderstood. The behaviour of human beings that has to be regarded is such behaviour as is reasonably foreseeable which is not necessarily confined to such behaviour as is reasonable behaviour."

In the present case it seems to me not open to doubt that the action of the plaintiff, unreasonable as it may have been, was behaviour on her part which was reasonably foreseeable by the defendants. That seems to me to be demonstrated by the fact that Mr. Naylor, the defendants' bakery manager, when asked what instructions were given to the staff concerning the machine and the use of the guard, said:

"We have always given the staff instructions that, when they put the paste through and it comes that they have small pieces to finish off, they must not use the machine for the small ends; they must use a rolling pin, because it is awkward practice to put small pieces through the machine, and also dangerous."

It appears clear, therefore, that this procedure of putting small pieces through the machine was one which the employers had in mind and against which they thought it necessary to caution their employees. It was, therefore, a foreseeable act of anyone working the machine. The guard was so constructed as to leave room between the table and the lower member of the guard sufficient for a person minded to follow this forbidden procedure to thrust her hand through, with a view to putting the small pieces between the rollers, and thus to get the hand caught in the nip. Accordingly, I agree with my Lord that this appeal should be allowed. On the question of contributory negligence and damages, I have nothing to add to what he has said.

MORRIS, L.J.: I am in full agreement with the judgments which have been delivered.

Appeal allowed.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Porter, Lord Tucker, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone, Lord Cohen and the Chief Justice of Canada (the Rt. Hon. T. Rinfret)), July 10, 14, 15, 16, 17, 21, 22, 23, 1952, January 12, 1953.]

Mine—Minerals—Reservation—Right to work implied in reservation—Meaning of “petroleum”—Vernacular, not scientific, meaning to be sought—Right of occupier of land to natural gas within the land.

The appellant owned an estate in fee simple of property in Alberta. The property had been acquired by his predecessor in 1906 from the first respondents and he was registered as owner in 1947. In the original conveyance the first respondents reserved to themselves all coal, petroleum and valuable stone, and in 1949, in reliance on this reservation, they leased to the second respondents all petroleum that might be found within, on, or under the land, together with the exclusive right to work, win, and carry it away, for a period of ten years, subject to the right of renewal. There was, under the appellant's property and the lands adjoining it, a large reservoir of petroleum which was found in a bed of porous rock underlying the land. This bed contained at the bottom water, then the petroleum, and on top a layer of gas. The porous rock and the other substances were held in a container which was impervious and shut them off from the surrounding land which lay outside it, but within the container they could move from place to place, and, therefore, any withdrawal of water, petroleum, or gas from one portion would normally result in the filling of the vacant space by one of those three substances. The second respondents entered on the appellant's land and proceeded to bore for oil. The appellant sought a declaration that he was the owner of the natural gas within his lands, whether it was found in solution in the petroleum or in a free state, and an injunction restraining the respondents from using, removing, wasting, interfering with, or otherwise disposing in any manner of this natural gas. Both respondents claimed that the free gas contained in the same chamber as the petroleum was part of the petroleum.

HELD: (i) a reservation by a landowner of mines and minerals was meaningless unless it was accompanied by a right to work and to recover the substance reserved, and, although the reservation in the conveyance of 1906 did not contain a clause giving a right to work, the absence of such a clause did not abrogate or limit the respondents' powers, for such a reservation necessarily implied the existence of power to recover the substance reserved and the right to work it: Rowbotham v. Wilson (1860)

(8 H.L. Cas. 348), and observation of LORD HATHERLEY in Ramsay v. Blair (1876) (1 App. Cas. 704), applied.

(ii) in ascertaining the meaning of the word "petroleum", the vernacular meaning (i.e., the meaning applied by landowners, business men, and engineers, as opposed to scientists) should be sought: observations of LORD HALSBURY, L.C., in Glasgow Corpn. v. Farie (1888) (13 App. Cas. 669), applied; and, applying that test, "petroleum", when in a container below ground, included gas in solution in the liquid as it existed in the earth;

(iii) the respondents were under no obligation to conserve the free gas within the appellant's land with the consequent denial of their right to recover the petroleum in the usual way, because the respondents had a direct grant of the petroleum, whereas the appellant had merely such residual rights as remained in him subject to the grant to the respondents, and, therefore, there was no obligation on the respondents to take steps to prevent the egress of the gas or to refrain from connecting the orifice with the oil bed.

(iv) therefore, the appellant was not entitled to the declaration and injunction which he sought.

CONSOLIDATED APPEALS from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta, dated Feb. 6, 1952.

The appellant owned an estate in fee simple in section 19, township 50, range 25 west of the fourth meridian, in the province of Alberta. On Sept. 2, 1900, the first respondents, the Canadian Pacific Railway Co., were registered as owners of the property in question, and on Dec. 27, 1906, they transferred it to one Simon Borys, but his title did not appear to have been registered till Nov. 19, 1920. By a series of subsequent transactions the land was transferred to the appellant who was registered as owner of the estate on Dec. 18, 1947. In the original conveyance the first respondents reserved to themselves all coal, petroleum, and valuable stone, and, on Sept. 21, 1949, in reliance on this reservation, they leased to the second respondents, Imperial Oil, Ltd., all petroleum that might be found within, on, or under the land, together with the exclusive right to work, win, and carry away the same for a period of ten years, subject to the right of renewal. That lease in terms granted a right which was not specifically reserved in the original conveyance, i.e., the right to work the petroleum. There was, in fact, a large reservoir of petroleum under the appellant's property and the lands adjoining it. The petroleum, in so far as was material to the present case, was found in a bed of porous rock underlying the appellant's land and the surrounding property, which contained at the bottom water, then petroleum, and on top a layer of gas. The porous rock and the other substances were held in a container which was impervious and shut them off from such of the surrounding land as lay outside it, but within the container itself they could move from place to place, and, therefore, any withdrawal of water, petroleum, or gas from one portion of the container normally resulted in the filling of the vacant space by one of those three substances. As the bed stretched beyond the appellant's land, any withdrawal might cause the gap to be filled from those portions which lay outside the appellant's boundaries. On the other hand, the withdrawal of any of the contents might result in a partial filling of the space by the original substances under decreased pressure, or partially in both ways. The substances were fugacious and not stable within the container, though they could not escape from it. If one of the three substances was withdrawn from a portion of the property which did not belong to the appellant, but lay within the same container, and any oil or gas situated in his property thereby filtered from it to the surrounding lands, admittedly he had no remedy. So, also, if any substance was withdrawn from his property, thereby causing fugacious matter to enter his land, the surrounding owners had no remedy against him. The only safeguard was to be the first to get to work, in which case those who made the recovery became owners of the material which they withdrew from any well situated on their property or from which they had authority to draw.

The dispute which arose between the parties was as to what was included under the reservation of petroleum, to what extent the respondents were empowered to work it in default of a reservation of a right to do so, and how far they could interfere with the appellant's right in things not reserved in the grant to him. The particular substance of which the appellant claimed to be owner, and to interference with which he objected, was the gas contained in a cap situated on top of the petroleum (which may be called "free gas") and also any gas which was in solution in the petroleum under his land or might be withdrawn from under his land. The problem arose because the material in the container was subjected to high pressure and a high temperature, with the result that what would be gas at a normal surface temperature and at such a pressure as would be met with at ground level became dissolved in the petroleum and was found in solution with it in liquid form. Petroleum, not gas, was reserved, and the appellant claimed that all gas on his premises belonged to him, whether it were found in solution in the petroleum or in a free state. The second respondents, who claimed that the reservation of petroleum included the gas in the cap as well as all gas in solution in it, and included the right to work it, obtained a permit from the State on Nov. 28, 1949, giving them the right (on providing security sufficient, in the opinion of the board of arbitration set up under the Right of Entry Arbitration Act, 1947, to protect the rights and privileges of the appellant) to enter on and use such portions of his property as might be required for the purpose of drilling for petroleum, subject to compensation. They then entered on the land and proceeded to bore for oil, but before they reached the container the appellant, maintaining that their working would remove his gas, whether free or in solution, applied for, and obtained, an interim injunction inhibiting them from penetrating into the chamber. At the same time he brought an action claiming (a) a declaration that he was the owner of the natural gas within his lands; (b) an interlocutory and permanent injunction restraining the respondents from using, removing, wasting, interfering with, or otherwise disposing in any manner of that natural gas; (c) alternatively, damages. Howson, C.J., found that (i) petroleum and natural gas were two separate substances; (ii) the appellant was the owner of all such gas, whether free or in solution; and (iii) the second respondents' workings would interfere with his rights, and he granted the appellant a permanent injunction. The respondents appealed to the Supreme Court of Alberta, who agreed that petroleum and natural gas were two different substances, but held that (i) gas in solution in strata in liquid form in the petroleum was part of the petroleum, and was, therefore, one of the products reserved under the lease; (ii) the reservation of the substance included a right to work it; (iii) all petroleum reserved was the property of the respondents and all gas not included in the reservation was the property of the appellant; and (iv) the respondents were entitled to extract all of the substances belonging to them from the earth, even if their action caused interference with, and wastage of, the gas belonging to the appellant, so long as in the operation modern methods were adopted and reasonably used, and the provisions of any relevant statutes and regulations were observed.

Jan 12. LORD PORTER read the following judgment of the Board. This is an appeal by Michael Borys from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta which partly reversed and partly affirmed a judgment of the Chief Justice. In the court of first instance Mr. Borys was plaintiff, and the two respondents were defendants, who not only resisted the claim but also counterclaimed against him and now cross-appeal against portions of the judgment of the Appellate Division.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts as set out above and continued:] When petroleum is sold as a marketable substance no difficulty arises as to the material which is dealt with. The substance by that time has reached the open air and is no longer affected by the pressure and temperature to which it is subjected while underground. Petroleum, says the appellant, is that well-known commodity which is bought and sold under that designation and does not include gas whether in solution or retained in the cap above it. Gas not found in the same container as petroleum may, say the respondents, be conceded to be gas and not to be included in the reservation, but the gas in solution is part of the petroleum and so is the gas which is enclosed with it in the same container. Both substances, as they point out, are hydrocarbons and contain the same elements. A great deal of evidence tending to either conclusion was given on the hearing of the case, but both courts in Canada, after analysing the evidence, have come to the conclusion that petroleum and gas, though each is a combination of the same elements, are separate substances. In their Lordships' view there was evidence to justify this conclusion, and there are, therefore, concurrent findings of fact which the Board would not be justified in disturbing. The substance which is found in the form of gas in situ is, therefore, not the subject of reservation and remains the property of the appellant. Gas, however, which exists in solution in the petroleum is a different matter, and must be separately dealt with.

When endeavouring to ascertain the meaning which is to be attributed to "petroleum" in the original reservation, it becomes necessary to decide who are the persons whose use of the word is to determine the sense in which it is employed in the relevant document, inasmuch as the chemist and laboratory expert may attribute to it a meaning different from that which the lay mind would adopt. As has been said, the chemical contents of the petroleum and the natural gas found in the field are the same, and, regarded scientifically, the substances are, therefore, the same. But a scientific similarity of substance does not establish that the materials are themselves rightly to be described by the same name. The proper approach, says the appellant, is to ascertain the meaning of the word in the mouths of those non-scientific persons who are concerned with its use, such as landowners, business men and engineers, and to be guided by them as to the true construction of the reservation. The vernacular, not the scientific, meaning is, he maintains, the true one, and in support of this contention he calls attention to the observations of LORD HALSBURY, L.C., in Glasgow Corp'n. v. Farie (1) when he says of mines and minerals (13 App. Cas. 669) that, in construing the expression, it has to be determined what these words mean in the vernacular of the mining world, the commercial world, and landowners at the time when the grant is made. This method of interpretation has been repeated and accepted more than once, and their Lordships agree that, where it can be ascertained that a particular vernacular meaning is attributed to words in circumstances similar to those in which the expression to be construed is found, the vernacular meaning must prevail over the scientific. But the distinction is not a rigid one to be applied without regard to the circumstances in which the word is used. It was said by LORD WATSON in the same case (ibid., 675):

“ ‘Mines’ and ‘minerals’ are not definite terms: they are susceptible of limitation or expansion, according to the intention with which they are used.”

In their Lordships’ view, the same observations are true of the meaning of petroleum. It may vary according to the circumstances in which it is used.

Inasmuch as the respondents claim all the material in liquid form, including gas in solution, and also all gas associated with petrol in the same container, much of the evidence was directed to a distinction between petroleum and gas. But this is a different problem from an inquiry whether gas in solution is included in a reservation of petroleum. No light on this matter is thrown by the recognition going back as far as 1906 of petroleum and gas as different substances. The question is not whether there are two separate substances, but what is included in each. Except, possibly, one witness, a Dr. Nauss, no witness dealt specifically with this topic, and with that one exception those who may be thought to do so inferentially do not seem to have directed their minds to a consideration of what is included in a reservation of petroleum in the earth, but merely to have dealt with its meaning when recovered from the mine and put into condition for sale above ground. To discriminate between two substances found in solution, one from the other, is difficult enough in any case, but when changes of temperature and pressure can alter the respective relative quantities of one and the other, the difficulty is enhanced. In the ground there is a distinction, one is then liquid and the other gaseous, and the liquid may naturally be called petroleum and the gaseous gas. Any other distinction must depend on a purely conventional assumption that liquid at a particular temperature and pressure corresponding more or less to that found on the surface of the earth is petroleum and the rest of the substance is gas. This is a purely chemical formula and in no way elucidates the meaning which the word bears on the lips of landowners, business men, or engineers, and except as a convenient conventional formula has no logical basis. The difficulty of distinguishing between what is gas and what is petroleum is most easily seen when the ratio of what is fluid in the untapped container to what is gaseous is compared with the ratio of one to the other when the substance is stabilised on the surface. But the difficulty goes deeper because, as the oil is extracted from the reservoir, the ratio almost inevitably changes, the gas increasing as the pressure and temperature are reduced. If, then, a question arose as to the right of the appellant to tap and recover his gas, a difficult problem might arise as to how much of the substance belonged to each party. The solution might be that what emerged as liquid was petroleum and what emerged in gaseous form was gas. But the appellant has not tapped the gas and the question is what substance can the respondents withdraw and to what extent they can make use of the gas whether free or in solution. The answer, say the respondents, is to be found in a wide interpretation of the word “petroleum”, which, it is maintained, includes all kinds of hydrocarbons whether in liquid or gaseous form. On the other hand, the appellant contends that gas is gas whether in solution with oil in a liquid form or in a gaseous state. The test is what is liquid and what is gas at the conventional figure of sixty degrees F., and 4.65 pressure, i.e., its state at what is a mean temperature and a mean pressure on the surface. The learned Chief Justice took the latter view, the Court of Appeal adopted a compromise, viz., the condition of the substance as it emerges from time to time from the reservoir.

This conclusion, says the appellant, is wrong because it depends on the scientific constitution of the material, and neglects the vernacular meaning. If non-scientific people had ever had to consider what was included in a reservation of petroleum in a grant of land and the answer had been categorical, this view might well prevail. But, as their Lordships have indicated, there is no evidence of such an approach to the problem, or, indeed, of any consideration of it. The ordinary man, when asked: "What is petroleum?", is only concerned with the substance which he can buy or sell after it is recovered and can be delivered as an article of commerce. Their Lordships cannot find any clear evidence as to what the uninstructed mind would define as petroleum underground either in 1906, when the grant to Simon Borys was first made, or, indeed, at any later date.

One may illustrate the attitude of the layman by quoting the evidence of Mr. Harvie, the Deputy Minister of Lands and Forests for Alberta, who had been entrusted with the task of drafting regulations in respect of mines and minerals. His first statement as to this matter was that, from the year 1919, and, indeed, possibly from 1905, his understanding was that petroleum was oil, and natural gas was a separate entity, but later on, when asked: "What about gas in the ground that is dissolved in solution?", he explained that he was not a technician and that in his evidence he was not dealing with gas in the ground at all. Mr. Droppo, who had been engaged in the petroleum business for many years, gave evidence to the like effect. Similarly, when Mr. O'Connor, another of the appellant's witnesses, says that petroleum is a liquid or crude oil produced from the earth, he throws no light on the question at issue. In their Lordships' opinion, none of the further non-scientific witnesses called on the appellant's behalf assist his case on this point. On the other hand, Dr. A. W. Nauss, who is a geologist and has had wide experience in oil, explains that in the case of the petroleum in the Leduc field (which is the field under consideration), each barrel of oil recovered from the ground contains one hundred cubic feet of gas in solution in the oil, and continues:

"When we say 'a gas' we mean those substances which are a gas at atmospheric pressure and at room temperature . . . Gas in solution is the gas which is dissolved in the oil," but when it was suggested that it had then ceased to be gas, he replied:

"It ceases to look like gas, yes. I would not say it ceases to be gas."

Dr. Nauss, however, is expressing the opinion of the expert, whereas, as the appellant insists and their Lordships agree, it is in the vernacular use that the true solution is to be found. The chemist may make a distinction between different contents of the liquid substance and resolve it into its constituent parts, but such treatment is purely scientific and in no sense based on the view of the ordinary man. The finding of the learned trial judge—that gas in solution is not included in a reservation of petroleum in the earth, depends on Dr. Nauss' evidence and not on vernacular.

In these circumstances their Lordships, with such assistance as is to be obtained from the facts as given in evidence, must form their own opinion purely as a matter of construction as to the meaning which the word "petroleum" bears when the substance referred to is in situ in a container below ground. In this matter they agree with the observations of the majority in the Supreme Court of Alberta as expressed by PARLEE, J., in his judgment, when he says:

A "The trial judge found that petroleum and natural gas were, by common usage, two different substances, and that conclusion ought not to be disturbed. I am, however, with respect, unable to agree with him that the reservation 'petroleum' did not include gas in solution in the liquid as it exists in the earth. What was reserved to the railway company was petroleum in the earth and not a substance when it reached the surface. It is true that by change of pressure and temperature, gas is released from solution when the liquid is brought to the surface but such a change ought not to affect the original ownership. In my opinion, all the petroleum reserved, including all hydrocarbons in solution or contained in the liquid in the ground, is the property of the [respondents] who are entitled to do as they like with it, subject, of course, to the observance of all relevant statutory provisions and regulations."

B

C In reaching this conclusion their Lordships have not taken into consideration the view or belief of either Simon Borys or the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1906 or thereafter as to what was included in the term petroleum. Probably they had none, and, in any case, it has to be remembered that what has to be sought is the vernacular meaning of the word "petroleum" and not what opinion was held by the parties to the grant, but, indeed, their Lordships would observe that they find it difficult to believe that either landowners, business men or engineers, or, indeed, the staff of the Canadian Pacific Railway or Simon Borys, would at any time have differentiated between the oil and the gas in solution. They would, in the view of the Board, have included in petroleum all the liquid substance in the mine, and this view in no way conflicts with the testimony of the appellant's lay witnesses.

D

E But, even if it be conceded that petroleum means a substance formed from a hydrocarbon admixture in its liquid form when in position in its container under ground, the difficulty still arises as to the method by which it is to be recovered and the means by which it is to be brought to the surface. Three elements are normally made use of for this purpose and are perhaps well illustrated by a consideration of the conditions subsisting in the premises now under consideration. In the container in question are to be found three layers, (i) on top, the gas cap, (ii) the oil with gas in solution, and (iii) water. The petroleum is recovered by ensuring that the orifice into the container is neither at too high nor at too low a level. The object is (i) to take advantage of the pressure of the gas cap to push the oil upwards; (ii) to assist the oil to mount by the help of the gas in solution; and (iii) to make use of the upward surge of the underlying water to push up the intervening petroleum. Each plays its part in the recovery of the liquid oil. Perhaps the most important element is the uprising of the water as the pressure above is released, but all three are essential if the greatest recovery of oil is to be obtained. The result, however, of tapping the reservoir in this way is to obtain with the oil the gas in solution to turn it into gas on the surface and to appropriate it. A further result is that some of the gas in the gas cap emerges with the petroleum and the gas-owner is thereby deprived of some of the unreserved property.

H Whatever might be the consequence of a reservation of petroleum together with a right to work it, the grant in the present case contains no such right, and, says the appellant, gives no right in the respondents to interfere with the gas in the cap or to deprive him of his property in it. In their Lordships' opinion, the absence of a clause giving a right to work does not abrogate or limit the powers of the respondents. Inherently the reservation of a substance, which is of no advantage unless a right to work it is added, makes the reservation useless unless that right follows the grant. The true view is that such a reservation necessarily implies the existence of power to recover it and of the right of working. Rowbotham v. Wilson (2) states the proposition in plain terms in a case where no right to work was given, and, though a right to work is to be found in Ramsay v. Blair (3), LORD HATHERLEY states (1 App. Cas. 704):

"In the case of the Duke of Hamilton v. Graham (4) it was clearly pointed out what the exact right of a proprietor was in respect of a property excepted from a demise; and as to which therefore all the original rights of the demising proprietor remained, together with all the incidents to that property necessary to its working and enjoyment, that which the owner has reserved to himself being as much his as other parts of his land of which he has made no demise whatever."

So far as their Lordships know, the general proposition has never been controverted except in the case of interference with the surface of land which has been granted to another. In such a case there is, in general, no right to let down the surface. In the present case, however, there is no suggestion that the withdrawal of the petroleum or gas will interfere with the surface in any way. But the contention that such a right gives no permission to interfere with the property of others or in the present instance to let the free gas escape requires further consideration and depends on the legal position of the owner of land in which fugacious matter is found. The appellant maintained that the gas was his at any rate while in situ and that the true comparison was with the right of support. The respondents, he said, had no more right to pierce the container and allow the gas to escape than the respondents had in Trinidad Asphalt Co. v. Ambard (5), to withdraw the support which their land afforded to the pitch which formed the main ingredient of the appellant's land. It was not suggested on behalf of the respondents in the present case that there existed any circumstances which might empower them to let down or interfere with the surface of the land except the right to enter on the appellant's land, to sink a shaft, and to recover the petroleum, nor was such a right denied by the appellant. The dispute centred round the contention raised on behalf of the appellant that he must not be deprived of the benefit of his gas, a loss which would follow and be the result of opening the container and allowing the oil to escape. To this contention the respondents reply that a distinction has to be drawn between a right to support and a right to property. A long series of decisions, they say, affirms that percolating water may be withdrawn from under the land of an owner by pumping operations on other land adjoining his and such operations give no redress to the person whose water is tapped, and gas is even more fugacious than water and must be treated on the same principles. This proposition is not denied, but does not conclude the matter. The respondents' contention is not that they are entitled to withdraw gas from their own land and to continue to withdraw gas from the same orifice though such gas may have flowed or percolated from under property which is not theirs. Their claim is to use gas which is in situ under the appellant's land or which percolates under it as a result of the normal method of recovering the petroleum by using the gas to assist in drawing it to the surface.

A good deal of authority in the American and Canadian courts has been quoted showing the diverse view entertained in different countries and in the various states in the U.S.A. Some maintain that gases, oils and waters, being fugacious elements, do not belong to the owner of the soil in which they are found, not even when in situ: like wild animals they are only the subject of ownership when reduced into possession. The other view is that, so long as they remain in situ, they belong to the owner of the soil, but are subject, if one may use the expression, to defeasance in case they move elsewhere before the owner of the soil reduces them into possession. For the purpose of their decision their Lordships are prepared to assume that the gas whilst in situ is the property of the appellant even though it has not been reduced into possession, but the question is not whose property the gas is, but what means the respondents may use to recover their petroleum. That the method which they are permitted to adopt under the judgment of the Appeal Court is the ordinary way of working today is of some assistance to their argument despite the fact that in 1906 the tendency was to regard gas as a danger and a nuisance rather than a help. But the main strength of the respondents' case is that they have a direct grant of the petroleum, whereas the appellant has merely such residual rights as remain in him subject to the grant to the respondents. In such circumstances their Lordships are not prepared to hold that the respondents are under an obligation to conserve the appellant's gas with the consequent denial of their right to recover the petroleum in the usual way. Even if it be conceded that the respective rights of the two parties are to work for and recover each his own property (i.e., in the case of the respondents, the petroleum, and in the case of the appellant, the gas), it does not follow that neither can act without the consent of the other and that only by mutual agreement can they work at all. It may well be that the appellant can recover his own substance by any usual and customary method, but cannot prevent the respondents from following a similar course. It is not, however, necessary to come to any conclusion on this matter, since the claim is concerned only with the respondents' right to work and method of working and does not involve any decision as to how the appellant may deal with the gas. As has been said, no question arises as to a right of support either of the surface or of a lower layer. Their Lordships, accordingly, refrain from analysing the many cases on subsidence which were quoted to them. The issue is rather as to the right of fortuitous abstraction of gas, leaving the surface as it was. Such a question, in their Lordships' view, gives rise to no consideration of the right of support, but only involves the right of taking from an orifice, bored under express power given in that behalf, fugacious material which makes its way to the surface as a result of natural effluxion. They agree with the Appellate Division that there is no obligation on the respondents to take steps to prevent its egress or to refrain from connecting the orifice with the oil bed.

Such a conclusion confirms the judgment appealed from, subject to one consideration, viz.: Are the rights of the respondents in any way destroyed or curtailed by the fact that the reservation is a reservation only and does not in terms give a right to work? It was suggested on the appellant's behalf that Barnard-Argue-Roth-Stearns Oil & Gas Co., Ltd. v. Farquharson (6) was an authority for the proposition, not only that petroleum and gas are different substances, but that, in working the reserved petroleum, the respondents must take care to preserve the appellant's gas. In that case the actual reservation was of springs of oil, and their Lordships are not prepared to decide that "springs of oil" and "petroleum" bear the same meaning, but for the purpose of dealing with the argument will assume that they do. Nevertheless, though it is true that a distinction is drawn between oil and gas, that distinction was between the liquid substance and the gas as found in the earth. As LORD ATKINSON said in delivering the judgment of the Board ([1912] A.C. 869):

"It is clearly established by the evidence that this gas is not volatilized rock oil, nor is rock oil condensed natural gas. The gas is not an exhalation of the oil, *nor is it held in solution by the oil to any considerable extent. The gas and the oil are in their chemical composition no doubt both hydrocarbons, but they are distinct and different products, and it therefore could not be contended successfully, their Lordships think, that the words 'springs of oil' cover this natural gas, simply because both are found, in some cases, to impregnate the same subterranean porous stratum, and that when this stratum is tapped by a pipe or boring leading to the surface the gas in its escape to the upper air helps to bring up to the surface with it some of the oil."

* The italics are their Lordships'.

And it is clear from the judgment as a whole that the question of the respective right to the gas in solution was not a serious element affecting the ultimate decision. If it had been, a different result might have followed. The judgment goes on (ibid., 870):

"In some instances a stratum almost entirely impregnated with gas is found separated by a stratum impervious to both gas and oil from a stratum almost entirely impregnated with oil. Both the impregnated strata are then tapped by pipes so arranged that the gas performs the same function as in the other case, bringing, or helping to bring, the oil to the surface; but in both cases, when the pressure under which the gas is pent up in the earth is relieved, a pump has to be used to pump up the oil."

From those observations it appears that in some instances the appellant tapped oil sealed in a different container and used it to assist in bringing up the oil. In such a case it may well be said that the oil owners are not recovering their oil in the normal way, but drawing Mr. Farquharson's oil from a separate receptacle. The result of merely using the gas in the same container in a normal working of their oil is dealt with at the end of the judgment, where it is said (ibid., 871):

"The company are clearly entitled to search and work for oil in these springs of oil, and to win and carry it away from them, provided they do so in a reasonable manner, and do as little injury as is practicable. While the point does not arise in this appeal for decision, their Lordships think that the company would not be responsible for any inconvenience or loss which might be caused to the respondent or to the owners of the estate of the grantee in the conduct of their operations in the manner mentioned":

a statement which accords with the decision of the Appellate Court in Alberta, and in their Lordships' opinion expresses the true view.

In the circumstances of this case the absence of a clause giving a right to work does not, as their Lordships have intimated, affect the respondents' position. A reservation by a landowner of the mines and minerals, or, indeed, in specific terms, of petroleum, is meaningless unless it is accompanied by the right to work and to recover the substance reserved. No question arises as to the right of tenant for life or remainderman. There has been an out-and-out reservation and an out-and-out transfer of the subject of the reservation. Under these conditions, in their Lordships' view, the reservation must imply a right to work.

They are, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the Appellate Division is right in all respects and will humbly advise Her Majesty to dismiss the appeals of both parties. There will be no costs of the appeals.

Appeals dismissed.

REEVES v. DEANE-FREEMAN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Birkett and Romer, L.J.J.), January 30, February 2, 1953.]

Public Authority—Limitation of action—Soldier on duty—Member of Canadian forces—Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act, 1933 (c. 6), s. 2 (3) (b)—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 21 (1).

A As the result of a collision on Nov. 14, 1946, between the plaintiff, who was riding a motor bicycle, and a lorry belonging to the Canadian army and driven by the defendant, who was a private soldier in the Canadian army, in the course of his duty, the plaintiff, on Dec. 2, 1949, issued a writ in an action for damages for personal injuries against the defendant.

B HELD: an act done by a soldier in Her Majesty's army in the course of duty was done in pursuance of a public duty within s. 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939; by s. 2 (3) (b) of the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act, 1933, members of the Canadian army were put in the same position in relation to this matter as members of the home forces; and, therefore, the action could not be maintained, it not having been commenced before the expiration of one year from the date on which the cause of action accrued.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of LORD GODDARD, C.J., dated July 23, 1952, and reported [1952] 2 All E.R. 506.

On Nov. 14, 1946, a collision occurred between the plaintiff, who was riding a motor bicycle, and a lorry belonging to the Canadian army and driven by the defendant, a private soldier in the Canadian army, in the course of his duty.

On Dec. 2, 1949, the plaintiff issued a writ claiming damages for personal injury suffered by him which, he alleged, had been caused by the negligence of the defendant in the driving of the lorry. The defendant denied negligence, alleged that the matters complained of were caused by the negligence of the plaintiff, and in para. 4 of his defence pleaded:

"Further the defendant was driving the said lorry in the course of his duties as a member of His Majesty's Canadian armed forces, and he will contend that the plaintiff's cause of action against him (if any, which is denied) is barred by the provisions of the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21."

On Mar. 11, 1952, PARKER, J., in chambers ordered that the issues of law raised by that paragraph be set down and disposed of before the trial of the action. At the trial of the issue LORD GODDARD, C.J., held that, as the defendant was driving the lorry in pursuance of a public duty, he then being a soldier in His Majesty's army, he was protected by the provisions of the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), the provisions of s. 2 (3) (b) of the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act, 1933, putting members of British Commonwealth forces while in this country in the same position as members of home forces.

Vester for the plaintiff.

P. M. O'Connor for the defendant.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The Limitation Act, 1939, did not repeal the provisions of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1, with which the cases to be cited dealt, but s. 21 of the later Act provided:

"(1) No action shall be brought against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty or authority, unless it is commenced before the expiration of one year from the date on which the cause of action accrued: Provided that where the act, neglect or default is a continuing one, no cause of action in respect thereof shall be deemed to have accrued, for the purposes of this sub-section, until the act, neglect or default has ceased. (2) The foregoing provisions of this section shall not apply to any action to which the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, does not apply, or to any criminal proceedings. (3) The enactments specified in the schedule to the said Act shall, so far as they relate to the limitation of actions, prosecutions or other proceedings in England and are not repealed by the said Act, be repealed."

The learned Lord Chief Justice said early in his judgment:

"The points which arise in the case and which have been argued before me are whether a soldier on duty is entitled to the protection of the section as being a public authority engaged in a public duty, and, secondly, whether the Act in any case affords protection to a member of the Canadian forces even on the assumption that it would to a member of the British forces."

Counsel for the plaintiff, in arguing the appeal, dealt with the first question first, and I will do the same. The learned Lord Chief Justice referred to Merlihan v. A. C. Pope, Ltd. (Pagnello, Third Party) (1), and Hordern-Richmond, Ltd. v. Duncan (2), in which the Act had been applied in favour, in the first case, of a member of the Canadian armed forces, and, in the second place, in favour of a sergeant in the British army. In neither of those cases was the point which was argued before the learned Lord Chief Justice raised. He then proceeded to refer to a Scottish case, Wilson v. 1st Edinburgh City Royal Garrison Artillery Volunteers (3), which was an action for damages against a regiment of volunteers and the officer commanding the regiment, as representing the regiment and also as an individual, by the father of a child who was killed on the public street by an ammunition waggon, the horses of which had bolted. The pursuer averred that the accident had been caused by the fault of the commanding officer in not seeing that quiet horses were used, that competent drivers were employed, that the waggons were driven according to military regulations, and that a competent commissioned officer was present to superintend the parade. The action was not raised within six months after the date of the accident, and it was held that the action against the commanding officer as an individual was excluded by the statute on the ground that the fault averred against him was neglect of duty in his public capacity as commanding officer.

That case was referred to with approval in The Danube II (4) where there had been a collision in the Thames Estuary between a ship which was on a voyage to Middlesbrough in ballast and a battle practice target which was being towed from Portsmouth to Scapa Flow. The defendant, who was a lieutenant in the Royal Naval Reserve in charge of the tug, pleaded that he was acting in pursuance or execution, or intended execution, of a public duty or authority, and that, as the action had not been begun within six months after the act, neglect or default complained of, he was protected by the Act. It was held by this court that the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, applied to servants of the Crown acting within the scope of their public duties, and the Act was not impliedly repealed as regards actions in respect of damage by collision at sea by the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, s. 8, and, therefore, the defendant was protected. LORD STERNDALÉ, M.R., said ([1921] P. 187):

" . . . it seems to me that a man who, under the orders of the Crown—in this case the Admiralty which is a department of the Crown—is taking a battle target to Scapa Flow for the purposes of the fleet, is undoubtedly engaged in a public duty. Perhaps no member of the public could complain if he did not take it; but certainly he was doing what was for the benefit of the public, and under the authority of the Crown; and it can, I think, hardly be denied that the Crown is a public authority. I think, therefore, that the Act applies to this case, and that none of the cases to which we have been referred in any way militate against that view. The same view has been held in cases not binding upon us, by LAWRENCE, J., and DARLING, J., and it also seems to me to be involved in the decision in Wilson v. 1st Edinburgh City Royal Garrison Artillery Volunteers (3). In my opinion, therefore, the first point fails."

SCRUTTON, L.J., put it in this way (ibid., 188):

" . . . I share the difficulty that the House of Lords felt in Bradford Corpn. v. Myers (5), in knowing exactly what the limit is in the Public Authorities Protection Act between those acts which are protected by the measure of limitation and those acts which are not. But on the best consideration I can give to the matter it appears to me that the Admiralty were under a public duty to make provision for public defence; that in carrying out the particular measure of sending a battle target to Scapa Flow by tug, they were carrying out that public duty; and that the neglect of the servant in charge of the tug was a 'neglect in the execution of any such duty' within the words of the Act. The particular action, therefore, is prima facie within the Public Authorities Protection Act."

Those are both cases in which the defendant was an individual, and not, as in many of these cases, a body like some local authority. In Greenwell v. Howell (6), a decision of this court, the plaintiff, a landowner, was denying that a road over his land was a public highway and was threatening proceedings against any person using it. Two officials of the county council were directed by the council, acting under the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1894, s. 26, to use the road for the purpose of formally testing the right, which they did.

The landowner brought an action of trespass against them, but at the trial it was found that the road was a public highway, and judgment was given for the defendants. It was held that the acts in respect of which the action was brought having been done by the defendants in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution, of the Local Government Act, 1894, s. 26, the case came within the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1 (b), and, therefore, the defendants were entitled to costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client under that provision. A. L. SMITH, L.J., said ([1900] 1 Q.B. 539):

"I think that, having regard to these provisions, the acts done by the defendants in pursuance of the orders given by the county council were clearly acts done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of an Act of Parliament."

Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that in certain House of Lords cases there is doubt thrown on that case. I do not accept that submission. The first case to which he referred was Bradford Corpn. v. Myers (5). The problem there being dealt with seems to me to have been quite a different one. In that case the defendants, who were a municipal corporation, were authorised by Act of Parliament to carry on the undertaking of a gas company, and they did so. They contracted to sell and deliver a ton of coke to the plaintiff, and by the negligence of their agent the coke was shot through the plaintiff's shop window. More than six months later the plaintiff commenced an action of negligence against the defendants who pleaded s. 1 (a) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. It was held that the act complained of was not an act done in the direct execution of a statute, or in the discharge of a public duty or the exercise of a public authority, and that the Act of 1893 afforded no defence to the action. There have been other cases where that principle has been applied. The principle is summed up concisely, though the line may be difficult to draw, by VISCOUNT MAUGHAM in Griffiths v. Smith (7), where he says ([1941] 1 All E.R. 76):

"My Lords, since the decision of this House in Bradford Corpn. v. Myers (5), and the tacit or express approval of the cases to which I have referred, it has been impossible to doubt (if it was doubtful before) that it is not essential that a public authority seeking to rely on the Act of 1893 must show that the particular act or default in question was done or committed in discharge, or attempted discharge, of a positive duty imposed on the public authority. It is sufficient to establish that the act was in substance done in the course of exercising for the benefit of the public an authority or a power conferred on the public authority not being a mere incidental power, such as a power to carry on a trade."

It is not enough to show that it is simply intra vires. Having considered that case and the other cases to which we were referred, I can find nothing in them intended to throw any doubt on the principle laid down in Greenwell v. Howell (6), that the servants of a public body, acting in the execution of duties which would be within the Act, are not outside its protection. Indeed, there are sentences which, I think, point the other way.

The learned Lord Chief Justice clearly had the principle of the Bradford case (5) in mind. He says ([1952] 2 All E.R. 508):

"It was for this reason that, before deciding, I required an admission, not only that the defendant was on duty, but also as to the nature of the duty, for I can conceive that, if, let us say, the commanding officer of a battalion or depot had to attend some social function, such as a regimental sports meeting or a special church service, for which it might be proper for him to use an army car, it might be that the driver would not be acting in pursuance of a public duty, and, if an accident took place on the journey, he might not be protected by the section. The evidence showed that on the day in question the defendant was on a journey from the army garage to Waterloo station for duty in connection with the railway transport officer and that his journey had been authorised by the officer commanding the transport company. It seems to me, therefore, clear, that this was a journey which he was required by his military duty to undertake and that the duty was in connection with army service . . .”

A Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that we should not regard that evidence and we should reverse the judgment on that point. I do not take that view. I would have said myself, agreeing fully with the learned Lord Chief Justice, that the proper inference from that report was that at the time of this accident the defendant was carrying out his military duties.

B The next point taken by counsel for the plaintiff was that a private soldier driving a lorry cannot be a public authority. That, of course, would involve what seems to me an impossible distinction. No doubt, in Greenwell's case (6) the two defendants were doing a positive act of walking along a highway. But, on the other hand, in The Danube II (4) the claim was based on an allegation of negligence in navigation. In that case, as I have said, the commander of the tug was a naval officer, but one can imagine some boat being sent, whether pulling a target or not, on what would equally be a naval duty where the person in charge might be a warrant officer, or, indeed, a rating. I cannot see how one could apply the principle as laid down by SCRUTTON, L.J., to one case and not to the other.

C The plaintiff's next point was that a soldier driving a lorry on a highway as in this case should be regarded as not engaged in the execution of his duties, but that the accident in the present case should be regarded as caused by a breach of a private right. I find great difficulty about that. In the ordinary case the plaintiff is complaining of a breach of his private rights, but once one comes to the conclusion, to which I have come, that the neglect occurred in the carrying out of a duty, I do not think that that submission avails the plaintiff. Once one finds that the claim is based on some act or neglect in carrying out duties, it seems to me, having regard to the cases which I have cited, that the Act applies. On that point, therefore, I agree with the learned Lord Chief Justice, and for the same reasons as he gave.

D As to the second point, the question whether the Act does not apply because the defendant was a Canadian soldier, the learned Lord Chief Justice decided in the defendant's favour, having regard to s. 2 (3) of the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act, 1933. Counsel for the plaintiff, in his approach to the construction of that section, submitted that, apart from that Act and having regard to the position of the Canadian forces, the duty could not be one within the Limitation Act, 1939. We have not to decide that point, but counsel for the defendant submitted that, if visiting forces are here—whether Dominion, or, as in war, foreign, forces—prima facie, at any rate, it would be proper to regard them when carrying out military duties as fulfilling a duty within the Act of 1939. As I have said, one has not got to decide the point, and if it was argued difficult questions might well arise. The only relevance, I think, is this. If there is any ambiguity in the Act which we have to construe, is it the type of protection which one might well expect to be applied by Parliament to visiting forces? I think it is, but I also think the words of the Act of 1933 are plain, and, therefore, the question as to the position apart from it does not arise. The relevant words are to be found in s. 2 (3) and I will read paras. (a) and (b), though the part in question is para. (b):

H “Subject as hereinafter provided, any enactment (whether contained in the Naval Discipline Act, the Army Act, the Air Force Act or any other statute) which—(a) exempts, or provides for the exemption of, any vessel, vehicle, aircraft, machine or apparatus of, or employed for the purposes of, the home forces or any of them from the operation of any enactment; or (b) in virtue of a connection with the home forces or any of them, confers a privilege or immunity on any person . . . shall, with any necessary modifications, apply in relation to a visiting force as it would apply in relation to a home force of a like nature to the visiting force."

Having regard to the general intention of that sub-section to be gathered from its terms and the generality of the words used, I think the learned Lord Chief Justice was right in saying that the Limitation Act, 1939, fell to be applied to a visiting force as it would apply to a home force of a like nature to the visiting force. In those circumstances, I think that point also fails, and I would dismiss the appeal.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. I agree with the judgment which has been delivered and also with that of the learned Lord Chief Justice. The words of s. 21 (1) of the Act of 1939 are very wide, as, indeed, were the terms of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1 (a):

"No action shall be brought against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty or authority, unless it is commenced before the expiration of one year from the date on which the cause of action accrued . . ."

I observe that in Edwards v. Metropolitan Water Board (8), to which a casual reference was made in the course of the argument, SCRUTTON, L.J., having cited the words of the Public Authorities Protection Act, which are substantially those of s. 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, said ([1922] 1 K.B. 303):

"As the legislature was codifying and replacing a large number of clauses in slightly different language, no doubt it used very wide words. Five years after the Act was passed LINDLEY, M.R., foresaw the difficulties that would arise. 'It is not necessary', he said in Fiedlen v. Morley Corpn. (9) ([1899] 1 Ch. 4), 'to consider what cases, if any, do not fall within the Act, although apparently within the words. I add that by way of precaution, because some day there will probably be a great discussion as to what acts or defaults do or do not come within it . . .'"

That forecast has been amply fulfilled. SCRUTTON, L.J., in the same judgment pointed out that in Bradford Corpn. v. Myers (5), there was the true fulfilment of the words of the Master of the Rolls. He quoted (ibid., 304) these words of LORD HALDANE ([1916] 1 A.C. 250) which I want to apply to the present case:

"It is often obvious from the words he has employed that the draftsman has had instructions which have been too vague and insufficient to admit of the expression of a comprehensive principle with exactness, or at all. In such a case the court can only take the particular facts in the case before it, and decide as best it can whether they come within the words, or whether they fall altogether outside them."

There are two other passages I wish to quote ([1922] 1 K.B. 304):

"There are two statements in that case [Bradford Corpn. v. Myers (5)] which seem to lay down a principle. LORD BUCKMASTER said ([1916] 1 A.C. 247): 'It is because the act is one which is either an act in the direct execution of a statute, or in the discharge of a public duty, or the exercise of a public authority'."

The other passage (ibid.) contains a point of principle from LORD HALDANE ([1916] 1 A.C. 251):

"I do not think that they'—i.e., the words of the Act—'can be properly extended so as to embrace an act which is not done in direct pursuance of the provisions of the statute or in the direct execution of the duty or authority . . .”

SCRUTTON, L.J., went on to say (ibid.):

“The word ‘direct’ is not in the statute.”

A I have quoted that because I think the learned Lord Chief Justice here was concerned to see that the precise facts that he had to decide where the words of the section were so wide were clearly before him without ambiguity. My Lord has already read at length the passage in which the Lord Chief Justice dealt with the matter, but I quote these words which he said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 508):

B “The evidence showed that on the day in question the defendant was on a journey from the army garage to Waterloo station for duty in connection with the railway transport officer and that his journey had been authorised by the officer commanding the transport company. It seems to me, therefore, clear, that this was a journey which he was required by his military duty to undertake and that the duty was in connection with army service . . .”

C So the Lord Chief Justice was dealing with it as a case in which the defendant was clearly carrying out his military duty and he was careful to exclude by an ascertainment of the real facts anything which might suggest that this was a duty outside his recognised military duties. I think it is on that footing that this court has to deal with this matter. When it is argued by counsel for the plaintiff that somehow this case must be looked at, not as that of a Canadian soldier performing his military duty, but as a simple case in which he is doing a private wrong to some private person, I think that is clearly excluded by the words of the section.

D With regard to the argument based on the fact that the defendant was a Canadian soldier, I think the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act, 1933, particularly in s. 2 (3), completely covers that point:

E “Subject as hereinafter provided any enactment . . . or any other statute which . . . (b) in virtue of a connection with the home forces or any of them, confers a privilege or immunity on any person . . . shall . . . apply in relation to a visiting force as it would apply in relation to a home force of a like nature to the visiting force.”

F That, I think, must mean what the learned Lord Chief Justice said it meant. In ordinary common English it is that, if you find in any statute something which gives a privilege or an immunity to a United Kingdom soldier, that is to apply with equal force to a soldier who is a member of the Canadian army visiting the United Kingdom. I cannot think that it can mean anything else.

G I think the point taken on that matter by counsel for the plaintiff also fails. For these reasons I agree with the judgment which has just been delivered by my Lord.

H ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. It is plain that a public authority can only act through its servants or its agents, whether it be in navigating a ship or driving a lorry or challenging a right of way. Therefore, the admission of counsel for the plaintiff that certain officials of a public authority can properly be regarded as entitled to the benefit of the Public Authorities Protection Act was obviously well founded, but, as I understood him, he sought to draw a distinction between responsible or senior officials, on the one hand, and employees or representatives of a more subordinate character, on the other. I cannot see that there is any warrant for that distinction. It was not drawn in Greenwell v. Howell (6), nor is it to be found in the observations of the Court of Appeal in The Danube II (4). In Griffiths v. Smith (7), to which my Lord has referred, VISCOUNT MAUGHAM said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 77):

"That persons in a somewhat similar position to that of the managers in the present case have been treated as a public authority has been decided in numerous cases. The following are examples: river commissioners and harbour boards acting without profit (The Johannesburg (10) and Williams v. Mersey Docks & Harbour Board (11)), all kinds of sanitary, water and tramway authorities, and the officers and servants of such authorities, e.g., medical officers of health, or persons in a like position . . ."

It seems to me that, as LORD MAUGHAM's language was in perfectly general terms, it may be regarded as an authoritative recognition by him of what I should have thought was clear, namely, that, provided that a representative of a public authority is told to perform an act of public duty, then, if the other elements are present which are requisite to attract the operation of the Act, it will be attracted whatever be the position of the representative in question. Indeed, if one is to draw the kind of distinction which counsel for the plaintiff invited us to draw, it seems to me it would be a task of an impossible kind to classify officials who do qualify for protection as distinct from those who do not.

I would add one word on the point whether the defendant is disqualified from having protection because he is in the Canadian, and not in the British, army. It is not necessary to decide it because I quite agree with what has been said on the interpretation of the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act, 1933, s. 2 (3). The point might give rise to questions of fact whether a member of one or other of the Dominion forces did qualify for protection or not, depending on the circumstances and the reasons why his unit was stationed in this country. Matters of that kind might have to be considered, and I agree that that question, which was not argued elaborately before us, should be left open. I agree that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

STEPHENSON BROTHERS, LTD. v. COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE. KING AND JARRETT, LTD. v.
COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), January 27, 28, 1953.]

Purchase Tax—Chargeable goods—"Pictures"—Pictorial coupons—Use in trader's gift book advertisement scheme—Finance Act, 1948 (c. 49), s. 20 (1), sched. VIII, Part I, Group 25.

By an agreement, dated Oct. 27, 1950, the manufacturers of household polishes and furniture creams were granted a licence to use and reproduce on stamps certain characters from a motion picture, entitled "Cinderella", for distribution to persons purchasing their goods, and they undertook to supply a book containing scenes from the film to purchasers in exchange for sets of the stamps. In 1951 some ten million stamps, each depicting one or other of the "Cinderella" characters, were printed for the manufacturers by K. and J., Ltd., and another five million were printed by the manufacturers themselves. The stamps were numbered in series from one to twelve on the side on which the character was depicted, and on the reverse side of each stamp were printed instructions concerning the exchange of the stamps for the book containing scenes of the film which would be supplied by the manufacturers to the holders of sets of stamps numbered one to twelve. The stamps were then inserted in descriptive folders and attached to goods which the manufacturers sold to retailers for re-sale to the public. No additional charge was made for the stamps. On the question whether the stamps were chargeable goods for the purposes of purchase tax, within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1948, s. 20 (1),

HELD: as purchase tax became exigible at the time when an article was delivered to the retailer, the nature of the article and its liability to tax fell to be determined at that time; applying that test, the stamps were pictorial coupons, but in the circumstances the pictorial element was so important that, notwithstanding that they were coupons, they were pictures within Group 25 of sched. VIII, Part I, to the Act of 1948; and, therefore, they were chargeable goods for the purposes of purchase tax, within s. 20 (1) of the Act.

FOR THE FINANCE ACT, 1948, s. 20, and sched. VIII, Part I, Group 25, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 21, pp. 1372, 1390.

ACTIONS for, inter alia, declarations that stamps printed by or for Stephenson Brothers, Ltd., the plaintiffs in the first action, were not chargeable goods for the purposes of purchase tax, within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1948,
s. 20 (1).

The stamps, which were affixed to goods manufactured by Stephenson Brothers, Ltd. (referred to hereinafter as Stephensons) and sold by them wholesale, depicted characters from the film "Cinderella". On the face of each stamp was a number, in the series one to twelve, and on the reverse side were instructions for exchanging a set of twelve stamps for a book to be supplied by Stephensons. The first action was brought by Stephensons in respect of (a) five million stamps printed by themselves and (b) a hundred thousand stamps purchased by them from King and Jarrett, Ltd., printers.
The second action was brought by King and Jarrett, Ltd., in respect of ten million stamps printed by them for Stephensons on the instructions of another company.

J. W. P. Clements for the plaintiffs.

J. P. Ashworth for the Commissioners of Customs and Excise.

ROXBURGH, J.: Stephenson Brothers, Ltd. (referred to hereinafter as Stephensons), are manufacturers of furniture cream and floor polish. Walt Disney Mickey Mouse, Ltd., deal with the copyright, among other things, of cartoons by Walt Disney, whether they be of Mickey Mouse or of other similar characters. By a licence, dated Oct. 27, 1950, made between Walt Disney Mickey Mouse, Ltd., as licensor, and Stephensons, as licensee, it is recited:

"Whereas (1) The licensor by virtue of certain agreements between it and Walt Disney Productions an American corporation claims authority to license within the territory hereinafter defined the use and exploitation of the fanciful character or characters specified in cl. 1 of the schedule hereto as personified and represented by Walt Disney for motion picture purposes (which character or characters are hereinafter for convenience referred to as 'the fanciful character' and this collective description shall where the context requires and admits be deemed to relate severally to each fanciful character to which this licence relates) in connection with the manufacture and marketing of certain classes of commodities and merchandise. (2) The licensee realising the great value of the publicity and goodwill connected with the fanciful character and the name 'Walt Disney' and that it has established an identity for itself and for the products bearing its name and/or design in the mind of the purchasing public is desirous of obtaining authority within the territory hereinafter defined to reproduce and/or associate the name of the fanciful character together with the name 'Walt Disney' and/or the name of the licensor in connection with certain merchandise of the licensee as hereinafter defined and the licensor has agreed to permit such use upon the terms hereinafter contained."

By cl. 1 of the licence it is agreed that

"For the term specified in cl. 2 of the schedule hereto [from Oct. 1, 1950, to Sept. 30, 1952] the licensor authorises the licensee to use and reproduce the fanciful character and the name 'Walt Disney' and/or the name of the licensor on upon and/or in connection with the sale of certain articles of merchandise as defined in cl. 3 of the schedule hereto (which merchandise is hereinafter for the purpose of this licence referred to as 'licensed articles') and the licensor has or will supply to the licensee all necessary typical representations of the fanciful character."

By cl. 1 of the schedule, "the fanciful character" includes various fanciful characters from the Walt Disney full-length motion picture production "Cinderella", the names of which are "Cinderella", "The Prince", "The King", "The Duke", "Fairy Godmother", "Stepmother", "Drizella", "Anastasia", "Bruno", "Lucifer", "Gus", "Jaq" and "Lackey". By cl. 3 of the schedule, the licensed articles are:

"Furniture cream and floor polish manufactured by the licensee affixed to which in a manner to be approved by the licensor are printed representations of the fanciful characters in four colour half tones in the form of poster stamps of a size one and five-eighths inches deep by one and three-sixteenths inches wide."

The consideration for the licence was a substantial lump sum payment.

Clause 28 of the licence is relevant:

"The licensee further undertakes that premium material shall be supplied by the licensee to purchasers of licensed articles in exchange for licensed stamps in a manner to be approved by the licensor and that such premium material shall consist exclusively of a stereoscopic eye-piece and a 'Magic Mirror Picture Book' containing six scenes from the Disney film 'Cinderella' which book shall be published and printed (by one of the licensees of the licensor to be selected in agreement with the licensee in a form and upon terms to be approved by the licensor) in such manner that when viewed through a stereoscopic eye-piece such scenes will appear in stereoscopic relief."

A That licence contains the genesis of the scheme which Stephensons put into operation. There are two actions before me. One is by Stephensons and the other is by King and Jarrett, Ltd., but the point in both is precisely the same, though an argument is available in one of the cases which is not available in the other. The point is whether or not the poster stamps envisaged by the licence, and, in fact, produced, are liable to purchase tax. It is common ground that, if they are liable, it is because they fall into Group 25 of the Finance Act, 1948, sched. VIII, Part I (as amended). Group 25 now stands as follows:

B " Pictures, prints, engravings, photographs, figures, busts, reliefs, vases, and similar articles, of a kind produced in quantity for general sale other than articles comprised in para. (d) or (i) of Group 11 or in para. (c) or (d) of Group 34."

C It has not so stood at all material times, but I have carefully considered, with the assistance of counsel and those instructing them, the various changes which have been made in that group and the various dates at which those changes have been made, and I have come to the conclusion that the changes do not and should not influence my decision, and it is, therefore, quite sufficient to take the group as it now stands.

D The point is a short one, but this is a case which is very near the line, and I do not regret the considerable time which it has taken to hear, because to the very end I have thought it difficult. What happened was this. Having got the licence, Stephensons proceeded to get poster stamps printed. They did not always adopt the same method, and, as there is a point of distinction, I must describe the three methods which they adopted. As regards an order for ten million such stamps, in or about January, 1951, King and Jarrett, Ltd. (referred to hereinafter as Kings), the plaintiffs in the second action, received an order from Barney, Ltd. to print ten million stamps and deliver them to Stephensons. The blocks were supplied by Barneys to Kings. After some discussion which took place at the first hearing, the statement of claim has been amended, and there is no dispute now that, as regards those ten million stamps, there was a sale of the stamps by Kings to Barneys, and at that time, as between Kings and Barneys, they were nothing but pieces of paper containing pictorial representations of the fanciful character. It is true that they had on them certain other material, to which I shall shortly refer, but, as between Kings and Barneys, that other material was of no consequence whatever. In October, 1951, Stephensons ordered a hundred thousand stamps direct from Kings. In that case Barneys dropped out, but it is conceded that that transaction stands on the same footing as the transaction between Kings and Barneys. Then there was a third method which raises an additional point.

G In September, 1951, five million of these stamps were printed by Stephensons.

The stamps, apart from bearing printed cartoons of the nature described in the licence, bear prominently on the face a number. The numbers run from one to twelve. On the back of each stamp is written:

H " Wonderful book for you. Collect a set of these stamps numbered 1 to 12. Send to Stephenson Brothers, Ltd., Bradford, with 1s. P.O. to cover post and packing, any time before Dec. 31, 1952, for wonderful ' Magic Wand ' Book, value 7s. 6d."

That is the book referred to in cl. 28 of the licence agreement. It was, undoubtedly, an integral part of the whole scheme from its inception that these cartoons should be used in connection with a coupon scheme which, in the result, redounded to the benefit both of the licensor and the licensee, because the book is connected with copyright characters. The printed matter at the back of each stamp then goes on to say:

"Stamps come with Stephenson's Non-Smear Polish, Stephenson's Perfumed Wax Polish and Stephenson's Furniture Cream. Use all three products and get your set quicker."

One of these stamps was put inside a small folder, which was attached to each licensed article by a piece of transparent tape. On the folder were the words: "Your Cinderella stamps are here". The licensed articles were supplied by Stephenson's to retailers who sold them to the public generally. A

I shall deal first with a question which concerns only the transaction in which Stephenson's printed their own poster stamps. This question is whether these stamps are "goods" within the meaning of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 62 (1). By s. 41 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940, the definition of "goods" in s. 62 (1) of the Act of 1893 is incorporated into the Act of 1940, which imposed the purchase tax. By s. 62 (1) of the Act of 1893, "'Goods' include all chattels personal other than things in action . . ." B

Seeing that one became entitled to a book, valued at 7s. 6d., if one produced a set of twelve stamps in the manner directed on them, I had at one time thought that they might be choses in action, but, on further consideration, I think that that is not really a possible view for the following reasons. First, I think it cannot be put higher than that each stamp contains an offer of a contract and no more. The stamp cannot, I think, constitute a contract, i.e., a contract in writing or a memorandum of a contract in writing, and, therefore, in my judgment, it cannot be regarded as a chose in action. Secondly, each stamp is sold separately. (It is conceded that they are sold—I do not have to determine that point.) One of them per se is nothing at all except an offer of a contract. Even if one accepts the offer, one does not reach a further stage until one has got twelve in a set. It is not an easy thing to achieve. Mathematicians in court have calculated the chances, in other words, how many boxes on the average one would have to buy to get a set. I am quite unable to embark on such abstruse calculations, but I am satisfied that one would have to get a good many, certainly more than twelve—I think it would be a very remarkable coincidence if one got twelve straight off. Therefore, I do not think that they are choses in action. C

I now come to the main point, which is the more difficult point. Are these poster stamps "Pictures . . . of a kind produced in quantity for general sale", within the meaning of the words in which Group 25 is described in sched. VIII, Part I, to the Finance Act, 1948. It is quite clear that they are not exclusively pictures. They operate as something more. But I do not think that that is in any way fatal to the Crown's case. If there is a dual purpose article, it would not cease to be a picture, within the definition of Group 25, because it was sold for some other purpose. On the other hand, I am satisfied that not every pictorial representation on a document or other article is necessarily a picture within this definition. Therefore, the question is a very nice and narrow one. It seems to me, first, that the nature of the article has to be tested at the moment when it is delivered to the retailer. That is the moment at which the purchase tax becomes exigible, and, obviously, it must be then that liability to tax falls to be determined, and, therefore, it is then that it has to be decided whether the article falls into some, and, if so, which, group. But it is also, I think, true to say that one has to look forward and consider the article, not in relation to the middleman, as counsel for the taxpayers suggested, but in the hands of the ultimate consumer. That, I think, is indicated by the words "for general sale", which I construe as meaning "for sale to the public generally". Looking at the language of sched. VIII, Part I, to the Act of 1948, in which Group 25 is described, I think that what one has to do is, first, to consider, at the time when the goods are being delivered to the retailer, what D
H

A the article is, and, having made up one's mind what it is, one then has to consider whether it is of a kind produced in quantity for sale to the public generally. I do not think in this case that any difficulty arises on those latter words, because this kind of thing is very common and has been so for many years. It is not seriously contested before me that these articles, whatever they are (that is the real difficulty), are not "of a kind produced in quantity for general sale". In fact, Stephensons alone produced or caused to be produced several million.

B The real question is: What is the article at the time when it is delivered to the retailer? It is always dangerous to try to put glosses on the words of an Act of Parliament, and I am not going to try to do that. It is enough to say that I think one has to look at the substance of the question. Here is an article. It has various features. Taking it as a whole, what is it? As I have said, the fact that it contains a pictorial representation is not, in my judgment, decisive. There still is the question: Is it properly to be described as a picture? Counsel for the taxpayers contended that, though there was a pictorial representation, the number on the article, which lacked artistic attraction, clearly showed that the article was not a picture. He further contended that the words at the back of the article made it plain that it was a coupon. In my judgment, however, it is a pictorial coupon, and a pictorial coupon may, or may not, be a picture. It must, I think, depend on the facts of each particular case. Imagine a coupon which contained all the information printed on these and, in addition, had some very inferior pictorial representation of, say, a lion or a cat stamped or printed on it. It would be a pictorial coupon. D I am by no means sure that it would be a picture. But this case is quite different. Walt Disney cartoons are universally known, and beloved by many, and Stephensons themselves have told me what importance they attach to these cartoons as cartoons. That is also clear from para. 2 of the recital to the licence. That is not evidence against them, because evidence is not admissible on this matter, but I rely on it merely to confirm the view which I take, namely, that these are quite definitely dual purpose stamps, and that one of their purposes is to entertain by these cartoons. That, of course, is the normal purpose of a cartoon, and, normally, a cartoon is a picture within Group 25 of sched. VIII, Part I, to the Act of 1948. To that extent the articles are for the normal purpose for which cartoons are reproduced, and are, in my judgment, pictures. On the other hand, they are plainly coupons. Therefore, in my judgment, they are pictorial coupons, but the pictorial element is so important in the particular circumstances of this case that they are, in my judgment, pictures, and none the less so because, at the same time, they are coupons. F Therefore, in my judgment, both these actions must fail.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Pearson, JJ.), February 5, 1953.]

Street Traffic—Licence—Unlicensed vehicle—User attracting higher rate of duty—Not a summary offence—Liability to excise penalty—Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949 (c. 89), s. 13 (2).

Where a person uses on a road a vehicle licensed as a goods vehicle for a purpose in respect of which a higher rate of duty should have been paid, contrary to the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949; s. 13 (2), he does not commit an offence punishable on summary conviction, but merely renders himself liable to an excise penalty recoverable on complaint laid before justices, and, therefore, no person can be convicted under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 5, of aiding and abetting the commission by him of a summary offence.

CASE STATED by Oxfordshire justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Woodstock, the appellant, Norman George Brown, an inspector of the Oxfordshire Constabulary, preferred an information against the respondents, Allweather Mechanical Grouting Co., Ltd., charging that they on June 18, 1952, did unlawfully aid, abet, counsel and procure one Joseph Cassidy in the commission of a summary offence, that is to say, in contravention of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, s. 13 (2), while there was then in force a certain licence taken out for a mechanically propelled goods vehicle at a certain rate, he did unlawfully use such vehicle on a road for a purpose which brought it within a class or description of vehicle to which a higher rate of duty was chargeable, such higher rate not having been paid before the vehicle was so used, contrary to the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 5.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents as an objection preliminary to the hearing that the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, did not create an offence which was punishable on summary conviction; that the respondents could not, therefore, be convicted of aiding and abetting such offence, contrary to the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 5; and that, if there had been a breach of the regulations whereby the local licensing authority had been deprived of a certain amount of revenue, the appropriate remedy was by way of an excise penalty against the party liable.

The justices dismissed the information and the appellant appealed.

J. P. Ashworth for the appellant.

Roland Brown for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Oxford, before whom the respondents were charged that they "did unlawfully aid, abet, counsel and procure one Cassidy in the commission of a summary offence, that is to say, in contravention of s. 13 (2) of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, while there was then in force a certain licence taken out for a mechanically propelled vehicle, namely, a goods vehicle, at a certain rate he did unlawfully use such vehicle on a certain public road called the Woodstock to Chipping Norton road for a purpose which brought it within a class or description of vehicle to which a higher rate of duty was chargeable, such higher rate not having been paid before the vehicle was so used, contrary to s. 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848."

A Counsel for the respondents has taken a point of great importance, and the court is indebted to him for doing so as this point appears not to have occurred to anybody before because there have been plenty of proceedings under the section in question in circumstances I will mention in a moment. His point was that the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, s. 13 (2), did not create an offence punishable on summary conviction, and it follows that, if that is so, s. 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, which provides for the punishment of aiders and abettors of summary offences, has no application. Concisely stated, B the argument of counsel for the respondents was that the sanction provided by the Act for using a vehicle which has one class of licence attached to it for a purpose which would require a different class of licence is a monetary penalty which can be recovered in various forms of proceedings, but the Act does not create an offence in the sense that it is punishable as a criminal offence, although a penalty may be recovered in what would generally be called penal proceedings. C It is true that, if the word "penalty", as distinct from the word "fine", is used in a section, the general rule is that the penalty must be sought and recovered as a debt in a civil court, whereas a fine is a penalty imposed by a criminal court, and a fine always goes to the Crown.

D In the present case there was alleged to have been an offence against s. 13 (2) of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949. It is observable that this is an excise Act, and, therefore, the Excise Management Act, 1827, applies to proceedings under it. Under the Act of 1949 a person using a motor vehicle for a purpose for which it is not licensed and which would attract a higher rate of licence, is made liable to an excise penalty of £20 or an excise penalty of an amount equal to three times the difference between the duty actually paid on the licence and the amount of duty at the higher rate. There are no words in s. 13 (2) which E refer to summary conviction or summary trial, or to fines, or anything to indicate that a criminal offence is created. In s. 15 of the Act, which refers to using vehicles without a licence at all, a similar penalty is imposed, that is, an excise penalty of £20 or an excise penalty "equal to three times the amount of the duty chargeable". Section 15 (2) provides:

F "Proceedings for a penalty under the last foregoing sub-section may be brought at any time within a period of twelve months from the date on which the offence was committed."

There, the word "offence" is used. A further provision in sub-s. (3) (a) obliges the owner of the vehicle to give such information as he may be required

G "... by or on behalf of a chief officer of police or a county council ... as to the identity of the driver and of any person using the vehicle and, if he fails to do so, shall be guilty of an offence under this sub-section, unless he shows to the satisfaction of the court that he did not know and could not with reasonable diligence have ascertained who was driving or using the vehicle; and (b) any other person shall, if required as aforesaid, give any information which it is in his power to give . . ."

H In sub-s. (4) it is provided:

"A person guilty of an offence under the last foregoing sub-section shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £20."

Therefore, if a person fails to give the information when he is asked for it, that is made by the statute an offence and the word "fine" is used, not "penalty". We are not considering s. 15 in the present case, but counsel for the appellant rightly drew our attention to s. 15 (1) because the subject-matter is very much the same as that of s. 13 (2). The penalty, also, is similar. It is true that it is provided in s. 15 (2) that "proceedings . . . may be brought at any time within a period of twelve months from the date on which the offence was committed". In other words, the Act is imposing an express term of limitation of twelve months. Years ago, under the old statutes, a debt created by a statute was regarded as a specialty debt, and for the present purpose a special period of limitation is provided. I do not think the mere fact that the word "offence" is used there shows that it is to be regarded as a criminal offence. A failure to do something prescribed by a statute may be described as an offence although Parliament imposes in respect of it, not a criminal sanction, but a mere pecuniary sanction which is recoverable as a civil debt. Justices, as is well known, have in many cases power to order the recovery of sums of money. If one turns to s. 65 of the Excise Management Act, 1827, one finds that excise penalties may be recovered before justices of the peace, but there is no indication in the section that the justices are able to imprison or to impose a fine. It simply gives them power to inquire into the matter and give judgment for penalties. Of course, if the penalties are not paid, there may be proceedings under the Debtors Act or other Acts—possibly, under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts—and there may be a committal to prison, but that is not a punishment for the offence itself. It is a punishment for not paying the penalty, or a means of endeavouring to compel a defendant to pay a penalty, which is a different matter.

Passages in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in A.-G. v. Bradlaugh (1), to which counsel for the respondents has directed our attention, support his argument. SIR WILLIAM BRETT, M.R., pointed out (14 Q.B.D. 687) that where a penalty is imposed for doing a particular act, the penalty is the only sanction, and the imposition of the penalty, if it is the only consequence, does not make the prohibited act a crime. It was far more common in earlier days than it is nowadays to prohibit certain acts and to impose as the sanction a penalty which often could be recovered by a common informer. There were many Acts on the statute book till the Common Informers Act, 1951, was passed to abolish that particular form of public nuisance, which provided for the recovery of penalties. A well known class of case was created by the Sunday Observance Act, 1780, under which, if a person promoted a public entertainment or amusement on a Sunday, in certain circumstances he was liable to a penalty for which he could be sued, but no one ever said that that was a criminal act. Whether it would be desirable to make these penalties criminal acts, or not, I do not know, nor need I discuss the matter, but, in my opinion, an excise penalty is something quite different from a fine. It is recoverable before justices, and it ought to be recovered by way of complaint. I would add this. Many people who see this case may think that they have been wrongly ordered to pay, but this is not a case in which this court will encourage anybody to apply for a free pardon on the ground that he was convicted of something of which he was not guilty. It may be he has been ordered to pay in a proceeding begun by information when it ought to have been begun by complaint. That is the only objection, and, if he has done the prohibited act, he has incurred the penalty which has been imposed. In my opinion, the justices came to a right decision in point of law, and, therefore, this appeal fails.

COOPER v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE (SOUTHERN REGION).

[HAMPSHIRE AUTUMN ASSIZES (Devlin, J.), December 12, 1952.]

Railway—Fence—Quality of fence required—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (c. 20), s. 68.

On Oct. 10, 1950, the plaintiff, a farmer whose land was divided by a railway line owned and operated by the defendants, rounded up his herd of cattle and divided it, keeping the calves in the farm buildings on the north side of the railway line, and putting the remainder of the herd in a field on the south side of and adjoining the line where the bellowing of the calves could be heard by the dams. This division excited the herd, and in the early morning of Oct. 11, twelve of the herd in the field broke through the defendants' fence and got on the railway line with the result that a passing train killed three beasts, being itself derailed by the collision. On a claim by the plaintiff for damages for breach by the defendants of their duty under s. 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845,

HELD: the quality of the fence which the defendants were required to maintain under the section was such as to prevent cattle from straying in normal circumstances and not such as to prevent cattle from breaking through by the use of exceptional force or under unusual conditions; in the circumstances, the fence maintained by the defendants was strong enough for all normal purposes; and, therefore, they were not in breach of their statutory duty.

ACTION by the plaintiff for damages for breach of statutory duty by the defendants in that they failed to erect and maintain a proper fence under s. 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The defendants counter-claimed for damages for trespass.

The plaintiff was a farmer whose land was divided by a railway line owned and operated by the defendants. Communication between the two parts of the plaintiff's land was obtained by an occupation crossing and a cattle creep, which was a tunnel underneath the railway, and on the south side of the line there was a fence which ran from the gate leading to the occupation crossing to the gate leading to the cattle creep. This fence was the ordinary railway fence consisting of concrete posts let into the ground several feet apart, with chain link fencing on three runner wires and three or four straining wires. The plaintiff owned a herd of Aberdeen Angus cattle, one hundred and eighty in number, which normally remained in a field on the south side of the railway line and beyond the field actually adjoining the line, the beasts being brought into the farm buildings on the north side only occasionally for grading, selecting suitable animals for market, or castrating bull calves. On Oct. 10, 1951, the herd was rounded up and brought in for grading and the castrating of the bull calves, an operation which was normally completed in one day. On this occasion the cattle were graded first, and then the bull calves needing castration were separated and kept in the buildings overnight while the rest of the herd was put in the field on the south side of, and adjoining, the railway line. This division of the herd caused a considerable amount of excitement and agitation among the beasts, and the bellowing of the calves in the farm buildings could be heard by the dams on the other side of the railway line. During the early hours of Oct. 11 some beasts had been able to lift the chain link fencing between the two gates and get underneath it, and twelve of them found their way on to the railway line with the result that at 4.45 a.m. three of them were killed by a train which was derailed by the collision.

A. Lyell for the plaintiff.

Fay for the defendants.

DEVLIN, J.: Under the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 68, a railway company—whose duties and obligations are now, of course, taken over by the defendants—is under an obligation to “ . . . make and . . . maintain . . . sufficient posts, rails . . . or other fences, for separating the land taken for the use of the railway from the adjoining lands not taken, and protecting such lands from trespass, or the cattle of the owners or occupiers thereof from straying thereout . . . ”

The defendants, therefore, are under a duty to fence so as to keep cattle off the railway. The plaintiff contends that the defendants failed to erect and maintain a proper fence, and, accordingly, he sues for breach of this statutory duty. If the fence was defective, there can be no doubt that the claim succeeds and the counterclaim fails. If, on the other hand, the fence was not defective, it is agreed that the plaintiff has no answer to an action for trespass. His beasts got on somebody else's land, and under the law of cattle trespass there is a strict liability on the owner of beasts not to let them go on somebody else's land. It is only if he can show that there was a duty on the owner of the land—that is, the defendants—to keep a proper fence and that they failed to do so that he can resist the counterclaim in trespass. It is conceded, if he has no answer to a claim for cattle trespass, that the damages which flow from it and are recoverable by the defendants are in respect of the damage they have sustained as a direct consequence of the derailment. Thus, the only question I have to determine is whether or not the fence which was erected at this place was a proper fence within the meaning of the statute. Prima facie, of course, if cattle get on a railway line, the presumption, in the absence of some satisfactory explanation, is that the fence which was supposed to have kept them off could not have been doing its duty. It is, therefore, necessary before I consider the condition of the fence itself to go a little into the history of the matter so as to see how it came about that cattle were on the railway line in the early morning of Oct. 11, 1951.

[His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The chain link fencing—and this is a point on which the plaintiff relies—was secured to the runner wires, and the runner wires in turn were secured to the posts, on the north, or railway, side of those posts. Had they been secured on the south side—that is to say, the field side—the beasts pushing against the chain link would have pushed it into the posts. As it was, they pushed it away from the posts. The runner wires which held the chain link in position were secured by “U” pins, that is, a pin with a little circle through which the wire runs and two long tails which go into a hole in the post and are bent to keep the pin in position. Some of those pins had been pulled out of the centre post by the cattle pushing against it, and in that way they had been able to lift the chain link.

I have to consider whether the fence as so constructed fulfilled all the obligations of the defendants under the statute. I am satisfied that it was as strong as any ordinary farm fence could be to offer protection against the ordinary behaviour of cattle. Indeed, it was a great deal stronger, being made of concrete posts and strong chain link fencing. The two criticisms that have been made about it are these. There is, first, that, on the assumption that the fence was well enough constructed, nevertheless it was improperly designed because the chain link was attached to the wrong side of the middle posts, though not to that of the corner post. Had it been on the right side, it was said, this would not have happened. I am satisfied from the evidence I have heard that, secured as it was by these "U" pins, the chain link fencing was secured quite strongly enough to resist all what I may call the ordinary activities of cattle—any sort of pushing and rubbing against it, which, undoubtedly, occurs when sheep or cattle are brought up against a fence. It is, no doubt, true that, if the chain link fencing had been on the other side of the posts, it might have prevented the extraordinary—one might also say violent; at any rate forcible—behaviour of the cattle on this occasion which resulted in their getting through. But I am satisfied that, if the right test is that the fence must be strong enough to prevail against the ordinary forcible behaviour of cattle in ordinary circumstances, this fence was good enough for the purpose. The fact that it might have been better is not proper ground of complaint against the defendants. They are, in my judgment, obliged, not to provide the strongest possible fence, but only to provide a fence which is proper in normal circumstances. The other criticism is as to the condition of the fence. According to the evidence of the defendants' employees, who saw it shortly before Oct. 10, the fence was in good condition, and I accept that evidence. Accordingly, I find that the fence was as strong as any ordinary farm fence—not merely a fence dividing fields, but a fence dividing fields from a place on which it is highly undesirable that cattle should go—could reasonably be expected to be, and I am satisfied that cattle behaving in a normal way would not have got through it, but only cattle using exceptional force or under unusual conditions.

It is contended for the plaintiff that that finding is not enough to absolve the defendants from blame. It is said that the operation which had taken place that day was not in any way an improper operation or contrary to the rules of good husbandry, that a proper agricultural use was, therefore, being made of the field, and that there is a duty on the defendants to make a fence strong enough to resist the consequences of any proper agricultural operation that may be conducted on the land which adjoins the railway. That involves a consideration of the true construction of the Act. The section creates, of course, an absolute obligation in the sense that the defendants are absolutely bound to maintain a fence, and it is no answer to say that some accident or act of a trespasser has made the fence defective. But the question is: What is the quality of the fence which the defendants are absolutely bound to maintain? One finds in s 68 of the Act that it is to be such a fence as will protect "... the cattle of the owners or occupiers thereof from straying thereout . . ." It is important not to ignore those words "from straying thereout", because those are the words which give a clue to the sort of fence which the defendants shall be obliged to maintain. It is protection against straying, and all the cases which have been cited to me have been cases in which the cattle have, in the ordinary sense of the word, strayed through a gap in the fence or something of that sort. It is not necessary for me to define exactly what is meant by "straying", but I do not think it could be taken to include cattle breaking through the fence by the use of exceptional force because they are subjected to some peculiar inducement or temptation to try to get through it. It may well be, of course, that constant rubbing will so weaken a fence that a cow or beast acting quite normally will ultimately break it down and stray across, but here was a fence which was in good and proper condition, but was broken through in the way which has been related. I do not think in those circumstances that cattle can be said to be breaking through a protection against straying.

I do not propose to cite more than two of the cases to which I have been referred. For this purpose the matter seems to be summed up in Child v. Hearn (1). I need not do more than read a short passage from the judgment of BRAMWELL, B. He says (L.R. 9 Exch. 181):

"Now the fence was not sufficient to prevent the defendant's pigs from trespassing, and it would seem to follow that the railway company must be liable for the consequence of the pigs escaping through it. But it does not follow as a consequence that they would be liable for any mischief done by any pig escaping on to the land through a defective fence. Nor do we lay down that there must be a fence so close and strong that no pig could push through it, or so high that no horse or bullock could leap it. One could scarcely tell the limits of such a requirement, for the strength of swine is such that they would break through almost any fence, if there were a sufficient inducement on the other side. But the company are bound to put up such a fence that a pig not of a peculiarly wandering disposition, nor under any excessive temptation, will not get through it."

That I respectfully follow as laying down the right test of the construction of the Act, and it is the test I seek to apply.

The plaintiff relied on Bessant v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2). In that case a farmer folded sheep and lambs adjoining the railway. He made three of the sides of the fold with hurdles in the ordinary way and used the railway "fence", which in fact consisted only of a quickset hedge, as the fourth side. The defendants, according to the evidence stated in the report, called several competent persons who had inspected the hedge, and they stated that it was amply sufficient for all ordinary purposes, but they all said it was not a proper fence to rely on for the folding of sheep. The sheep got through a gap in the quickset hedge, and it was held that the matter was properly left to the jury at large and they were entitled to take the view that the operation of folding was a normal farming operation and a normal use of the land which the railway company must foresee, and that they must provide a fence that was strong enough to prevent sheep or cattle from straying out of the land adjoining the railway. I do not think that the case itself decides any more than that it was proper to direct the jury that the railway company were bound by the Act to provide a fence of that quality. That direction could not reasonably be disputed though it may not be one which would be very illuminating for a jury. The case came on a rule to the full court and SIR WILLIAM EBLE, C.J., said the general direction in those terms was a proper one. There are some dicta in the case which may go a little further. In the present case the plaintiff relies, in particular, on the direction of MARTIN, B., in the court below, which was approved in the full court. He said (8 C.B.N.S. 370):

"... the broad question is, whether or not the fence was a sufficient fence,—was it such a fence as the company were bound by the Act to make?"

He went on (ibid.):

"It strikes me, that, if the use to which the adjoining land is put is such (being an ordinary use) as to render a stronger fence necessary, it would be the duty of the company to provide it; and to place hurdles along it if necessary."

I think those words are merely used by the learned baron by way of illustration and they must be read in relation to the facts of the case—in particular, to the

A fact that they were dealing with sheep folding rather than the ordinary use of the land and with a fence which was no more than an ordinary quickset hedge with a gap in it. I do not think that they meant that, whenever it is shown that the land is being used for a purpose for which a farmer may properly use it, the railway company is bound to guard against anything arising therefrom. Were it so, the burden on the railway company would be intolerable because they cannot be expected to find out exactly to what use the farmer is going to put his land on any particular day and then to strengthen a fence, which is strong enough for all normal purposes, to meet that particular use. Counsel for the plaintiff, feeling the difficulty of forcing the argument as far as that, said that the obligation would exist, at any rate, if the defendants knew of the particular use, and he says that they were told of the "round-up" of the cattle on this day. But the Act does not say anything about knowledge; it does not impose any duty on the farmer to tell the defendants of the use he is going to make of the land or for the defendants to find out. It imposes a duty to provide and maintain a fence, and the only question is: What is the quality of the fence which has to be maintained? That does not depend, I think, on the particular use which is going to be made of a particular field on a particular day. I shall on that ground, therefore, reject that argument.

C I do not strictly find it necessary for my purposes to inquire whether the use which was being made of the land on this occasion was in conformity with good husbandry—a matter which has been debated in the course of the case. I do not find that it was an improper thing to do, in the sense that it was necessarily a wrong and careless way of carrying on a farming operation, but I think I ought to express my view on the facts on this point in case it might be material hereafter. I think a prudent farmer who did not want to run the risk of his cattle escaping would not have conducted the operation in the way in which it was conducted on this day. To that extent it was carelessly done—if that is the right word to use. That is to say, if he had owed a duty to anybody else in the matter to conduct the operation in a prudent way, I do not think he would have fulfilled it by the way in which he conducted this operation. The view of Professor McCunn, called on behalf of the defendants, is that an ordinary farm fence is not sufficient for confining cattle under the conditions in which this herd was. That, I think, was really accepted by the expert who was called on behalf of the plaintiff, and who said:

F "An ordinary farm fence will not do the job when the herd is separated, but such a separation is comparable with penning cattle for inoculation or other purposes of that sort in a cattle crush or a cattle yard."

G Therefore, he said, if you put dams into an ordinary field the fence should be of extra strong construction such as you want for a cattle crush or a cattle yard, and, in effect, he conceded, I think, that one should not put cattle into the field unless there is an extra strong fence. I follow the argument that on a small farm there may not be such a place. In the ordinary way farms in this country do not have stockades of the sort to which Professor McCunn referred, and it may be on an ordinary farm there is not a yard large enough to hold one hundred and eighty beasts, and to confine the dams, of which there would be twenty or thirty, would mean splitting the herd into three. The answer is that, if the farmer has not those facilities, the importance of conducting the whole operation on one day is emphasised. I am satisfied that the whole operation in this case could have been easily conducted on one day, and that it was not so conducted was for no other reason than that it was not started earlier. Even then I think that the calves could have been castrated on the same day, and, possibly, that would have been done had it not been thought more convenient to do the other work of grading first. A farmer who conducts this operation in that way and who has not got any place in which he can conveniently keep the herd confined overnight is not, in my view, a prudent farmer. I think a prudent farmer would see that the whole operation was conducted in the normal way in one day.

For these reasons I find there was no breach of the defendants' duty under the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and, accordingly, the consequences follow which I have already indicated. There will be judgment for the defendants on the claim and on the counterclaim.

Judgment for defendants on claim and counterclaim.

PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY OF GREAT BRITAIN v. BOOTS CASH CHEMISTS (SOUTHERN), LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.), February 5, 1953.]

Poison—Sale by retail—Sale by or under supervision of registered pharmacist—Chemist's "self-service" shop—Pharmacist supervising transaction at time of payment—Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933 (c. 25), s. 18 (1) (a) (iii).

A chemist's "self-service" shop comprised one room around whose walls were shelves on which were laid out certain drugs and medicines specified in Part I of the Poisons List compiled under s. 17 (1) of the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933. These preparations were wrapped in packages and containers with the prices marked on them. A customer entering the shop took a wire basket, selected any articles he required from the shelves, placed them in the basket, and carried them to a cashier at one of the two exits. The cashier then examined the articles the customer wished to purchase, stated the total price, and accepted payment. At this stage a registered pharmacist, who was authorised by the chemist to prevent the customer from buying any article if he thought fit, supervised the transaction.

HELD: the taking of the articles from the shelves constituted an offer by the customer to buy and not the acceptance of an offer by the chemist to sell; the sale was not completed until the customer's offer to buy had been accepted by the defendants by their acceptance of the purchase price; and, therefore, the transaction took place "under the supervision of a registered pharmacist" as required by the provisions of s. 18 (1) (a) (iii) of the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933.

Decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J. ([1952] 2 All E.R. 456), affirmed.

FOR THE PHARMACY AND POISONS ACT, 1933, s. 18 (1) (a) (iii), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 15, p. 276.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., on a Special Case, dated July 16, 1952, and reported [1952] 2 All E.R. 456.

The defendants carried on business as retail chemists at their shop premises known as 73, Burnt Oak Broadway, Edgware, which were entered in the register of premises kept under s. 12 (1) of the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933. The shop comprised one room so arranged that customers might serve themselves. The main part of the room contained shelves round the walls and on an "island fixture" in the centre, one part being described by a printed notice as "Chemist's Department". On the shelves in the chemist's department were drugs and proprietary medicines displayed in packages and other containers and marked with the retail prices. One section of the department contained exclusively drugs, including proprietary medicines, which were included in or contained substances specified in Part I of the Poisons List referred to in s. 17 (1) of the Act of 1933. No such drugs were displayed for sale in any other part of the shop. When the shop was open for the sale of goods, there was present in the room, among other persons, a registered pharmacist in personal control of the chemist's department subject to the directions of a superintendent in accordance with s. 9 (1) (b) of the Act. A customer entering the shop premises would take an empty wire basket at a barrier, select any article he required from among those on the shelves, place them in the basket, and take them to one of the two exits. At each exit there was a cashier who would examine the articles taken and accept payment of the total price. The pharmacist superintended that part of the transaction involving the sale of a drug which took place at the cash desk, and was authorised by the defendants at that stage, if he thought fit, to prevent any customer from removing any drugs from the premises. On Apr. 13, 1951, two customers purchased articles included in Part I of the Poisons List, following the procedure outlined.

On the question whether each sale was effected by or under the supervision of a registered pharmacist in accordance with s. 18 (1) (a) (iii) of the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933, LORD GODDARD, C.J., held that the sale was effected by the defendants' accepting the customer's offer to buy by accepting payment at the cash desk, and that that sale was conducted under the supervision of a pharmacist, and he gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed.

C

Lloyd-Jones, Q.C., and T. Dewar for the plaintiffs.

Baker, Q.C., and Everington for the defendants.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: One of the duties of the plaintiffs, the Pharmaceutical Society, who were incorporated by Royal Charter, is to take all reasonable steps to enforce the provisions of the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933. The provision of that Act here in question is s. 18 (1) which provides:

"Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, it shall not be lawful—(a) for a person to sell any poison included in Part I of the Poisons List, unless . . . (iii) the sale is effected by, or under the supervision of, a registered pharmacist."

E

The point which is taken by the plaintiffs is this. It is suggested that the purchase is complete if and when a customer going round the shelves in this shop of the defendants takes an article and puts it in the receptacle which he or she is carrying, and, therefore, when the customer comes to the pay desk, the registered pharmacist, even if he is so minded, has no power to say: "This drug ought not to be sold to this customer."

F

I agree with the Lord Chief Justice in everything he said on the matter, but I will put it shortly in my own words. Whether the plaintiffs' contention is right depends on what are the legal implications of the arrangements in this shop. Is the invitation which is made to the customer to be regarded as an offer which is completed so that both sides are bound when the article is put into the receptacle, or is it to be regarded as a more organised way of doing what is already done in many types of shops—and a bookseller is, perhaps, the best example—namely, enabling customers to have free access to what is in the shop, to look at the different articles, and then, ultimately, having taken the one which they wish to buy, to come to the assistant and say: "I want this"? Generally speaking, the assistant will say: "That is all right", the money passes, and the transaction is completed. I agree entirely with what the Lord Chief Justice says and the reasons he gives for his conclusion that in the case of the ordinary shop, although goods are displayed and it is intended that customers should go and choose what they want, the contract is not completed until the customer has indicated the article which he needs and the shopkeeper or someone on his behalf accepts that offer. Not till then is the contract completed, and, that being the normal position, I can see no reason for drawing any different inference from the arrangements which were made in the present case.

The Lord Chief Justice expressed what I consider one of the most formidable difficulties in the way of the plaintiffs' case when he pointed out that, if they were right, once an article has been placed in the receptacle the customer himself is bound and he would have no right, without paying for the first article, to substitute an article which he saw later of the same kind and which he preferred. I can see no reason for implying from this arrangement any position other than that which the Lord Chief Justice found, namely, that it is a convenient method of enabling customers to see what there is for sale, to choose, and, possibly, to put back and substitute, articles which they wish to have, and then go to the cashier and offer to buy what they have chosen. On that conclusion the case fails, because it is admitted that in those circumstances there was supervision in the sense required by the Act and at the appropriate moment of time. For these reasons, in my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. The short point of the matter is: At what point of time did the sale in this shop take place? My Lord has explained the system which has been introduced into that shop, and, possibly, other shops since. It is said, on the one hand, that when the customer takes the package from the poison section and puts it into her basket the sale takes place there and then. On the other hand, it is said that the sale does not take place until the customer who has placed that package in her basket comes to the exit. The Lord Chief Justice dealt with the matter in this way, and I would like to adopt his words:

"It seems to me, therefore, applying commonsense to this class of transaction, there is no difference merely because a self-service is advertised. It is no different really from the normal transaction in a shop . . . I am quite satisfied it would be wrong to say the shopkeeper is making an offer to sell every article in the shop to any person who might come in and that he can insist by saying: 'I accept your offer'."

Then he goes on to deal with the illustration of the bookshop and continues:

"Therefore, in my opinion, the mere fact that a customer picks up a bottle of medicine from the shelves in this case does not amount to an acceptance of an offer to sell. It is an offer by the customer to buy. I daresay this case is one of great importance, it is quite a proper case for the Pharmaceutical Society to bring, but I think I am bound to say in this case the sale was made under the supervision of a pharmacist. By using the words: 'The sale is effected by, or under the supervision of, a registered pharmacist', it seems to me the sale might be effected by somebody not a pharmacist. If it be under the supervision of a pharmacist, the pharmacist can say: 'You cannot have that. That contains poison'. In this case I decide, first that there is no sale effected merely by the purchaser taking up the article. There is no sale until the buyer's offer to buy is accepted by the acceptance of the money, and that takes place under the supervision of a pharmacist. And in any case, I think, even if I am wrong in the view I have taken of when the offer is accepted, the sale is by or under the supervision of a pharmacist."

I agree with that and I agree that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. The Lord Chief Justice observed that if, on the footing of the plaintiff society's contention, a person picked up an article, once having picked it up he would never be able to put it back and say he had changed his mind, for the shopkeeper could say that the property had passed and the customer would have to pay. If that were the position in this and similar shops, and that was known to the general public, I should imagine the popularity of such shops would wane a good deal. I am satisfied that that is not the position, and that the articles, even though they are priced and put in shops like this, do not represent an offer by the shopkeeper which can be accepted merely by the picking up of the article in question. I agree with the reasons on which the Lord Chief Justice arrived at that conclusion, to which BIRKETT, L.J., has just referred, and to those observations I can add nothing of my own.

Appeal dismissed.

PEARSON, J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The application is refused, but there is a peculiar feature in that a witness, Mr. Hall, who was desired to be called as a witness for the defence, did not arrive until a very late stage when the summing-up had been almost completed. After the summing-up, an application was made by the defence that he should be called even at that late stage, and that application was acceded to. The witness was called and the learned recorder delivered what may be called a short supplementary summing-up to the members of the jury with reference to his evidence. In R. v. Owen (1) it was held that it was wrong for witnesses to be called by the prosecution after the summing-up, but this case is distinguishable because the leave and liberty in question was extended to the defence. It is not a matter one would wish to happen very often, but, on the particular facts of this case, we think that there is no objection to be taken to what was done here and that the learned recorder was fully justified in the rather unusual course he took.

February 2, 3, 1953.]

Street Traffic—Driving uninsured motor vehicle—Admission of liability by insurer—Reasonable interpretation of policy—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (1).

A
A cover note insuring the respondent against third-party risks in relation to the user of a motor cycle combination by him contained the words: "Exclusion and special conditions: sidecar permanently attached". The respondent removed the passenger-carrying sidecar body, but left the chassis and a third wheel attached to the motor cycle and drove the motor cycle in that condition. He was charged before justices with driving an uninsured vehicle, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1), and at the hearing a representative of the insurers stated in evidence that, in spite of the removal of the passenger-carrying body, the insurers considered themselves "on risk".

HELD: where a condition in a policy was clear and could only be construed to exclude the liability of the insurers, the court was bound to act on that construction notwithstanding a statement by the insurers that they regarded themselves as being "on risk", but where, as here, the meaning of the words was doubtful and the insurers expressed the view that what was attached to the motor cycle satisfied the conditions of the policy and stated that they would have accepted liability if an accident had occurred, the respondent could not be found guilty of driving an uninsured vehicle, and the justices had rightly dismissed the charge against him.

FOR THE ROAD TRAFFIC ACT, 1930, s. 35 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 24, p. 602.

CASE STATED by Sheffield justices.

E
At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Sheffield on Sept. 11, 1952, the appellant, George Alfred Carnill, a superintendent of police, preferred an information against the respondent, Tom Rowland, charging that he unlawfully did use on a road a motor cycle there not being in force in relation to the user of the vehicle such a policy of insurance as complied with the requirements of Part II of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, contrary to s. 35 (1) of the said Act.

H
It was proved or admitted that the respondent signed a proposal form for the insurance of a motor cycle combination by the Co-operative Insurance Society, Ltd. By the terms of the proposal form the policy was to be restricted to the use of a motor cycle to which a sidecar or box carrier was permanently attached, and the seating capacity of the sidecar was said to be two. On July 14, 1952, a cover note was issued to the respondent bearing the words: "Exclusion and special conditions: sidecar permanently attached". On July 16, 1952, the respondent removed the passenger-carrying sidecar body from the motor cycle combination and on the next day he used and drove the vehicle on a road. At this time the passenger-carrying sidecar body had not been replaced and there was attached to the motor cycle only the sidecar chassis and wheel. The insurance company allowed a reduction of the premium payable on the insurance of a solo motor cycle if a sidecar or box carrier was permanently attached because the vehicle was then more stable on the road, particularly when negotiating a left hand bend. The insurance company considered itself on risk and would have indemnified the respondent if he had been involved in an accident while using the vehicle on the occasion in question and in the condition in which it then was.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant (i) that no policy of insurance against third-party risks was in force when the vehicle was used without a sidecar permanently attached ; (ii) that no sidecar was attached to the vehicle on July 17, 1952 ; (iii) that the meaning of the word "sidecar", as defined in the SHORTER OXFORD DICTIONARY, was "a car for passengers attachable to the side of a motor cycle" ; and (iv) that the test whether the policy of insurance was in force was not whether the insurance company considered itself on risk, but whether it was in law liable to indemnify the user if damage and injury had resulted from the use of the vehicle at a time when no sidecar was permanently attached. It was contended on behalf of the respondent, inter alia, that it was within the contemplation of the respondent and the insurance company at the time the insurance was effected that the vehicle could be used without a body being attached to the sidecar and that the policy was not vitiated in any way by the removal of the body, and that, even if a person was doing an illegal act, it did not preclude the insurance company from indemnifying the insured against the consequence of negligent driving. The justices, being of the opinion that the respondent's use of the vehicle on July 17, 1952, was covered by insurance against third-party risks, dismissed the information.

Paul Wrightson for the appellant.

R. Stock for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the city of Sheffield before whom the respondent was charged with unlawfully using a motor cycle on a road, there not being in force in relation to such user of the vehicle a policy of insurance to comply with the Road Traffic Act, 1930.

The court has often pointed out the inconvenience that arises in these cases where a person is charged with using a car when there is not a policy of insurance in force in relation to it owing to the fact that the cases, which sometimes involve nice questions of insurance law, have to be decided in the absence of one of the parties most interested, namely, the insurance company. For that reason it is to be hoped that use will be made of an arrangement that has been entered into with the approval of the appropriate authorities for consultation between the police and insurance companies as to whether or not the insurance companies are on risk or consider themselves on risk. If a respectable insurance company tells the appropriate authority in a particular instance that they consider themselves on risk, the mischief at which the Road Traffic Act, 1930, is aimed does not arise, for, if an accident had taken place, the company would have indemnified the respondent so that the injured person would recover the money.

On the other hand, the court has to give these decisions in the absence of an insurance company, and if this court gives a decision on the construction of the policy, although that decision may have some persuasive effect, it is in no way binding between the insurance company and the assured. If, for instance, in the present case we decided that the insurance company were not on risk, although they have said they were, that would not debar or bind the respondent, if he met with an accident and chose to bring an action against his insurers, seeking a declaration that they were bound to indemnify him.

In this case the respondent made a proposal to the Co-operative Insurance Society, Ltd., for a policy of insurance, and he was asked the question:

"Do you desire the policy to be restricted to the use of any motor cycle to which a sidecar or box carrier is permanently attached?"

and he answered "Yes". Thereupon a cover note was issued pending the issue of the policy. It contained the words: "Exclusions and special conditions: sidecar permanently attached", and, if the sidecar was not attached, presumably liability would thereby be excluded. These exclusions and conditions are put in for the protection of insurance companies. They may take a smaller premium if their risk is limited, and, if the insurance company do not wish to rely on an exclusion or say that in their view the exclusion does not arise in any particular case, I do not know why we should be acute to find that they are wrong. If the insurance company insert exceptions or conditions in the policy, on the ordinary principles of construction those conditions have, so far as possible, to be read against the insurance company.

A sidecar was attached to the respondent's cycle, but when the respondent was stopped the body of the sidecar was not in place. The chassis and the wheel only were in place. A representative of the insurance company was called before the justices. The justices evidently accepted him as a truthful witness, and he told the justices that the company considered themselves on risk. That means no more than that for the purposes of the policy of insurance they regarded what was attached to the cycle as a sidecar. The justices came to the conclusion that the charge was not made out because they thought that the respondent was insured, and I see no reason to differ from them. For my part, I put the matter simply on the ground that, the insurance company having said that what was attached to the cycle satisfied the conditions of the policy, there is no reason to say that the respondent was uninsured at the time he was stopped.

LYNSKEY, J.: I agree. It is clear that, if a condition in a policy is so broad that it has only one meaning, and that meaning is to exclude the insurance company from liability when the machine is used either for certain purposes or under certain conditions, the court is bound by that clause and must act on it. But if you have a clause which is open to two constructions, it is for the court to construe that condition in the policy contra proferentem, that is, against the insurance company. The question here was whether or not this motor cycle was fitted with a sidecar. What is the meaning of "a sidecar permanently attached" may be a question of doubt. According to the evidence before the justices, the insurance company read the policy as putting them on risk when the cycle was in the condition in which it was found at the time when this offence was alleged to have been committed, namely, fitted with a chassis and a third wheel, but with the body of the sidecar temporarily absent. If that was a construction of the meaning of a sidecar which was impossible on the wording of the policy, one would be able to say that the justices had no right to find as they did, but it seems to me that the meaning of "sidecar permanently attached" is open to two constructions. The insurance company took one and the justices accepted that and also that the insurance company were on risk and the respondent was covered. In those circumstances, I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

PEARSON, J.: I agree. I only want to say that I should agree with the contention of the appellant, set out in the Case Stated, that the test whether the policy of insurance was in force was not whether the insurance company considered itself on risk, but whether it was in law liable to indemnify the user if damage and injury had resulted from the use of the vehicle at a time when no sidecar was permanently attached. If it was plain that there was no sidecar attached to this vehicle at the material time, the view of the insurance company that they were bound would manifestly be incorrect in law and would have to be disregarded. But here it is arguable one way or the other whether or not there was a sidecar attached at the material time. That being so, and it being a reasonable view that the sidecar had not ceased to be a sidecar merely because a part of it had been removed, I think it was right for the justices to take into account the view expressed by the insurance company as one of the material factors for them to consider. For that reason, I think it is not shown that any error was made by the justices in coming to their decision, and I agree with the proposed judgment. Appeal dismissed.

HEATLEY AND ANOTHER v. STEEL CO. OF WALES, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), January 29, 1953.]

Negligence—Damages—Fatal accident—Deduction for benefits accruing from death—Deduction from deceased's wages of sum retained for his own use—Deduction in respect of house constituting matrimonial home.

A In assessing damages in an action by a widow, on behalf of herself and her children, under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, in respect of the death of her husband who died intestate, the learned judge deducted (i) from the estimated income lost, £5 out of the husband's weekly wages of £10, as expenditure by or for the husband, and (ii) £750 in respect of a house, the lease of which the husband had purchased, which was valued at £1,450, £260 being owed under a mortgage, and which was now available to the plaintiff and her children as a home.

B HELD: (i) the sum deducted for expenditure by or on the husband was too high and, as it must have been made per incuriam, the damages should be amended accordingly.

C (ii) as the widow would require to live with the children in the house exactly as before her husband's death, or, if the lease were sold, in another house, no deduction fell to be made from the damages in respect thereof.

AS TO DAMAGES UNDER THE FATAL ACCIDENTS ACTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, pp. 695-700, paras. 982-987; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 139, 140, Nos. 933-943.

D APPEAL against an order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., at Swansea Assizes, dated July 11, 1952, awarding £3,250 damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and £435 15s. 6d. under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, in an action for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

E In arriving at the damages under the Act of 1846, CROOM-JOHNSON, J., deducted £5, in respect of the husband's estimated weekly expenditure, from the £10 a week wages earned by the husband, representing income lost by the first plaintiff, the widow, and £750 as the value of the lease of a house owned by the husband which accrued to the first plaintiff and her family by his death. The plaintiffs appealed.

Lloyd-Jones, Q.C., and N. G. L. Richards for the plaintiffs.

F Bickford-Smith for the defendants.

G LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The deceased man, who died intestate, was forty-three years of age, and had a good working life in front of him. He has left a widow, aged thirty-eight years, the plaintiff, and four children, whose ages vary from eighteen years down to nine, the youngest being said to be a delicate child. At the time of the accident the deceased was earning just under £10 a week, but he would almost immediately have been earning £12 a week had his unhappy death not occurred. He owned the equity of redemption of a house the lease of which he had bought and mortgaged to a building society, paying interest at the rate of £2 4s. 3d. a month. £260 of the principal was outstanding.

H The learned judge took a good deal of trouble over this case, and paid attention to the rule that one must try to find a basic figure, apply a certain number of years' purchase to it, and make an allowance for payment of a lump sum at once in order to find the present value. We should not interfere with the award of a judge merely because we considered it too low unless it were very much too low or we were satisfied that he had applied some wrong principle. That makes two matters in which we disagree with the learned judge a difficult problem. In arriving at the weekly income that is lost to the family, he has deducted £5 a week for £1 spending money for the deceased and £4 as his keep. With great respect to the learned judge, there was no evidence about this. I do not think that, with a family of six, the feeding and clothing of the husband would be allowed to come to as much as £4 a week out of a total income of £10 a week, especially when he kept only £1 for his own personal expenses. We think that the learned judge has taken much too high a figure and has erred per incuriam.

D
A more serious matter on which we differ from the learned judge is with regard to the house which passed on the deceased's death. Under the provisions of s. 46 (1) (i) (b) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, the plaintiff and the four children (or such of them as attain the age of twenty-one years or marry) are between them entitled to the whole estate. The plaintiff's interest greatly predominates, as, apart from the personal chattels, which go to her absolutely, she takes £1,000 with interest thereon at five per cent. per annum from the death of the deceased on Mar. 30, 1951, and a life interest in half the ultimate residue. The residue before providing the £1,000 and interest appears to consist of nothing more than the lease, subject to the mortgage, and the equity of redemption is worth not more than £1,200, the value of the house being £1,450 and the outstanding balance of the mortgage £260. What allowance, if any, should be made in the assessment of damages for the beneficial interests thus accruing to the plaintiff, and, in some small degree, also to the children by reason of the death? It is very difficult to see how any substantial sum can be allowed for these interests. The court has to try to ascertain how much the plaintiff and her family have lost by the deceased's death? The plaintiff does not thereby come into some large sum of money of which she never had the handling before. She will simply continue to live in this house and provide a home there for the children until it is sold, and if and when it is sold she will have to get another house. Her two younger children are likely to be living with her for a long time, and her two elder children are still dependent on her.

H
In the circumstances the court cannot see that any sum requires to be deducted for the value of the house. A successful sale of the lease might produce £1,200, but the plaintiff would then have to find another house to provide accommodation for the children and she would be lucky if she could rent one. Therefore, she is in just the same position as before and has not benefited on this account by her husband's death, except, possibly, by some nominal amount. The trifling interests of the children under the intestacy are offset by the need to provide them with a home, and obviously cannot improve the position of themselves and the plaintiff considered collectively. It may be that some value could be shown on paper for the interests in the house which would not have accrued to the plaintiff and the children for many years but for the death of the deceased, but that is hardly a matter which from a practical point of view can be taken into account. In relation to this matter the learned judge deducted £750 from the sum that he was proposing to award the plaintiff on the ground of the pecuniary loss occasioned by her husband's death. He was about to earn £12 a week, a considerable increase of just over £2 a week. The elder children did not contribute to the plaintiff's income. The son was still not keeping himself, since, though he was earning money his tools, lunches, etc., more than offset what he was giving to his mother, and there was some small sum from the elder daughter. But when they became self-supporting the fact that the deceased's wages had gone up to £12 a week would have put the widow in a much more comfortable position.

The number of years' purchase that a judge can reasonably take is entirely an arbitrary matter of speculation, though it may be actuarially possible to calculate the amount by which a basic wage multiplied by a certain number of years' purchase should be reduced to yield its present value. But the court has, in the best way it can, to find a sum of money which it thinks will fairly compensate the family. One judge may arrive at it in one way, and another judge in another. If this court comes to the conclusion that the judge has taken an unduly high, or an unduly low, figure, it can interfere, but it cannot interfere unless it thinks that the amount was really arrived at on a wrong principle. In our opinion, two deductions made by the learned judge cannot be justified, and for a family of this sort, losing a husband and father in the prime of life, £3,250 is a very low award. £435 was awarded under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and any sum that may be awarded under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, has to be reduced by that amount. This court, giving the best consideration it can to this case, thinks that the fair amount to have awarded was £6,000, less the £435 awarded under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, as to which there is no appeal. The result is that judgment will be entered for the plaintiff for £6,000 in all, £400 of which, plus £35 15s. 6d. for funeral expenses, or £435 15s. 6d. in all, is allocated to the claim under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. As we are increasing the amount awarded in this case by £2,750, it seems only right that the children should also benefit. We think that the elder son, who was given only £50, ought to have £150, because when he has finished his apprenticeship it will be very useful for him to have some money on which to start life, with his tools and other things to pay for. The elder daughter ought to have £200 instead of £100, since she has to be provided for, and if she marries it will be a useful contribution towards setting up house and her trousseau. We do not think there is any reason to increase the amount for the two younger children, because their sums will be paid into court, and they will accumulate. When the boy of nine becomes of age, if he has not had to have anything paid out beforehand, the sum at compound interest will have increased to a fair amount.

Street Traffic—Licence—Goods vehicle—Utility van towing unladen caravan—Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949 (c. 89) s. 27 (1).

The respondent was using for towing a caravan on a road a "utility" van which was licensed as a private vehicle. The van was constructed for the conveyance of goods, but at the material time no goods were being carried either in the van or in the caravan. The respondent was charged with using the van as a goods vehicle, i.e., for a purpose which brought it within a class or description of vehicle to which a higher rate of duty was chargeable under the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, such higher rate not having been paid before it was so used, contrary to s. 13 (2) of the Act.

HELD: the van, though constructed as a goods vehicle, was not being so used when towing an unladen caravan, and was, therefore, not liable to be taxed as a goods vehicle.

FOR THE VEHICLES (EXCISE) ACT, 1949, s. 5, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 21, p. 1436.

CASE STATED by Lincolnshire justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Sleaford on Sept. 15, 1952, the appellant, Reginald Arthur Pearson, an assistant solicitor to the Kesteven County Council, preferred an information against the respondent, Donald Craner Boyes, charging that, on July 15, 1952, while there was then in force a licence taken out for a mechanically propelled vehicle at a certain rate under the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, s. 6 and sched. V, he unlawfully used such vehicle on a public road at Welbourn for a purpose which brought it within a class or description of vehicle to which a higher rate of duty was chargeable under the Act, such higher rate not having been paid before the vehicle was so used, contrary to s. 13 (2) of the Act.

It was proved or admitted that the respondent, who was a towing contractor, was the owner of a Bedford utility van which was constructed or adapted for use for the conveyance of goods. On July 15, 1952, he was using the van on Pottergate Road, a public road, for the purpose of towing a caravan. No goods were at the time being carried either in the van or in the caravan. The van was licensed as a private vehicle, duty having been paid at the rate of £10 per annum. If it had been licensed as a goods vehicle, duty would have been chargeable at the rate of £27 10s. per annum, and additional duty at the rate of £10 per annum would have been chargeable in respect of the use of the van for drawing a trailer.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that, as the van was constructed for the conveyance of goods and was drawing a caravan, it was a "goods vehicle" within the meaning of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, s. 27 (1). It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the van was not used for the conveyance of goods, and was properly licensed as a private vehicle notwithstanding that it was towing a caravan. The justices dismissed the information and the appellant appealed.

J. P. Ashworth for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The vehicle, which was a utility van, and, therefore, could be used for the carriage of goods, was, at the time in question, towing a caravan, which was unladen. Section 27 (1) of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, provides:

“ ‘goods vehicle’ means a mechanically propelled vehicle . . . constructed or adapted for use and used for the conveyance of goods or burden of any description, whether in the course of trade or otherwise.”

A The question is: If this vehicle was constructed as a goods vehicle, was it being used for the conveyance of goods or burden of any description?

I should be content to decide this case very much on the same lines as this court decided Cook v. Hobbs (1), by saying that, if the Revenue authorities want to tax these vehicles, they should get them taxed in clear words. If you have to hunt about through a large number of sections and consider a large number of cases, it seems to me to show that the Revenue have not succeeded in obtaining the use of clear and precise words showing that a tax is to be imposed, and a subject is only to be taxed if the taxing authority can show that there is no doubt about the fact that he is taxed. Taking the whole scheme of the Act, the words of the different sections, and the expressions used, I think it is dealing with haulage as something quite distinct from carriage. If one of these utility vans was found being used with a trailer which was laden with goods, it seems to me that it would then be used for the conveyance of goods because, although the goods were in the trailer attached to the van, the van would be conveying them from point to point, although, from one point of view, it could be said that it was conveying a caravan. But here the van was towing an empty caravan. The matter is so vague and so debatable that I cannot see that it has been shown that Parliament intended to tax this vehicle in the way suggested. For these reasons, in my opinion, the decision of the justices should be upheld.

MUIR v. JAMES.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.), January 27, 28, 1953.]

Building Control—Licence for specified work—Authorised expenditure exceeded—Work ordered and executed separately—Execution at same time as licensed work—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927), reg. 56A (as amended); sched. VI, Part II.

Case referred to:

- (1) Dennis & Co., Ltd. v. Munn, [1949] 1 All E.R. 616; [1949] 2 K.B. 327; [1949] L.J.R. 857; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, Q.C., made at Lambeth County Court, dated Dec. 9, 1952, on a claim for work and labour.

The plaintiff was a builder. The defendant was the father of the owner of premises known as 18 Lawrie Park Garden, Sydenham, and he intended to occupy a flat on the premises. A building company for whom the plaintiff worked, undertook the work of converting the premises into flats and building a garage, and for this work licences were required and obtained. The plaintiff's claim was in respect of " . . . work in connection with cutting back garden beds and excavating over site to form roadway to garage, taking down and re-building part of dwarf burr wall, spreading, levelling and ramming hardcore to roadway, and clearing surplus excavated material, taking out obsolete water main, and repairing leaks in main service pipe."

No licence was issued for this work, to do which the plaintiff alleged he was employed personally.

The defendant contended, inter alia, that the work in respect of which the plaintiff claimed was within the provisions of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 56A, and that, since it was not licensed, the plaintiff could not recover in respect of it. He further contended that the work should be regarded as a part of or so closely connected with the building of the garage as not to be properly treated as covered by the provision as to the value of work that could be done without a licence: see the principle laid down in Dennis & Co., Ltd. v. Munn (1).

SOMERVELL, L.J., said that in Dennis & Co., Ltd. v. Munn (1) a licence had been given for specified work, but, in doing the work, the builder exceeded the amount authorised by the licence and it was sought to add to the amount of the licence the amount in respect of work which could be done without a licence. The court said that that could not be done, it being held that the allowance of building work permitted without a written licence by virtue of the Control of Building Operations (No. 8) Order, 1947, was only permitted for work severable from specified work for which a written licence had been obtained, i.e., work ordered separately and executed separately. The first point on which the defendant failed before the learned judge was that he failed to establish that this work was within the general controlling words of reg. 56A. Counsel for the defendant relied on the words in Part II of sched. VI to the Defence Regulations, "services for a building" or, possibly, "any other fixed works of construction or civil engineering, including a road". He (his Lordship) did not think that the work in question came within the words “services for a building”, and he also very much doubted whether it came within the word “road”, as it occurs in Part II. The work was really clearing away obstructions and making something of the character of a garden path sufficiently wide to take a motor car. The court had very incomplete information before it as to the work which was done and he did not propose to base his decision on that part of the case, because he had come to the conclusion that, assuming the work was work within the general words of reg. 56A, the free allowance was available to cover it on the principles as laid down in Dennis & Co., Ltd. v. Munn (1). It was clearly ordered separately. It was plainly not within the specification on which the licence was obtained, and, so far as he could gather from the evidence, it was executed separately. Those latter words were taken from the judgment of DENNING, L.J., in Dennis & Co., Ltd. v. Munn ([1949] 1 All E.R. 618). It might well be that work fell outside the principles laid down in Dennis & Co., Ltd. v. Munn (1) if it was ordered separately and outside the licence specification although it was executed at the same time. That point should be regarded as open. For these reasons he dismissed the appeal.

BIRKETT, L.J., agreed.

ROMER, L.J., also agreed and said that he would like to associate himself with the observations which SOMERVELL, L.J., had made with regard to the case of Dennis & Co., Ltd. v. Munn (1).

Appeal dismissed.

R. v. MISKIN LOWER JUSTICES. Ex parte YOUNG.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Pearson, JJ.), January 20, 21, February 6, 1953.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance order—Arrears—Committal order suspended on condition that current payments made, with further payments on account of arrears—Payment of arrears, but failure to make current payments—Appropriation of payments—Right to discharge of committal order—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (c. 49), s. 21 (1)—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (c. 39), s. 9.

On May 16, 1951, justices made an order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, that the husband should pay to the wife the weekly sum of £2 10s. as maintenance for herself and the child. On Aug. 1, 1951, on a summons by the wife in respect of arrears amounting to £7 12s. 6d., the justices made a committal order against the husband, but suspended it for so long as he paid the weekly sum of £2 10s. provided for in the maintenance order and in addition 2s. per week on account of the arrears. In each of the next two weeks the husband paid £2 only, and on Aug. 18, 1951, the wife applied for a warrant to commit him to prison. The justices issued a warrant for the balance of £3 12s. 6d. on the ground that £4 of the original debt had been paid. Before execution of the warrant the husband paid a further £2 and on arrest he paid £1 12s. 6d., whereupon he was released on the footing that the original debt was paid. On an application by the wife that the warrant might go forward on the ground that the sums paid by the husband should have been credited, as to £7 10s. to the current weekly payments under the maintenance order, and as to 2s. 6d. to the arrears, HELD: the committal order was, and remained throughout, the sanction for the non-payment of the original debt, namely, £7 12s. 6d., being the specified sum mentioned in the application for the committal order and proved to the justices to be in arrear; the postponement of the issue of the committal order on condition that the husband regularly paid the amounts of the weekly payments plus some addition on account of the arrears gave him a beneficial option and did not deprive him of the right to secure a discharge of or release from the committal order by payment of the original debt; the husband was entitled to appropriate or have appropriated to the discharge of the original debt the sums paid by him, amounting to £7 12s. 6d., and in the circumstances, although he had not complied with the conditions on which the committal order was suspended, he must be considered to have paid the original debt; and, therefore, the wife's application should be dismissed.

Per curiam: The husband, having failed to keep up the current payments, was liable to further proceedings and a new committal order in respect of the new arrears.

MOTION by the wife, Mrs. Gwladys Elsie Young, for an order of mandamus directed to the justices for the petty sessional division of Miskin Lower in the county of Glamorgan requiring them to exercise the jurisdiction conferred on them by s. 9 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, by s. 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, and by s. 8 of the Money Payments (Justices Procedure) Act, 1935, and, in particular, to consider committing the husband, Hubert Wallington Young, to prison for non-payment of arrears under a maintenance order made by the justices in favour of the wife on May 16, 1951.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 6. LORD GODDARD, C.J.: PEARSON, J., will deliver the first judgment.

The following judgments were read.

PEARSON, J.: This case arises out of a maintenance order made by the court of summary jurisdiction for the petty sessional division of Miskin Lower, in the county of Glamorgan, and a suspended committal order made by the same court on the ground of non-payment of arrears under the maintenance order. The motion is on behalf of the wife for an order of mandamus directed to the justices and requiring them to exercise the discretion conferred on them by s. 9 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, and by s. 8 of the Money Payments (Justices Procedure) Act, 1935, and, in particular, to consider committing the husband, against whom the maintenance order was made, to prison for non-payment of arrears under the maintenance order. The grounds of the application are that, the wife having applied orally to the justices to implement the terms of the suspended committal order and to commit the husband to prison, such application was refused by the justices by letter dated Nov. 23, 1952, and that their refusal so to do was wrong.

The maintenance order was made by the justices on May 16, 1951, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, and the material provisions of the order were that (i) the legal custody of a child of the marriage between the parties be committed to the wife; (ii) the husband do pay to the collecting officer on behalf of the wife the weekly sum of £2, together with the additional sum of 10s. for the maintenance of the child, the first of such payments to be made on Wednesday, May 25, 1951, and the subsequent payments on every Wednesday in each succeeding week; and (iii) the husband do pay the sum of £2 12s. 6d. for the costs of the court and of the wife incurred in obtaining the order.

On July 12, 1951, the wife caused to be issued a summons in respect of arrears under the maintenance order amounting to £7 12s. 6d., and on Aug. 1, 1951, the justices made an order committing the husband to prison for one month, such order to be suspended so long as the husband paid the weekly sum of £2 10s. provided for in the maintenance order, and in addition 2s. per week on account of arrears. The sum for non-payment of which the committal order was made was the above-mentioned sum of £7 12s. 6d. In each of the next two weeks the husband paid to the collecting officer the sum of £2 only, so that the condition on which the committal order was suspended was not complied with, but a total of £4 was paid. On Aug. 18, 1951, the wife applied for a warrant to commit the husband. A warrant of commitment was issued for the balance of £3 12s. 6d. on the footing that £4 of the original debt of £7 12s. 6d. had already been paid. While the warrant was in the hands of the police the husband made a further payment of £2, and, on being arrested, he made a further payment of £1 12s. 6d., and he was then released on the footing that by that time he had paid the full amount of the original debt. From Nov. 22, 1951, to Jan. 8, 1952, there was correspondence between the wife's solicitor and the clerk to the justices. The clerk to the justices, in a letter of Jan. 4, 1952, referred to the sums of £4, £2 and £1 12s. 6d. paid by the husband, and said that the husband had paid the amount for which he had been summoned, that the commitment could not be issued again, and that the wife should apply for a further summons for arrears, then amounting to £20 13s. 6d., with a view to the husband again being brought to the court to be dealt with. In reply to that letter the wife's solicitor wrote on Jan. 5, 1952:

"I regret that I cannot agree with your contention. The sum of £4 paid by the defendant by Aug. 18 was in respect of the current order and not the arrears. The arrears were not reduced at all, but, in fact, were increased by the sum of 10s. per week. The warrant, therefore, should have been issued for £7 12s. 6d., the full amount of the arrears, of which the defendant has now paid only the sum of £3 12s. 6d. If your contention was correct a defendant could escape the consequences of the committal entirely by merely paying the current order and could say that any sum paid was on account of arrears. It is my contention that the weekly payments made must be set off first against the current order, and it is only any balance which can be set off against the arrears."

The clerk to the justices wrote on Jan. 8, 1952:

"The legal position as to the appropriation of payments made to the collecting officer after the committal order has been made and suspended so long as certain fixed payments are made is not free from doubt. There has been a great deal of correspondence in the JUSTICE OF THE PEACE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT REVIEW on this question during the past twelve months. Opinions have been expressed by some of the correspondents that, unless a special direction is given by the sender, a collecting officer is bound to appropriate the whole of such payment to that part of the total amount due which first accrued, namely, the arrears. In your client's case that course was followed, with the result that the total amount of arrears due in respect of the commitment was paid. I, therefore, regret that I can do nothing to assist your client, but suggest that she issue a further summons for the arrears now due under the order, which amount to £20 13s. 6d."

Two questions arise, namely, (i) whether the husband was entitled to secure a discharge of or release from the committal order by paying the original debt of £7 12s. 6d. notwithstanding that he had not complied with the conditions on which the committal order was suspended and further arrears had accrued, and (ii) whether the husband was rightly considered to have paid the original debt by making the payments of £2, £2, £2 and £1 12s. 6d. mentioned above. For the purpose of determining the first question it will be necessary to consider the relevant statutory provisions. Section 9 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, provides:

"The payment of any sum of money directed to be paid by any order under this Act may be enforced in the same manner as the payment of money is enforced under an order of affiliation."

The maintenance order in this case was made under that Act as amended or extended by the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1920, and the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949. The main provisions for enforcement of the payment of money under an order of affiliation are contained in s. 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, and with later amendments, so far as material, are as follows:

" . . . and if at any time after the expiration of fourteen clear days from the making of such order as aforesaid it be made to appear to any one justice, upon oath or affirmation, that any sum to be paid in pursuance of such order has not been paid, such justice may, by warrant under his hand and seal, cause such putative father to be brought before any two justices, and in case such putative father neglect or refuse to make payment of the sums due from him under such order, or since any commitment for disobedience to such order as hereinafter provided, together with the costs attending such warrant, apprehension, and bringing up of such putative father, such two justices may, by warrant under their hands and seals, direct the sum so appearing to be due, together with such costs, to be recovered by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of such putative father . . . but if upon the return of such warrant, or if by the admission of such putative father, it appear that no sufficient distress can be had, then any such two justices may, if they see fit, by warrant under their hands and seals, cause such putative father to be committed to the common gaol or house of correction . . . there to remain, without bail or mainprize, for any term, not exceeding three calendar months unless such sum and costs, and all reasonable charges attending the said distress, together with the costs and charges attending the commitment and conveying to gaol or to the house of correction, and of the persons employed to convey him thither, be sooner paid and satisfied."

Section 1 of the Affiliation Orders Act, 1914, provides for the appointment of collecting officers and prescribes their duties. Section 54 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, provides, so far as material, as follows:

A "This Act shall apply to the levying of sums adjudged to be paid by an order in any matter of bastardy, or by an order which is enforceable as an order of affiliation, and to the imprisonment of a defendant for non-payment of such sums, in like manner as if an order in any such matter or so enforceable were a conviction on information . . . This Act shall be construed as one with the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, so far as is consistent with the tenour of such Acts respectively, and save as aforesaid shall be subject to the exceptions specified in s. 35 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848."

B Section 35 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, provides, so far as material, as follows:

C ". . . nor shall anything in this Act extend or be construed to extend to any complaints, orders, or warrants in matters of bastardy made against the putative father of any bastard child, save and except such of the provisions aforesaid as relate to . . . the levying of sums ordered to be paid, or to the imprisonment of a defendant for non-payment of the same."

Section 28 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, provides, so far as material, as follows:

D ". . . and in all cases in which any person shall be imprisoned as aforesaid for non-payment of any penalty or other sum he may pay or cause to be paid to the keeper of the prison in which he shall be so imprisoned the sum in the warrant of commitment mentioned, together with the amount of the costs, charges and expenses (if any) therein also mentioned, and the said keeper shall receive the same, and shall thereupon discharge such person, if he be in his custody for no other matter."

E Section 21 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, provides as follows:

F "A court of summary jurisdiction to whom application is made either to issue a warrant of distress for any sum adjudged to be paid by a conviction or order, or to issue a warrant for committing a person to prison for non-payment of a sum of money adjudged to be paid by a conviction, or in the case of a sum not a civil debt by an order, or for default of sufficient distress to satisfy any such sum, may if the court deem it expedient so to do, postpone the issue of such warrant until such time and on such conditions, if any, as to the court may seem just."

G The Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 3 (1), as amended by s. 79 of and sched. IX to the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, provides as follows:

H "(1) Where a term of imprisonment is imposed by a court of summary jurisdiction in respect of the non-payment of any sum of money . . . that term shall, on payment of a part of such sum to any person authorised to receive it, be reduced by such number of days as bears to the total number of days in term less one day the proportion most nearly approximating to, without exceeding, the proportion which the part paid bears to the sum in respect of which the imprisonment is imposed. (2) Provision may be made by rules under s. 29 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, as to the application of sums paid under this section and for determining the persons authorised to receive such payments and the conditions under which such payments may be made."

The relevant rules are the Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1915 (S.R. & O., 1915,

No. 200), rr. 18-25, as amended by S.R. & O., 1933, No. 1120. Section 32 (3) of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, provides as follows:

"Where in any proceedings for the enforcement of an order in any matter of bastardy or of an order enforceable as an order of affiliation the court commits the defendant to prison then, unless the court otherwise directs, no arrears shall accrue under the order during the time that the defendant is in prison."

Moreover, the imprisonment discharges the defendant from liability for the arrears for which he was imprisoned: HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 21, p. 650, note (o); LUSHINGTON'S LAW OF AFFILIATION AND BASTARDY, 6th ed., p. 70, note (h); Robson v. Spearman (1). Section 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, provides a scale of maximum terms of imprisonment for non-payment of money, the maximum terms being proportioned to the amounts unpaid.

In my opinion, it appears from these provisions that (subject to possible additions in respect of costs, which do not in principle affect the present question) (i) the committal order is the sanction for the non-payment of what may conveniently be called "the original debt", being the specific sum which is mentioned in the application for the committal order and proved to the justices to be in arrear; (ii) if there were a distress warrant, it would be for the levying of the amount of the original debt; (iii) a committal order cannot be made if the original debt has already been paid by the time when the application for the committal order is made to the justices; (iv) even after the defendant has been committed to prison, he can secure his release by payment of the original debt, and he can secure a proportionate reduction of the term of imprisonment by payment of part of the original debt; (v) the maximum term of imprisonment depends on the amount of the sum for non-payment of which it is imposed; and (vi) where a committal order is "suspended" on conditions, as in this case, there is only a postponement of the issue of the committal order so long as certain conditions are complied with, and there is no enlargement of the scope of the committal order.

In my opinion, the committal order remains throughout the sanction for non-payment of the original debt, and the postponement of the issue of the committal order on condition that the husband regularly pays the amounts of the weekly payments plus some addition on account of the arrears which constitutes the original debt merely gives to the husband a beneficial option and does not deprive him of the right to secure a discharge of or release from the committal order by payment of the original debt. The option is beneficial to the husband, because, if he exercises the option, no further arrears accrue and he gradually pays off the original debt for which the committal order is the sanction, so that the committal order remains suspended and eventually is discharged or ceases to have effect. If he does not exercise the option and fails to keep up the current payments, he is liable to further proceedings and a new committal order in respect of the new arrears, but the existing committal order retains its original character as the sanction for the original debt and is not converted into a sanction for the growing total of the original debt plus the accumulating new arrears. If the existing committal order, which is for a short term of imprisonment related to the small amount of the original debt, were converted into the sanction for the growing total, he could "work off" by imprisonment for a short term a large amount of old and new arrears for which a longer term of imprisonment would be appropriate. In my opinion, the answer to the first question is that the husband was entitled to secure a discharge of or release from the committal order by paying the original debt of £7 12s. 6d. notwithstanding that he had not complied with the conditions on which the committal order was suspended and further arrears had accrued.

The second question is whether the husband was rightly considered to have paid the original debt of £7 12s. 6d. by making the payments of £2, £2, £2 and £1 12s. 6d. mentioned above. The answer to that question must depend on the facts of the particular case. In this case the husband did make those payments and they did amount to £7 12s. 6d. He would be likely to wish these payments to be utilised in discharge of the original debt so that he would secure his release from the committal order. He was obviously not exercising his option to comply with the conditions of suspension, because he was not paying £2 12s. per week regularly or at all. Nor was he paying regularly or at all the amounts of the current weekly payments due under the maintenance order at the rate of £2 10s. per week. There was no evidence of any express appropriation of any of the sums paid to the current weekly payments, and there are no grounds for implying any such appropriation. So far as appears from the evidence, the first two sums paid were not appropriated, except that by payment to the collecting officer they were appropriated generally to the indebtedness of the husband to his wife under the orders of the court. The third payment probably was, and the last payment, made to avoid arrest, certainly was, appropriated to discharging the balance of the original debt. In those circumstances, I am of opinion that the husband was entitled to appropriate or have appropriated all these sums to the discharge of the original debt and he was rightly considered to have paid the original debt. Accordingly, in my opinion, this application fails and should be dismissed.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J. (read by PEARSON, J.): I agree that the husband was entitled to secure a discharge from his liability to be committed to prison by paying the amount of the arrears, £7 12s. 6d., outstanding at the time that the committal order was made. I agree that the justices were empowered by s. 21 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, if they thought it expedient so to do, to postpone the issue of the warrant on such conditions, if any, as to them might seem just, but I can find no power in them in so doing to deprive the husband of his right to pay off the arrears and so avoid committal and preserve his liberty, and they did not purport to do so. The question whether the husband was rightly considered to have paid the arrears of £7 12s. 6d. is, in my opinion, a question of fact. The husband was not bound to take advantage of the terms on which the justices suspended the committal order and he was obviously not doing so. I agree with PEARSON, J., whose judgment I have had the advantage of reading in advance, that there was no evidence of any express appropriation by the husband of any of the sums paid to the weekly amounts continuing to accrue under the maintenance order, and I know of no right in the collecting officer to make any such appropriation. On the figures, the last payment of £1 12s. 6d. must have been intended by the husband to discharge the balance of the £7 12s. 6d.; it can refer to nothing else and is not, I think, a mere arithmetical coincidence. On the facts of this case, I have come to the conclusion that the husband was rightly considered to have paid off all the arrears of £7 12s. 6d., and I agree that the application for mandamus should be dismissed.
